Unto Thee O God
do we give thanks unto Thee do we give thanks: for that thy name is near: thy wondrous works
declare.

"WHAT CAN BE UP AT NEIGHBOUR CREEKE'S?"

MRS. JOHN BOND'S TROUBLES.

BY MRS. PROSSER.

CHAPTER I.

WE need not remind the generality of our readers that many of the outskirts of London, which are now, in all essentials, London itself, were, fifty or sixty years ago, rural spots, pretty villages, with just enough of traffic to make them lively, while their fresh air and country-like appearance induced the more wealthy citizens to seek in them the change considered needful for health and recreation in the summer months.

It is of an outskirt of this description we are thinking, and we would ask the reader to go with us as we wander through it.

The street that nearly terminated one end of it was irregularly built; opening, where its best houses stood, on a pleasant lively road, closing its career in the fields that spread far away, rejoicing in ignorance of brick and mortar.

The corner houses of the superior end were shops, one inhabited by John Bond, general dealer, fruiterer and greengrocer, and the other by Samuel Creeke, hairdresser and shaver, for that was a day when there was work for the razor, a long beard, such as is now the rule, being not only the exception, but a wonder to be stared at. In addition to this vocation, Creeke employed his spare time in preparing rods and lines and all that pertained to the angling craft; for a pretty stream was close at hand which was very popular with all in that district who were lovers of the sport.

From his door dangled a fish cut out of tin; it was about the size of a sole, and glittered most bravely in the sunshine; it was the admiration of the urchins, his chief customers, and gained for his shop the title of "The Silver Fish."

John Bond's shop was two-sided, the one side facing "The Silver Fish," the other looking on the road. This road led to an important market, and was very pleasant and lively, for much and many passed up and down it during the day. It was an eminently good place for business, as John had found it to be; there was a considerable population, and no competition had as yet started up near at hand to interfere with his gains.

In "money-getting" and money matters altogether the world has changed as much as in other things. In John's time a hundred pounds was a solid sum, to be treated with respect; and to keep it whole and not risk its loss, by some enticing investment was the firm resolve of its possessors of the John Bond sort. Accordingly, every time he was able to put a guinea into the iron box which kept his cash, he smiled at its safety and turned the key with a most deliberate grind of exulting satisfaction.

He often turned it over in his mind whether he might not hit on some such fancy business as that which brought, it seemed, so profitable an increase to his neighbour; but he always finished off his meditation with "No good—no good! We do well as we are; we might have loss instead of gain to pay us for our trouble if we went speculating!"

Still, he had his doubts at times when Creeke's brisk doings came under his observation.

"Surely Sammy is doing a good business that way," he said one day, when, no customers being in his own shop, he stood watching those who thronged his neighbour's; "but I've got my doubts if he makes 'em pay; he's a rare man for scheming, but when it comes to real business"—here he shook his head to the disparagement of Sammy's "exchequer" powers, while, with an inward chuckle his heart turned towards his own iron box, all the treasure of which had been got by plain, sensible work, and kept by plain, sensible, diligent saving!

Sammy was a lively little man, quite a contrast to John Bond, who was round, solid, heavy and grave, without a gleam of the ideal about him. John could laugh at a joke when it was made as plain to him as an entry in his ledger, but things that would make Sammy Creeke quiver and twinkle all over, were to him without meaning.

Perhaps the difference between them helped to make and keep them so friendly; certain it was, that though far asunder in opinion on some important subjects, they went on in a smooth sound intercourse uninterrupted by clashing or jarring. John went regularly to "The Silver Fish," for his shave on a Saturday night, and Sammy as regularly laid in his housekeeping stores at John's on Monday morning.

And now let us describe Mrs. Bond, John's wife, of whom we have much to say. She was in some respects as strong a contrast to her husband as he was to his friend Sammy. The neighbours called her "the wooden woman," and really in appearance she was very like a huge jointed doll; very tall, with long bony limbs; her face was somewhat like one of the fine russet pippins with which she had just been busily ornamenting her window, brown and red fighting for the mastery in it. She seldom had any sort of expression on it. Her shop was her world, and her reigning desire and thought were to do her duty by that and her husband; we need not divide these two, for with her John Bond was identical with the shop, and the shop was one with him.

But "wooden" as she was, betraying in general no feeling good or bad towards any one, beyond giving a satisfied nod with the "thankee" when she had made a good "deal" with a well-to-do customer, or a cold hard stare through her huge brass spectacles when a poor one begged to be trusted till Saturday (when wages would come in), for the candles and the half-quartern of tea already out of Mrs. Bond's grasp, she had a heart. She distinguished in that heart, between "them as was poor by reason of hard times, bad husbands and long families, and no work," and "them who was short of money through drink, idleness, waste, or other bad ways." But she never confided her thoughts on this subject to John, though she would argue the matter over in her own mind, as to the justice of being equally hard to all, summing up with "Can't see it!—can't see it!"

But though she could not see the equity of John's doctrine—"People without money oughtn't to go to shop" (at all events to his shop)—she did not condemn him for his sternness, nor spend a moment in considering whether he was wrong or right. She went on quietly in her own way, softening many a hard lot, and brightening many a heavy brow; comforting her conscience with the thought that she did no more than give from her own share of the profits, and, considering how hard she worked to get and keep custom, that was no more than her due!

But there was a softness beyond this; deep down in her heart, she loved little children.

She had once been a mother, and the loss of her little child at five years old had "ploughed up her heart." She did not show much; people had said at the time that John made "a bigger trouble" of it than she did—but "people" see the outside only.

She was no talker; she was incapable of any show of feeling; but it happens sometimes that such people suffer most in sorrow and rejoice more in times of gladness than the more demonstrative. Very likely her silence and her seeming stolid indifference were in part the result of John's character and manner. She was just what he wanted her to be—a good worker, a good saver, a good cook in their small way, and able and willing to make him comfortable. This he considered was enough for him; a wooden woman that moved so well, was all he wanted; fine feelings—any feelings at all that would have softened her, and damaged her usefulness—were not to be thought of by him. If he ever thought about her at all, it was that she was the right sort of woman for him. It was a common saying in the place that "Bond and his wife couldn't have been better matched," but, although a word of difference was never heard between them, they were, in truth, as far asunder as the poles.

The children knew more about it than their elders; they never took their farthings or halfpennies to Bond's when John was in the shop; like wise traders, they waited till he was gone over to Creeke's or somewhere else, that they might be served by "the missus," and not seldom an apple, or a lump of gingerbread went into the pinafore of some poor urchin who could only pay for it with a wistful stare and grin of gratitude. One day when "The Silver Fish" was more thronged (or had been) than usual, John, who was standing in his customary attitude, his back against the doorpost, his hands in his pockets and one elbow fixed on a sack of potatoes at his side, thus getting rest from every available source, noticed a person who was strange to him, walk up to Creeke's house.

"Not for a shave, sure!" he ejaculated. "No, it's a hair-cutting job!" he added. "But what a time they stand settling it; that's not like Sammy, to waste ten minutes in talk!"

He was fairly puzzled; the stranger had his back to him, but he could see that he was none of the common sort. He seemed to be very earnest about what he was saying, occasionally raising his hand and moving his head, while Sammy stood in a thoughtful, attentive attitude, and, judging from his face, was equally interested with the speaker in his discourse.

At last they went into the shop, the stranger, as he passed the silver fish, giving it a tap with his cane.

"I've got it," said John to himself. "It's about the rod and line business he's come! Well, you'd think a man of his age—thirty may be—could find a better job than going a-fishing!"

"Missus," he cried to his wife, who was busy settling some fresh fruit in the window that faced the road, "Missus, I say! (how deaf you do get!) come and look and see if you know this man—a 'gentleman' sort of man—coming out of Creeke's; leastways, he will come out in a minute."

Mrs. Bond obeyed, and stood by him, looking towards "The Silver Fish." As she stood, she saw from the corner of her eye several loiterers, ready for a market as soon as Bond had cleared the coast; but she did not make any sign of recognition, and they prudently kept their distance.

"There he is!" cried John, as the stranger came out of the shop, followed by Sammy Creeke. "Did ye ever see him afore?"

"Oh, yes," she answered; "he's Mr. Shepherd, the new curate."

"New what?" asked John, turning sharp round and looking at her with surprise.

"New curate," she repeated, apparently undaunted, though in truth she felt a little flutter within.

"Wherever did you see him?" he asked, in a tone of surprise.

"At church," she replied.

"What church?" he asked.

"Our church as we always go to—when we go!" she replied.

Well might she say "when we go!" She had gradually fallen into the habit of staying at home on Sunday mornings on various pretences: there was John's dinner to cook, and there were many little things to be done that she could not find time for in the week. As for John, Sunday was the quietest day in the week for him to make up his accounts and read his paper. All the morning he was engaged thus, and in the evening, after a cup of tea, in summer-time he took a walk in the fields. At one time "the missus" used to join him in this walk, but for a long season now, she had let him go forth alone, and when he returned from his ramble he occasionally found the house empty. So she might well say, "when we go."

He was struck by the unusual energy of her words "when we go!" but he did not answer.

Waiting till Sammy Creeke should have bidden the stranger farewell, that his curiosity concerning his visit might be satisfied, he kept his post at the door, his wife returning to the arrangement of the shop window. She was perfectly destitute of curiosity respecting the affairs of her neighbours, but she had some little speculation in her mind concerning the appearance of the new curate at "The Silver Fish." She did not make any reply to her husband's comment on the subject; he muttered something about "such as him," "if he was the curate," might find a better job than going a-fishing! —idle work for any man, but for "such as him" worse than for any!

No, she went on filling her round flat baskets with rosy apples and glossy plums, nodding lovingly to the eager little faces clustered outside.

The "little speculations" in her brain were of a pleasant kind, it was manifest, from the almost smile on her face as she dwelt on them.

"He's not come about fishing," she thought. "No; it's summat good as he's come about. I wish as John would 'go-church'; he used to go."

Why did she now go? She had long given up the habit; what had made her take it up again so regularly in the evening?

She could not have told you; all she knew was that she had felt a secret drawing towards it, and a comfort in following that drawing. When she sat there, in the free seats, she was exactly opposite to the gallery where the school-children were, and it was very seldom she looked at any other object, or thought of anything else but those little faces in front, the youngest always being next to the mistress.

Sometimes the question would rise in her heart whether her little Susy would have been like one of those pretty little creatures if she had lived, and then a tear would almost come; it seemed to her that she missed her heart's delight more and more as she grew older, and having no one to share her sorrow with made it worse. As to drawing on John Bond for sympathy, poor man, he knew no more what it meant than the potatoes at his door, or the fruit in his window. He had been "very sorry" when the little one died. He had thought it a hard case; but children would die, and little Susy had doubtless, as was said at the time, "gone to heaven" (wherever that might be!), and "was an angel" (whatever that might be!), so it was best to be satisfied, as things couldn't be altered! He was very pleased in his heart (such a heart as he had) that his wife did not seem to make so great a trouble of it as might have been expected. When the neighbours remarked that it was wonderful "the missus took it so easy," he would answer that "she was a sensible woman, and too keen to her duty to fret, to the hindering of her work."

It was long since she had mentioned her child's name to any one; it would have been a sheer impossibility to do it to John; he had so hard, so matter-of-fact a way of treating the subject, that she always avoided any allusion to it herself, and cut short any approach to one from him in a summary way, by some remark on the advance in the price of bacon, or the cheapness with which she could get damsons from Highbury Wood. Such a diversion was always a success, for his heart was sincerely in these matters.

On the Sunday before the curate's visit to "The Silver Fish," Mrs. Bond had been much touched and aroused at the church. As usual she had begun the service, with her face shaded by a pillar from observation, with a scrutiny of the children; she wanted to see if any were missing; and having satisfied herself on this point she went on to notice their looks and behaviour. She was greatly troubled lest one who was fast asleep and bobbed now against her right neighbour and now against her left, should fall down on to the rails of the gallery.

It was the new curate's first Sunday. He was preaching on the subject of children, his text being, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me!" Mrs. Bond until this eventful day had never listened to a sermon, nor in fact to anything read or said in the church; it had never come to her that there was anything concerning her in what was read and said, and she had so confined a knowledge of language, and was so very ignorant of the Bible that it all went over her head, as being beyond her reach. But whether the earnestness of the curate's voice and manner attracted her, or the tenderness and simplicity with which he spoke touched her, certain it is that, for the first time, she listened.

A great deal, even now, floated by her, but this much she received, that Jesus Christ actually had spoken these words, and that He loved little children, and desired them to be brought to Him!

She was hearing about Jesus Christ. She knew the name well enough, but only the name.

He loved little children! Then He was one to be loved. She could not have expressed clearly anything that she felt, when she came out of the church; but that this had fastened itself on her heart, that Jesus Christ loved the little ones; that He had loved her Susy and had taken her to Himself, because He loved her!

Strange, new thoughts filled her mind. She seemed to have found a clue by which she might reach her child again. How, when, or where, she could not tell; but a new life sprang up within her, she hoped! and her hope was in Jesus Christ, though she knew it not. Hitherto she had never heard of Him with any interest; He was a name; someone—or something—spoken of in church, and put in the Bible; but the Bible, as we have said, she had read but very little, and when the name was spoken in the church, she attached no meaning to it. "Everything in the Bible was good," she was satisfied of that; and "everything in the church was good," of that she had no doubt; but when she shut her Bible, she left its contents behind her, and when she left the church, it was without a single impression of the truth she had heard.

John had not returned from his walk that Sunday evening, when for the first time she had been in a measure aroused from her apathy. She took the Bible from the shelf where it always stood, and opened it with a view to find something about Jesus. She had become possessed with a feeling that He was not only "in the Bible," but a real person, "a Living Being," and as much alive as what she was—that He was very good, very loving, and that, somehow, He knew her, and was sorry for her trouble, and would comfort her as He, and only He, could comfort her; for He had taken her darling, and He had her now, and was keeping her safe that she might have her again.

When she heard the latch rise, she shut the book; but it was with the determination that she would read it till she had found out what she wanted to know about Jesus.

John was tired and sleepy; but he ate his supper and drank his ale with his usual interest; telling how he had heard of turnips cheaper and better than those they had bought last, and saying, but quite good-humouredly, she ought to be more alive to business, and keep a sharper eye on the markets.

He did not notice any change in her manner, and he was sorry for it; he wished he could stir her up to be a little more lively about the shop. "People are getting so wideawake in these days we mustn't go to sleep over things," he remarked as he took up his candle to go to bed. "I think we've been a bit easy; we must sharpen up. They say as there's going to be a new shop opened in our line two doors down the road; if so be that's true, we may lose our custom; well, we must do our best, and save while we can," and he went towards the stairs.

"Going so early, John!" said his wife; "why you'll have had enough of bed afore morning!"

She so seldom made any comment on his movements that he was surprised at this, and answered, somewhat gruffly, that there was naught to be sat up for. "Sleep to-night, work to-morrow!"

"Sleep and work! Sleep and work!" she half murmured as he walked up the stairs. And the thought came with an unwonted sense of weariness to her, "What a heavy burden of life! Sleep and work and nothing else!"

CHAPTER II.

It was a few days after this that the new curate paid his visit to "The Silver Fish," as we have described, and when he had departed, John Bond went over to his neighbour Creeke "to know all about it."

His wife, who had taken advantage of the opportunity to serve her little waiting customers, looked inquiringly at him when he returned, but she asked no questions, fearful of provoking any suspicions as to her thoughts respecting the new curate, for John's manner since the words had dropped from her "when we go," had not been quite pleasant and peaceable, as they were when he was not offended. She knew well, that when he had a grudge, he was by no means "comfortable to deal with."

He filled his pipe, according to his usual custom, and sat down on the settle to smoke, without speaking.

She did not like the look on his face; what could he have heard?

At last, gathering courage, she said in a friendly tone, "Feared you've got a touch of your old pain, John?"

He did not seem much softened by this kindness; he looked at her with a mixed expression of vexation and doubt, and said, "I 'spose you want to know what 'parson' came to Creeke's about?"

"Nay, John!" she replied, really surprised; "I don't want to know more than you want to tell. I don't want to hear what don't concern me."

"That's it!" said John, in the same tone as before.

"What?" she asked innocently.

"Why, it do concern you!" he answered.

"Me!" she cried, putting down her iron as she spoke, for she was ironing a shirt.

"You might as well go on with your work," he said. "You'll be put off it enough soon, I fancy!"

"Put off work!—me! John, man, what's come to you?" she asked half indignantly, for his voice and manner were evidently meant to be reproachful.

Perhaps he was a little ashamed; he could not justify his behaviour, and he felt it; his wife was generally so immovable in temper that he often presumed on it with impunity; but he saw now that he had gone too far, so with a softened manner, he said, "They say (Creeke says), that the parson wants to start summat here 'for praying and that.' It's a way as is getting about. I suppose it's to save folks the trouble of going to church."

His wife could scarcely help crying out "good job!"—her usual welcome of any very pleasant news, but she checked herself, and went on ironing, wondering what was really going to be "started," but not daring to ask.

At that moment the shop-door bell tingled, and she went to answer it, and from her customer got all she wanted to know. Mr. Shepherd, the new curate, had been all round the village (that part belonging to the parish he was in), to try and collect some to attend "a cottage lecture." "Creeke says as he may have his shop any evening but Saturdays," said the customer. "And Brewster, the baker, has offered his. Shall you come to it? the first is to come off to-morrow."

Mrs. Bond answered she must think about it; and went back to her ironing when the woman had done, with a strange tumult of thoughts.

Of course she said nothing; but the prospect of being able to attend the lectures where she would hear of Him whom she earnestly desired to know, made her heart glow with delight. She forgot John's ill temper, and as he watched her busy with her work, it struck him that she had something pleasant to think about, and he wondered what it could be; was it the report that had got about of the new shop's going to be altered into a grocer's? He alluded to this, and asked her if she had heard it. No, she had not; but she hoped it might be true, she answered. He did not like the indifference of her expression; but he recollected that she never showed much feeling about anything. "She goes by the name of the 'Wooden woman,'" he said to himself, "and I don't mind how wooden she is as long as she keeps well to work and business!"

The next evening, she put on her bonnet and shawl, and went in to him as he sat with his pipe at the fire.

"John, will you go 'in shop' if anyone comes?" she said in her usual calm voice.

"Going out?" he asked in a tone of surprise.

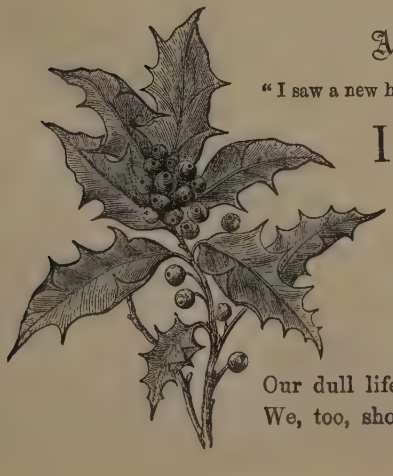
"Yes, for an hour, may be," she answered calmly.

"Where?" he asked rather angrily.

"To 'The Silver Fish,'" she said as quietly as before.

"Then you're going a-gossiping like the rest! I thought you knew better," he exclaimed.

She made no answer; her conscience acquitted her of any wrongdoing, she had worked hard all day, and was not "going a-gossiping"—no, she only wished that John would "shut up shop" and go with her—but she did not tell him so.



A New World.

"I saw a new heaven and a new earth."—Rev. xxi. 1.

IF we this new-born year
Could live to Him—
Love simple and sincere,
Faith never dim—
New green should overspread
The meadows brown;
New gracious skies o'erhead
Look smiling down;
Our dull life kindled to a strange new worth,
We, too, should cry, "Behold! new heaven and earth."

FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.

THE FIRST PREACHING AT ANTIOCH.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D., MANCHESTER.

"And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus. And the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord."—Acts xi. 20, 21.

THUS simply does the historian tell one of the greatest events in the history of the Church. How great it was will appear if we observe that the weight of authority among critics and commentators sees here an extension of the message of salvation to Greeks, that is, to pure heathens, and not a mere preaching to Hellenists, that is, to Greek-speaking Jews born outside Palestine.

If that be correct, this was a great stride forward in the development of the Church. It needed a vision to overcome the scruples of Peter, and impel him to the bold innovation of preaching to Cornelius and his household, and, as we know, his doing so gave grave offence to some of his brethren in Jerusalem. But in the case before us, some Cypriote and African Jews—men of no note in the Church, whose very names have perished, with no official among them, with no vision nor command to impel them, with no precedent to encourage them, with nothing but the truth in their minds and the impulses of Christ's love in their hearts—solve the problem of the extension of Christ's message to the heathen, and, quite unconscious of the greatness of their act, do the thing about the propriety of which there had been such serious question in Jerusalem.

This boldness becomes even more remarkable if we notice that the incident of our text may have taken place before Peter's visit to Cornelius. The verse before our text, "They which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen travelled, preaching the word to none but unto the Jews only," is almost a verbatim repetition of words in an earlier chapter, and evidently suggests that the writer is returning to that point of time, in order to take up another thread of his narrative co-temporaneous with those already pursued. If so, three distinct lines of expansion appear to have started from the dispersion of the Jerusalem church in the persecution—namely, Philip's mission to Samaria, Peter's to Cornelius, and this work in Antioch. Whether prior in time or no, the preaching in the latter city was plainly quite independent of the other two. It is further noteworthy that this, the effort of a handful of unnamed men, was the true "leader"—the shoot that grew. Philip's work, and Peter's, so far as we know, were side-branches, which came to little; this led on to a church at Antioch, and so to Paul's missionary work, and all that came of that.

The incident naturally suggests some thoughts bearing on the general subject of Christian work, which we now briefly present.

I. Notice the spontaneous impulse which these men obeyed.

Persecution drove the members of the Church apart, and, as a matter of course, wherever they went they took their faith with them, and, as a matter of course, spoke about it. The coals were scattered from the hearth in Jerusalem by the armed heel of violence. That did not put the fire out, but only spread it, for wherever they were flung they kindled a blaze. These men had no special injunction "to preach the Lord Jesus." They do not seem to have adopted this line of action deliberately, or of set purpose. They believed, and therefore spoke. A spontaneous impulse, and nothing more, leads them on. They find themselves rejoicing in a great Saviour-Friend. They see all around them men who need Him, and that is enough. They obey the promptings of the voice within, and lay the foundations of the first Gentile church.

Such a spontaneous impulse is ever the natural result of our own personal possession of Christ. In regard to worldly good, the instinct, except when overcome by higher motives, is to keep the treasure to oneself. But even in the natural sphere, there are possessions which to have is to long to impart, such as truth and knowledge. And in the spiritual sphere, it is emphatically the case that real possession is always accompanied by a longing to impart. The old prophet spoke a universal truth when he said: "Thy word was as a fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay." If we have found Christ for ourselves, we shall undoubtedly wish to speak forth our knowledge of his love. Convictions which are deep demand expression. Emotion which is strong needs utterance. If our hearts have any fervour of love to Christ in them, it will be as natural to tell it forth, as tears are to sorrow or smiles to happiness. True, there is a reticence in profound feeling, and sometimes the deepest love can only "love and be silent," and there is a just suspicion of loud or vehement protestations of Christian emotion, as of any emotion. But for all that, it remains true that a heart warmed with the love of Christ needs to express its love, and will give it forth, as certainly as light must radiate from its centre, or heat from a fire.

Then, true kindliness of heart creates the same impulse. We cannot truly possess the treasure for ourselves without pity for those who have it not. Surely there is no stranger contradiction than that Christian men and women can be content to keep Christ as if He were their special property, and have their spirits untouched into any likeness of his Divine pity for the multitudes who were as sheep having no shepherd. What kind of Christians must they be who think of Christ as "a Saviour for me," and take no care to set Him forth as "a Saviour for you"? What should we think of men in a shipwreck who were content to get into the life-boat, and let everybody else drown? What should we think of people in a famine feasting sumptuously on their private stores, whilst women were boiling their children for a meal, and men fighting with dogs for garbage on the dunghills? "He that withholdeth bread, the people shall curse him." What of him who withholds the Bread of Life, and all the while claims to be a follower of the Christ, who gave his flesh for the good of the world?

Further, loyalty to Christ creates the same impulse. If we are true to our Lord, we shall feel that we cannot but speak up and out for Him, and that all the more, where his name is unloved and unhonoured. He has left his good fame very much in our hands, and the very same impulse which hurries words to our lips when we hear the name of an absent friend calumniated should make us speak for Him. He is a doubtfully loyal subject, who, if he lives among rebels, is afraid to show his colours. He is already a coward, and is on the way to be a traitor. Our Master has made us his witnesses. He has placed in our hands, as a sacred deposit, the honour of his name. He has entrusted to us, as his selectest sign of confidence, the carrying out of the purposes for which on earth his blood was shed, on which in heaven his heart is set. How can we be loyal to Him if we are not forced by a mighty constraint to respond to his great tokens of trust in us, and if we know nothing of that spirit which said: "Necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel!" I do not say that a man cannot be a Christian unless he knows and obeys this impulse. But, at least, we may safely say that he is a very weak and imperfect Christian who does not.

II. This incident suggests the universal obligation on all Christians to make known Christ.

These men were not officials. In these early days the Church had a very loose organisation. But the fugitives in our narrative seem to have had among them none even of the humble office-bearers of primitive times. Neither had they any command or commission from Jerusalem. No one there had given them authority, or, as would appear, knew anything of their proceedings. Could there be a more striking illustration of the great truth that whatever varieties of function may be committed to various officers in the Church, the work of telling Christ's love to men belongs to every one who has found it for himself or herself? "This honour have all the saints."

Whatever may be our differences of opinion as to church order and offices, they need not interfere with our firm grasp of this truth. "Preaching Christ," in the sense in which that expression is used in the New Testament, implies no one special method of proclaiming the glad tidings. A word written in a letter to a friend, a sentence dropped in casual conversation, a lesson to a child on a mother's lap, or any other way by which, to any listeners, the great story of the cross is told, is as truly—often more truly—preaching Christ as the set discourse which has usurped the name.

We profess to believe in the priesthood of all believers, we are ready enough to assert it in opposition to sacerdotal assumptions. Are we as ready to recognise it as laying a very real responsibility upon us, and involving a very practical inference as to our own conduct? We all have the power, therefore we all have the duty. For what purpose did God give us the blessing of knowing Christ ourselves? Not for our own well-being alone, but that through us, the blessing might be still farther diffused.

> "Heaven doth with us as men with torches do,
> Not light them for themselves,"

"God hath shined into our hearts that we might give to others the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Every Christian is solemnly bound to fulfil this Divine intention, and to take heed to the imperative command, "Freely ye have received, freely give."

III. Observe, further, the simple message which they proclaimed.

"Preaching the Lord Jesus," says the text—or, more accurately perhaps—preaching Jesus as Lord. The substance then of their message was just this—the proclamation of the person and dignity of their Master, the story of the human life of the Man, the story of the Divine sacrifice and self-bestowment by which He had bought the right of supreme rule over every heart; and the urging of his claims on all who heard of his love. And this, their message, was but the proclamation of their own personal experience. They had found Jesus for themselves to be lover and Lord, friend and Saviour of their souls, and the joy they had received they sought to share with these Greeks, worshippers of gods and lords many.

Surely anybody can deliver that message who has had that experience. All have not the gifts which would fit for public speech, but all who have tasted that the Lord is gracious can tell somehow how gracious He is. The first Christian sermon was very short, and it was very efficacious, for it "brought to Jesus" the whole congregation. Here it is: "He first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messias." Surely we can all say that, if we have found Him. Surely we shall all long to say it, if we are glad that we have found Him, and if we love our brother.

Notice, too, how simple the form as well as the substance of the message. "They spake." It was no set address, no formal utterance, but familiar, natural talk to ones and twos, as opportunity offered. The form was so simple that we may say there was none. What we want is that Christian people should speak anyhow. What does the shape of the cup matter? What does it matter whether it be gold or clay? The main thing is that it shall bear the water of life to some thirsty lip. All Christians have to preach, as the word is here, that is, to tell the good news. Their task is to carry a message, no refinement of words is needed for that—arguments are not needed. They have to tell it simply and faithfully, as one who only cares to repeat what he has had given to him. They have to tell it confidently, as having proved it true. They have to tell it beseechingly, as loving the souls to whom they bring it. Surely we can all do that, if we ourselves are living on Christ and have drunk into his Spirit. Let his mighty salvation, experienced by yourselves, be the substance of your message, and let the form of it be guided by the old words, "It shall be, when the Spirit of the Lord is come upon thee, that thou shalt do as occasion shall serve thee."

IV. Notice, lastly, the mighty Helper who prospered their work.

"The hand of the Lord was with them." The very keynote of this book of the Acts is the work of the ascended Christ in and for his Church. At every turning-point in the history, and throughout the whole narrative, forms of speech like this occur, bearing witness to the profound conviction of the writer that Christ's active energy was with his servants, and Christ's hand the origin of all their security and of all their success.

So this is a statement of a permament and universal fact. We do not labour alone; however feeble our hands, that mighty Hand is laid on them to direct their movements and to lend strength to their weakness. It is not our speech which will secure results, but his presence with our words which shall bring it about that even through them a great number shall believe and turn to the Lord. There is our encouragement when we are despondent. There is our rebuke when we are self-confident. There is our stimulus when we are indolent. There is our quietness when we are impatient. If ever we are tempted to think our task heavy, let us not forget that He who set it helps us to do it, and from His throne shares in all our toils, the Lord still, as of old, working with us. If ever we feel that our strength is nothing, and that we stand solitary against many foes, let us fall back upon the peace-giving thought that one man against the world, with Christ to help him, is always in the majority, and let us leave issues of our work in his hands, whose hand will guard the seed sown in weakness, whose smile will bless the springing thereof.

How little any of us know what shall come of our poor work, under his fostering care! How little these men knew that they were laying the foundations of the great change which was to transform the Christian community from a Jewish sect into a world-embracing Church! So is it ever. We know not what we do when simply and humbly we speak his name. The far-reaching issues escape our eyes. Then sow the seed, and He will "give it a body as it pleaseth Him." On earth we may never know the results of our labours. They will be among the surprises of heaven, where many a solitary worker shall exclaim with wonder as he looks on the hitherto unknown children whom God hath given him, "Behold, I was left alone, these, where had they been?" Then, though our names may have perished from earthly memories, like those of the simple fugitives of Cyprus and Cyrene, who "were the first that ever burst" into the night of heathendom with the torch of the gospel in their hands, they will be written in the Lamb's book of life, and He will confess them in the presence of his Father in heaven.

The Pilgrims.

"Out of darkness into His marvellous light."

WHAT, nearly home? The sun is sinking fast,
Around us rise the mountains dim and vast;
And lo! like mighty sentinels they stand
To guard the borders of the Promised Land!

Longer and longer seemed the toilsome way,
Touched by the sunlight of the waning day
We feared the night, our souls were sore distress'd,
And yet—God knew that we were near our rest.

Behind us lie the deserts bleak and bare,
The valleys haunted by the fiend Despair,
The flowers whose sweetness was a poisoned breath,
The groves where chilly shadows harboured death.

Before us, shining through the sun-gilt mist,
The vision of the Great Evangelist,
The heritage of all the saints in light,
Jerusalem the Golden, meets our sight.

THE PILGRIMS.

A MALAGASY HERO,

WHO OFFERED HIMSELF FOR HIS KING AND COUNTRY.*

ON the summit of the hill upon which Antananarivo is built, there stands out in bold relief against the prevailing blue sky, the huge palace known as Besakana, or "Very Wide." Upon this spot there once stood a building which was erected by King Andrianamasinavalona; and the story of its origin has thrilled the hearts of countless myriads of Malagasy, who have justly felt proud of their relationship to a man whose noble spirit of self-abnegation led him to offer his life as a sacrifice for his king and his country.

Before the king began to build his palace, he sent for the diviners and astrologers; and these men appointed what they supposed to be a lucky day on which the king ought to erect the first corner-post of the building. "And," said the diviners and astrologers, "in order that the building be successfully raised, in order, also, that thy kingdom be made prosperous, it will be necessary for thee to make a human sacrifice. And the first corner-post which the king erects must be sprinkled with human blood."

Forthwith the king sent out a proclamation saying: "Gather ye! gather, all ye beneath the skies!" And the people assembled in tens of thousands at the place where they were accustomed to hear proclamations relating to the business of the kingdom. And when the people were thus assembled, the king stood up and said: "The diviners and astrologers tell me that in order that the palace be successfully built, in order also that my kingdom be prosperous, it is necessary for me to make a human sacrifice. So this is what I have to say to you, O my people. God hath given me this land; let them come to me those who so love me that they are willing and ready to give up their native land, and wife and children, and father and mother, and even life for my sake; for I must make a human sacrifice."

No sooner had the assembled hosts heard that than they all fled; and to the north, south, east, and west, they ran as fast as their legs would carry them; and the king, wondering, bewildered, and astonished, was left alone by himself.

To the west of the capital are the grand Betsimitatra rice-plains, and upon a very picturesque little islet rising out of the plains is built the village called Anosizato. On the day of the proclamation, there was a man named Ratrimofoloalina, an inhabitant of this village, who, instead of attending the grand proclamation, was working in his rice-field at Anosizato. When he saw the people running away he asked what it meant. At first no one would give him full information, and the only reply he could extract from the panting and breathless runaways was, "The king wants to make a human sacrifice! The king wants to make a human sacrifice!" At last, however, he succeeded in making a man tell him the cause more freely.

Ratrimofoloalina said nothing, and he returned to his rice-field; but not to work, for he went to a little puddle, where he washed his bespattered legs; his spade also he cleansed, and then he took it home, and placed it in a corner of his little reed hut. Without saying anything to his wife and family, he straightway went to the palace yard, and as he entered by the old stone gate which is on the north side, he saw the king pacing up and down the palace-yard, with head bent down, and the king was evidently in deep meditation. Up went Ratrimofoloalina, with that form of salutation which is due to a ruler in Madagascar: "Long may you live, O king. May you reach to old age! May you never be an invalid! May you be happy! What was the drift of your proclamation to-day, for I was not in time to hear it?"

Then answered the king: "No one so loveth me that he will consent to be a sacrifice in order to make me prosperous. When I asked for a sacrifice the people all fled from me. What then is your opinion, Ratrimofoloalina?"

When Ratrimofoloalina heard this, he stripped himself of his lamba, threw it aside, and advanced towards the king: "Let me be a sacrifice for thee, O king. I will give my life for my king, in order that his palace be successfully built and his kingdom made prosperous."

"Are you willing that your body should be cut?" asked the king.

"Yes, I am willing," said Ratrimofoloalina.

"Are you really willing to be killed?" inquired the king.

"Yes, I am willing," said the man; "willing to be sacrificed for thy good, O king."

"Well," replied the king, "you had better go home and ask your wife and children about this matter; and if you are in the same mind to-morrow morning, come here, and you shall be sacrificed."

Ratrimofoloalina went home, but he said nothing to his wife and children, and on the morrow he returned to the palace yard. The king was again pacing up and down the yard. Ratrimofoloalina, after having saluted the king, said, "I am of the same mind this morning that I was yesterday, and in order that thy palace be successfully raised, in order also that thy kingdom be made prosperous, I have come to be sacrificed."

The king turned aside to some officers, and said, "Here! bring that piece of wood; bring also those ropes yonder," and pointing to the wood and the ropes, he said, "Strap him down!"

The victim was soon surrounded with men who carried formidable-looking spears and gigantic knives, and as he was being tied down the king kept an eye on him in order that he might see whether he would wince or relent; but the man most bravely bore it all. While he was being strapped down, crowds of people were peering through the wooden fence of the palace yard, and they shouted out, "You are a fool, Ratrimofoloalina, to give your life to no purpose! You are a fool to forsake your wife and children! You are a wretch, and woe be to you!"

All these warnings failed to move the heroic patriot; and the king, when he saw that the man was sincere, called some of the officers aside, and said, "Don't kill him! Don't kill him! Don't kill him! Bring a pot of odinaty,* and pour that over him." To another the king said, "Cut off a bit of one ear only; cut off a bit of one ear only!"

Up came an officer with a big bloodthirsty-looking knife, and simultaneously with the cutting off of a piece of his ear the blood-red dye was thrown over him, and a pretty spectacle Ratrimofoloalina presented.

People who at a distance were looking on thought that Ratrimofoloalina had been beheaded; and these swiftly fled lest they too should be asked to sacrifice themselves for the king.

Though Ratrimofoloalina was so sadly wounded he did not murmur; and the king, looking at the brave and noble man, cried out: "Cut the ropes! cut the ropes! stand him up." And as he was raised up the blood and blood-red dye streamed down his stalwart frame.

The king forthwith gave him a lamba made of banana-bark, a token of special royal favour in those days. Then said the king to Ratrimofoloalina: "Because out of love for me you gave your life for me, what shall I do for you? Shall I give you milch cows? and when any run dry I will substitute them. Shall I give you a fighting bull?† and every time his horns are broken in fight I will give you another. Shall I give you rice-grounds? and every time the floods cover them with sand I will give you more. Shall I make all my subjects pay you two shillings for every house they possess? Or shall I make you to be one of my own noble ruling family? Choose what you like, and whatsoever your request be it shall be granted to you."

Ratrimofoloalina was glad when he heard that, and said; "I thank you for your kindness, but let me go home first and ask the opinion of my wife and children."

The king answered: "Go home and ask the opinion of your wife and children; and come again to-morrow morning, and whatsoever request you make it shall be granted to you."

That night Ratrimofoloalina and his wife and children pondered well the request which should be made; and on the morrow he returned to the palace. After having saluted the king he said: "Concerning the milch cows and the fighting bulls, they are things which can come to an end very soon; and I do not wish that your subjects should be made to pay taxes to me; and neither do I like to be loaded with the honour of becoming one of your relatives, because I like you to be the sole sovereign of this country." And then, placing his hand upon his breast, he said: "Remember my offspring! Remember my future offspring. May that please your majesty. Let none of my descendants ever suffer death for any offence."

On hearing that request the king said, "I see you are a far-seeing man; but I will grant you your request, for whose is the land but mine? Whose is the power to make laws and govern but mine? And this is what I will do: 1. The blood of yourself and your descendants shall no more be shed, for this one sacrifice is enough. 2. You and your descendants shall no more be bound with iron chains, for this one binding is enough. 3. Neither you nor your offspring shall be counted guilty of wrong. And this league with you shall all my posterity keep with your posterity, and this covenant between us shall not be broken for ever and ever."

Accordingly the king made a proclamation to this effect at Andohalo, where a stone was set up to commemorate the event.

And in the proclamation the king said: "Ratrimofoloalina, from this day forth your name shall be changed, and you shall be called Tsimatimanota ('Not Dead though Transgressing'), and of that tribe thou shalt be the head."

This proclamation caused some to fear lest Ratrimofoloalina should take advantage of the privileges thus conferred upon him, and others were jealous, so Andriamampandry said to the king: "I could not sleep last night."

"Why?" inquired the king.

"Ratrimofoloalina is the king now," replied Andriamampandry, "and he can do as he likes with our wives, our slaves, and our oxen, for he is never to be guilty for any wrong he may commit."

"I see," said the king, "that he has obtained an advantage over me; but for all that I cannot alter my covenant with him."

The king sent for Ratrimofoloalina, and said: "I am a king, therefore alter not my word; but concerning my subjects' property—do not take their possessions by force; for if you do that you are a king like me. But concerning my property, do as you please, whosoever may be angry; for my word shall never be broken as long as my descendants rule in this land."

Ratrimofoloalina answered: "How may I be assured that your word will never be broken?"

The king replied: "When you and your descendants present the allegiance-money, do not use a dollar or broken money as other people; but present two silver links; and that for two reasons: 1. This covenant between us two is like a link; and if the two links become wide apart knock them, so that they close. That is to symbolise that our friendship must always be close. 2. If your descendants are guilty of taking the property of the sovereign they must bring the links to whoever is sovereign and they shall not be counted guilty."

Now it might be thought that the members of this tribe would presume upon the privileges they possess; but such is not the case, for those who belong to "The not-dead-though-transgressing" tribe say they should be ashamed to take advantage of the position won for them by their noble head. Out of this interesting tribe have come many who have bravely served Christ in Madagascar.

THE UNKNOWN MORROW.

"Ye know not what shall be on the morrow."—Jas. iv. 14.

IF there is anything we are sure of it is this, that we know not what shall be on the morrow. Perhaps it is just because this is so true and so obvious that it is so little regarded, so much overlooked. In entering upon another year, however, it is a consideration forced upon our minds, whether we look back upon the past, or look forward into the future; for we are conscious that much has happened to us which was utterly hidden from our view at the beginning of 1880, and we may be quite certain that much will occur as unexpectedly by us before the close of 1881. "For what is your life?" says the apostle. "It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away."

This ignorance of the future has its advantages as well as its disadvantages. It is well for us that we know not the sorrows that shall be on the morrow. Could we have foreseen all that has occurred during the past year, all the partings, the changes, the anxieties, the disappointments that may with some of us have marked its course, our hearts would have died within us. For it is ever true that anticipated evil differs from present evil in this, that we have to bear it alone; God helps us when the time of need comes; He does not help us beforehand. The traveller sees a great mountain lying in his way, and from afar off he despairs of being able to climb over it. Perhaps when he reaches it, the rocks and precipices are even steeper and more dreadful than he feared, but he finds that a way has been made by which he can climb the heights and wind through the defiles, and a guide has been provided by whose unforeseen aid the greatest obstacles are overcome in a manner he could never have anticipated. It is, therefore, well for the child of God that he knows not what shall be on the morrow, if only he knows and trusts in the Hand that leads him.

The apostle does not leave us without admonition as to how we should look forward into this vapoury and vanishing life of ours. Knowing its frailty, its uncertainty, its transitoriness, he says, "Ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that."

His will is our hope, our security, our happiness. If the Lord will, our plans shall be accomplished, and our lives shall be prolonged. And if this should not be his will concerning us, still all will be well, for his plans are infinitely above ours, and in his keeping our lives will be more than safe. "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul." If our souls can say this, and feel that by being united to Christ, and redeemed by his atoning blood, we are truly at peace with God for time and for eternity, we need not grieve for the transitory nature of earthly enjoyments, or think all is lost because all may be changed to us on the morrow. This world may pass away from us, or we from it, but the humble believer in the Lord Jesus Christ will still say, in the grand old words of the Psalmist:

"Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life:
And I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever!"

"As a Tale that is Told."

THE old year goes, its faithful record taking
Of good achieved, of evil we deplore,
Into the silence that shall know no breaking
Till time shall be no more.

E'en as the new year dawns, undimmed by sorrow,
Unstained as yet by sinful thought and deed,
We would look upward and new courage borrow,
Sufficient for our need.

God of the years! whose patient love designeth
The unknown future, unto Thee we pray;
Our life is like a shadow that declineth,
And we must pass away;

We are but strangers; there is none abiding,
And all things whisper, "This is not your rest;"
But in Thy love unchangeable confiding,
We cannot be unblest.

We thank Thee for the cloud and sunshine blended,
So wisely as our portion in the past;
The nights of weeping that have surely ended
In morning joy at last.

And when Thy providence had gently taken
From our reluctant hearts some cherished dream,
If for a little space our faith was shaken,
Even in Thy love supreme,

We bless Thee for the patience manifested,
Though we rebelled against Thy chastening rod;
For rays of light that on the darkness rested
To lead us back to God!

Now on the threshold of the year we measure
The present by the past, and fearless stand;
Leaving the future with its pain or pleasure
To Thine all-loving hand.

We would go forth, not fearing as we enter
Into the cloud whose end we may not know,
If but Thy love be shining at its centre,
To bless us as we go.

Make us, O Lord, more anxious for Thy favour
In all the work and warfare of our life;
Give us the childlike trust that shall not waver
Even in death's final strife;

Then take us home, through faith and love victorious,
To hear Thy welcome in the streets of gold;
Where the New Year is dawning, bright and glorious,
That never shall grow old!

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

JANUARY 2.

ZACHARIAS AND ELISABETH. (LUKE I. 1–14.)

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 6.—'And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.'

[MOST of our readers know that the plan of a simultaneous Sunday Bible Lesson for young people has been largely adopted in Great Britain, America, Australia, and other parts of the world. The list from year to year is prepared by a joint Committee in England and the United States, and will be found well adapted for continuous and systematic Scriptural instruction in Sunday-schools, Bible classes, and Christian homes.* Subjects from the Old and the New Testaments are taken in alternate half-years; and to every lesson a Golden Text is attached, to concentrate the teaching and to give a profitable direction to thought. A weekly portion of the SUNDAY AT HOME will be occupied by brief suggestive notes on the lessons. These notes, it is hardly necessary to add, should be studied by the teacher or leader of the class beforehand.]

I. PROLOGUE TO THE GOSPEL.—Read the first four verses. The half-year's lessons will all be taken from the Gospel by Luke, and these four verses show how it came to be written. Note: this account is from the human side. On the Divine side, the simple explanation is, God by His Spirit directed Luke to write.

Which two of the Gospels were written by Apostles? With what Apostles were the writers of the other two connected? Luke in particular? See Col. iv. 14; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 11; and especially the we in Acts xvi. 9; xx. 5, etc. Hence this might be called 'the Gospel according to St Paul.'

> Paul was the 'Apostle of the Gentiles;' the great teacher of God's free love in Christ to all mankind: and young readers, in going through Luke's Gospel, should be taught to observe how specially full it is of the same thought. This is pre-eminently the Gospel of 'goodwill toward men,' and Christ appears in it as 'a Light to lighten the Gentiles.'

To whom is the Gospel inscribed? What other book, by the same writer, is dedicated to the same person? [Theophilus: some have thought, a symbolic name, 'beloved by God'; more likely a Greek of rank; most excellent, as in Acts xxiii. 26 (xxvi. 25), a title of dignity. An old Christian writing of the second century † speaks of one Theophilus as a nobleman of Antioch, to which city Luke also probably belonged.‡] Theophilus had been trained as a Christian; verse 4, instructed, literally, catechised; he knew the truth already. Luke writes that he may fully know, ver. 4, the certainty or immovable security of the Christian faith.

Others had gone before Luke in recording the history. Who were these? Not Matthew and Mark. Luke speaks of many, whose names and works have perished: they did not write exactly false Gospels, but took down the accounts they heard in an imperfect way, and, doubtless, with many mistakes. The eye-witnesses and ministers of the word (the word of the Gospel; not here the WORD incarnate, as in St. John) were more concerned at first to speak and preach than to write.

> There was, in the earliest Apostolic preaching, no doubt an oral Gospel, a summary of Christ's life, such as we have in Peter's discourse (Acts x. 36–43). This would be taken down from the lips of the Apostles, and circulated for years before the Gospels were written. The probable date of Luke is between A.D. 60 and 65, or thirty years after the Ascension.

On what two grounds, then, does Luke claim attention? First, that he received the record directly from Christ's own immediate followers* (of whom, therefore, he was not one), and secondly, that he had accurately and completely traced out the whole history from the beginning. And how does he say he wrote? In order, i.e., certainly, the order of time. Not always so, but mainly. St. Luke's is a 'chronological Gospel.'

II. A PRIESTLY HOUSEHOLD.—Read vers. 5–7. Luke beginning, as he had said, from the very first, describes the coming of Christ's forerunner, John. First, here is a picture of a priest's family. In the days of Herod the king, mentioned to show that the sceptre had departed from Judah (Gen. xlix. 10); and that therefore the fulness of time had come. Zacharias, the same name as Zechariah, 'Jehovah remembers,' and Elisabeth, the same as Elisheba (wife of Aaron, Ex. vi. 23), 'God of the oath.' So the very names were prophetic!

> The Course of Abia, or Abijah, the eighth of the twenty-four priestly courses appointed by David (1 Chron. xxiv. 10). Only four courses returned from the Captivity (Ezra ii. 36–39); but these were re-distributed into twenty-four, keeping their original names. The number of priests in Judæa was very large, amounting to many thousands (Josephus says 20,000) living in Jerusalem, Jericho, and the priestly cities, among which Hebron in the hill country stood first (Josh. xxi. 13.) The home of Zacharias may have been at Hebron, ver. 39; though some with less probability read there the city of Juda or Juttah, Josh. xxi. 16.

Elisabeth, also, was of the priestly lineage, but the priests might marry out of their own tribe (2 Chron. xxii. 11). Note especially the character of the aged couple (the Golden Text), righteous before God, not only in the eyes of men, as the Pharisees. Walking, a common Bible term for continuous, active, progressive piety, from the days of Enoch and Noah (Gen. v. 22; vi. 9) downwards. Commandments and ordinances: moral and ceremonial laws (illustrate). The words all and blameless do not denote absolute perfection, but sincere and manifest devotedness.

But they were childless! Why was this so great a sorrow? Not only because their home had never been brightened by the presence of little ones, because their old age had no filial prop on which to lean; but because they thus appeared to lose their part in the hope of Israel, every godly matron secretly hoping that among her descendants the Messiah would be found. The hope seemed now all over, as they were well stricken, advanced, in years. They had prayed many a time for the gift, but the prayer seemed unheard!

III. GABRIEL'S MESSAGE.—Read vers. 8–14. The twenty-

* The list is published in the Young People's Pocket Book of the Religious Tract Society; also, on separate sheets, by the London Sunday School Union, and in other ways.

† The "Clementine Recognitions."

‡ Reasons for this cannot be here adduced. See Godet's Commentary on St. Luke, introd. § iii. 3. As a physician (Col. iv. 14) Luke may very likely have been a 'freedman' i.e., a slave set free. His name, Lucas, contracted from Lucanus, bears out this supposition, as the termination was an ordinary mark of freedmen. Theophilus may then have been his former master.

* Be careful to lay the emphasis rightly in ver. 2. Not 'as they delivered them unto us which were . . . . eyewitnesses,' etc.; but 'as they delivered them unto us, which were . . . eyewitnesses.'

four courses of priests served each a week in the Temple, or, rather, eight days, the turn beginning and ending with a Sabbath, so that on Sabbaths there was a double course, that which was closing and that which was commencing the week's duty. Twice a year, therefore, each division of the priesthood was called to minister. The acts of service were innumerable:* the most solemn in the daily office was the burning of incense in the Holy Place after the morning and the evening sacrifices. For this the priest was designated by lot, and only once in his lifetime could the honour devolve upon him. Picture the scene. The morning or evening sacrifice has been presented; it is a Sabbath or a feast day, as a multitude have gathered. The Court of the Priests around the great altar is filled with the ministers of the service; the Court of Israel and the Court of the Women are crowded with worshippers. Zacharias, in his white robes, barefooted, advances with his two attendants up the steps and through the great folding doors, into the Holy Place, called, ver. 9, the temple; i.e. the inner temple. One of the attendants bears the incense, the other a pan of burning coals. The aged priest advances to the incense altar that stands before the inner veil; the coals are placed upon its golden surface, the attendants withdraw, and Zacharias with the sweet perfumes in his hands is left alone, waiting the signal to sprinkle the incense in the flame. The whole multitude are praying without, prostrate on the earth, in silent supplication. It is the crowning moment in the life of Zacharias: never has he performed that service before, never can he do so again. Suddenly, he looks up and finds that he is not alone! On the right or south side of the altar—between the altar and the table of shewbread—a bright and awful form is standing; and a strange terror falls on Zacharias as he feels the presence of one from the spirit-world (compare Judges xiii. 22; Dan. x. 7-9; Ezek. i. 28; Mark xvi. 8; Rev. i. 17, Farrar). Note the angel's first words: Fear not—words which begin and which end the Gospel story; see Matt. xxviii. 5.

The promise is now given. Thy prayer, a word denoting a special object of supplication; referring to the past prayers of Zacharias and Elisabeth for a child; also, we cannot doubt, to his present prayer for Messiah's coming. It was an hour which Zacharias would choose, beyond all hours in his life, for special entreaty. John, the same with the Old Testament Jochanan, 'Jehovah is gracious.' It was the motto of the whole era rather than simply the designation of the child (Godet). Many shall rejoice, not only personally sharing the gladness of the happy parents, but eventually gaining through the ministry of John the greatest blessings. See Lesson for January 16.

Questions.

[These questions are intended, not as an exhaustive recapitulation of the Lesson, but as a help in recalling some of its more salient points, as well as to suggest some others which have been but slightly passed over.]

1. Show that all the Four Gospels are of apostolic authority. Quote passages to confirm this in the case of the Second and Third Gospels.

2. Show from Acts i. 1, in what respect St. Luke regarded the Acts as a continuation of his Gospel: one great subject being common to both.

3. Write a brief sketch of the life of St. Luke, so far as Scripture affords the material.

4. Illustrate the significance of the names, Zacharias, Elisabeth, and John, by the events of that age.

5. Of what is incense an emblem in Scripture? Support your answer from the Old Testament and the New.

6. What Old Testament parallels may be found to Gabriel's message?

THE RIGHT POINT OF VIEW.

"ELEANOR BRUCE is the happiest girl in the world, mother," said Margaret Duncan, abruptly, after a long sentence, and stopping as abruptly, with just a little sigh in her voice.

Her mother had observed all the morning the cloud on her eldest daughter's usually bright countenance.

"How is that, Margaret? What makes you think her so much happier than other girls, including yourself perhaps?" inquired Mrs. Duncan, a little anxiously. She was the widow of an officer who had died of fever three years before, on his return from India on sick leave. Mrs. Duncan was not quite without means, having a small income of her own, and of course a pension as an officer's widow. Still, she had to be careful and economical in the management of her household. She was a good and wise mother, and did her utmost to make it a cheerful home for her children.

These were five in number. Margaret, the eldest, was six years older than her only brother, Cuthbert, who came next. Margaret Duncan was fair and bonnie, pleasant to behold, without being strictly pretty; she was a dutiful, affectionate daughter, and kind elder sister, had been well educated in an excellent school, and had but lately come home for good to help her mother in many ways, and to educate her little sisters, Ethel and Violet, for the next four or five years at any rate.

Mrs. Duncan had lived in a small but well situated house on the borders of a large park in Surrey. The house had a good garden in the rear, well stocked with fruit and vegetables and not lacking in an abundance of sweet-smelling old-fashioned flowers. It was true that the furniture of the small house was rather old and worn-looking, and the carpets were faded into the faintest shades of art colouring, but both Mrs. Duncan and Margaret had a knack of brightening everything by means of many tasteful simple devices, and no prettier room than the little drawing-room in Sunnybank Cottage could be found in the whole neighbourhood. There was only one general servant, and there was a boy who came every morning to do the rough work and attend to the garden. It was a simple, methodical, quiet-enough routine, but no one of them had ever thought of calling it dull, not even Robin Duncan, when he came home for the holidays, and Margaret was alway as a sunbeam in the house, helping every one, teaching her sisters, gardening amongst her flowers, practising her music and singing, finding time for the few visits she wished to make, and had been, in homely phrase, as happy as the day was long until the last month or six weeks.

Her mother could not help observing a change in her bonnie Margaret, a fitfulness of temper, and the shadow of discontent. She traced its origin to the close intimacy of a school-fellow of Margaret's, a certain Eleanor Bruce, who had been on a visit to Sunnybank Cottage. This young woman had advanced views on the subject of woman's mission, and had tried to convince Margaret that, to live at home at ease, and do what are called home duties of the most humdrum order, duties that could be done just as well by others of less advanced views, when there was a vast field of mission work to be done in India or Africa, was absolute selfishness, was refusing to walk with the Lord, and a wilful throwing away of valuable opportunities. So she argued, and being of a very resolute will, and having a strong desire for active employment abroad, had got to look at the subject from only one point of view, and was convinced that anyone, everyone that opposed her desire to do good in her own particular way was utterly wrong, was in fact an enemy to good works.

"Why is Eleanor Bruce so particularly happy, Margie?" asked her mother once more.

"Because she is going to accomplish the desire of her heart; an answer to her prayers has come, and it is settled that she is to go out to Madras with a distant cousin of hers—a missionary—and his sister; then Eleanor means to work in the native schools, teach in the zenanas, give up her time—her life if need be—to work for God, and bring the light of truth to these poor heathen sisters. Does it not seem a beautiful life, dear mother?" said Margaret, wistfully.

"Not for her, dear child," answered Mrs. Duncan, "for I know as well as you do, that, though she has gained a reluctant consent from her father and mother, she is going to India in direct opposition to their wishes, and that she has a very distinct work at home for the present. I believe, and I hope you really do, my darling, that—

> "'The trivial round, the common task
> Will furnish all we ought to ask;
> Room to deny ourselves; a road
> To bring us daily nearer God.'"

We often quote these lines, and hear them quoted, and probably with approval. But here is a practical case, exactly in point, as we shall see.

The home of Eleanor Bruce was very different from that of Margaret Duncan. Her parents were rich, and lived in the West-end of London. As it happened, Margaret Duncan had been sent to the same school at Brighton, for three years, as Eleanor Bruce. A kind and rich relative had paid Margaret's school expenses, when her father died so unexpectedly. The girls became great friends, and Margaret's home education, which had been decidedly religious, was a novelty to Eleanor Bruce, with whom religion was in her own home a merely nominal thing, a kind of Sunday garment. Her parents were all that was kind, tender, and loving, but were not otherwise than completely worldly. A great change came over Eleanor Bruce, partly from the simple, unconscious influence for good that was all about Margaret, and partly from the teaching and preaching of the good clergyman whose church the girls attended at Brighton. She imagined herself to be a thoroughly experienced Christian, and did not take any trouble to root out self-will, or to cultivate humility and self-denial. She did wish to do good and work for God, but only in her own way, and the one thing of all others she had desired from earliest childhood was to go out to India. She read and heard much of the devoted and noble efforts made by good and experienced women in teaching and helping their poor sisters in India, and Eleanor, full of zeal to do something to prove that religion was not a dead letter in her heart, and seeing also far more than she was aware of, a means of accomplishing her desire to go to India, determined to broach the subject to her parents when she left school and returned home, as they expected, to be the pride and ornament of her luxurious home.

Eleanor was a handsome girl, full of life and energy, clever and accomplished, just the girl to win her way in a good cause, and to gain great influence over those around her. Her mother was often an invalid, and longing for Eleanor to come home and relieve her of many little duties; her father was looking forward to her as a cheerful companion, as his wife was so often laid aside for weeks together; her little sisters and big brothers were all talking of nothing else but the time when Eleanor would be at home—what they would do then! There was really abundance of work to do amongst them all; she might have been, would have been, the means employed to show the beauty and attractiveness of religion in the worldly home, but she turned away from what was so evidently before her, and at last wearied her parents out with her importunity. She prayed for light and guidance, as she told Margaret Duncan in a letter, but she really prayed to have her own will, and she left no stone unturned to gain her end.

At last, on hearing of the cousins who were going to Madras, her parents, although it nearly broke their hearts to give it, did give their consent to this unkind, undutiful scheme of their daughter's. Eleanor Bruce went to her "field of mission work"—there is no sphere worthier of a true woman's sympathies, none in which more self-denying deeds have been achieved; but she had just a little shadow of doubt on her conscience as to the right of the thing, when she remembered the simpler duties which she had deliberately neglected.

She had not been in Madras six months before she found out that she had quite mistaken her vocation. Her health did not stand the climate, the work was not suited to her eager, impetuous temperament. She did not make way with the people, nor have sufficient patience with their prejudices (as she called them), and she, do what she would, could not master Hindostanee to any purpose. Her missionary cousin very soon took a wife as a helpmate, and his sister followed his example by becoming engaged to be married. Eleanor actually seemed to be in the way, not wanted by anyone, and whilst she was thinking these thoughts, and seeing matters from quite another point of view, she received a telegram from home bidding her return at once, that she might perhaps see her father before he died.

She arrived home only just in time to see the end, and to shed bitter remorseful tears, such as should never mar the peace and yet anguish of a death-bed parting. When all was over it was discovered that the Bruces' fortune was considerably diminished from a bank failure, and it ended in Mrs. Bruce and her family coming to live in a cottage within a stone's-throw of Sunnybank Cottage. Near Mrs. Duncan and Margaret, Eleanor learned, in patience and humility, many a lesson of true religion, and in time was blessed in being the means of leading her mother to a better mind in many ways. She did her work well and faithfully, and was placidly content with her life; but for long she did not cease to lament and reproach herself, and bitterly regret leaving her parents against their direct wishes, to undertake a work she was not prepared for, and therefore failed in.

Eleanor Bruce always warns her friends not to look at anything they desire very much from only one point of view.

Isa. lv. 3, 4. Luke xv. 22. Acts xxiv. 5.

1. When the lost prodigal returned
   His father's heart with pity yearned;
   A mark of honour on his hand
   Was placed by his glad sire's command:
   That sign of dignity
   I mean our first to be.

2. When God's sure mercies were conferred,
   According to Isaiah's word,
   What David was designed to be
   Besides commander, look and see:
   This for our second take,
   For our great Captain's sake.

3. Behold, you now Paul's title find,
   According to Tertullus' mind;
   But that reproach for Jesu's sake,
   He could for greatest honour take:
   Then let him be our whole;

THE PURITAN PSALM-BOOK.

NO one can have read Longfellow's beautiful poem, "The Courtship of Miles Standish," without feeling as if he had stood himself among the Pilgrim Fathers in the light of New England's dawn. And perhaps in the whole of the poem no passage gives one this feeling more than that which represents fair young Priscilla Mullins as she sits at her wheel, and sings from Ainsworth's psalm-book while she spins. Her sweet young voice comes to us with the freshness of a May morning, and laden with the perfume of the Mayflower, as she sits there

> "Singing the hundredth Psalm, the grand old Puritan anthem, > Music that Luther sang to the sacred words of the Psalmist,
> Full of the breath of the Lord, consoling and comforting many."

We shall carry the thought of this youthful psalm-singer with us as we proceed to introduce our readers to Henry Ainsworth and his "Book of Psalmes."

The story of Henry Ainsworth will soon be told, for, unfortunately, few facts of much interest, indeed few facts at all, are known concerning his personal history. We now know that he was born at Swanton, in Norfolk, about the year 1570, and from that time until we find him in Holland he is almost lost to view. He no doubt spent much of his youth in studying his times, and shaping his course; and when still young he must have identified himself with the "Brownists," a band of Christian people who thought it their duty to withdraw from the national church, and who were persecuted (some even to the death) for this alone. A decree of banishment having been passed against the whole company, they went to Holland about 1593; and Ainsworth seems to have followed soon afterwards, for in 1596 his name appears in their records, as if by that time he was a leading man among them, young as he was. They settled in Amsterdam, and soon formed themselves into a church, of which one Francis Johnson was to be pastor, and Henry Ainsworth "doctor or teacher." The glimpse which we get of the outward life of the latter during the early Amsterdam years is very painful. We read of him "living upon ninepence a week and a few roots," while he speaks of himself and his fellow-sufferers as "consumed with deep poverty" and "laden with reproaches."

If tradition be true, he acted for some time—perhaps up to the time of his appointment to the church, possibly beyond that time—as a bookseller's porter, and some think that it was through the opportunities which he thus had that he laid the foundation of his great learning. One cannot help drawing a picture of him in those days, puzzled to know how to make ends meet; labouring to unravel the tangled web of his life; and the while, perhaps, singing to himself the 37th Psalm, in his own peculiar metre:

> "Upon Jehovah turn thy way aright:
> And trust on Him and He wil see it doon:
> And will bring forth thy justice as the light:
> And thy judgement, as the bright-shining noon."

Probably, as time wore on, his money difficulties grew less; so at least it is concluded from the fact that in 1607 he is united in marriage to Mrs. Appleby, for whom presumably he sees his way to some provision. From this time we know next to nothing of his private life; we seem to see him only as the student and teacher. His part as "teacher" must have been that of a colleague to Johnson, but we may safely infer that the expository part of the simple Amsterdam service was that which Ainsworth took specially in hand. Each Sunday, besides the regular preaching, several chapters of the Bible were read and explained, the devotional part of the service holding a too-subordinate place. And there, week after week, stood Henry Ainsworth, weak in voice, they say, but mighty in spirit, unfolding to the delighted little company the meaning of the Divine word. It is supposed that his great volumes of "Annotations," which have come down to us, took this form first; if so, happy were his people.

Soon, however, the happiness of congregational life was marred by disputes; and it is sad to think that the greater part of what we know of this little community consists of controversial history. First, there was a quarrel about Pastor Johnson's wife, ludicrous enough, yet serious in its results. The reader would laugh if he were to read the account given by Dr. Dexter, the American Congregationalist historian, of this dispute, involving such questions as whether she wore too much lace, whether her hat was "topish" or not, and so on. Next came graver differences, in which the mild Ainsworth had to deal with firm hand, and these differences were only settled when a separation had been made between himself and Johnson. One cannot think without peculiar sorrow of all this, sorrow that good men should have so differed, sorrow that the prominence of these struggles obscured the brightness of the testimony which these oppressed people would have raised for the pure religion of Jesus. Ainsworth, however, seems to have maintained his integrity through all, and, with occasional intervals, he continued his ministrations until his death in 1622 or 1623.

Meantime, his pen was not idle. Now we find him (in 1608) publishing a book with the odd title "Counterpoyson," in which he deals with the errors of the time; again he is issuing a treatise, full of deep thought, upon "Communion." At an early stage in his residence at Amsterdam also, he assisted in preparing an edition of his people's "Confession of Faith"; and probably for many years he was assiduously preparing those "Annotations," of which we have already spoken. His "Book of Psalmes," of which we are about to speak, was published by him in 1612.

A strange and unlikely story has been handed down to us by several writers, concerning the manner of his death. Having found a very valuable diamond in the street, he made known his discovery, and the precious stone was speedily claimed by the owner, who was a Jew. He asked Ainsworth how he could recompense him; and he replied that he would have no money, but that he would be glad if the man would arrange for him a conference with the local rabbis, that he might discuss with them the prophecies regarding the Messiah. He promised, but, unhappily, none of the rabbis would consent to any such arrangement; and the man, ashamed to see Ainsworth and to feel that his promise would never be carried out, determined to put the good man out of the way, by administering poison to him. This he did, and so, says the story, Ainsworth met his death. The tradition is unproved and improbable; and, since we find others saying that he died through excessive application to his Hebrew studies, our conjecture is that the story may have arisen through the attempt of some one to put the cause of his death thus figuratively, the diamond being made to represent Hebrew lore.

We pass now from Henry Ainsworth to speak of his "Book of Psalmes." A man he was, by all accounts, of a gentle and mild nature; full of love to God, to good men, and to good books; a man, too, of much concentrated force, spiritual and intellectual; who, obscure himself, yet influenced many throughout Europe, and beyond the Atlantic. Another great life lived in narrow compass whose record finds the light to remind us that the Great Husbandman gathers often his tenderest grapes from out-of-the-way nooks and corners of his vineyard.

Having tried to get some faint idea of Ainsworth, let us now look into his Psalm-Book. We have before us the same Amsterdam edition which the Pilgrim Fathers carried with them to New England. Here it is: "The Book of Psalmes; Englished both in Prose and Metre. With Annotations, opening the words and sentences, by conference with other scriptures. By H. A. (Ephe. v. 18, 19). 'Be ye filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in psalms, and hymnes, and spiritual songs: singing and making melodie in your hart to the Lord.— Imprinted at Amsterdam, by Giles Thorp, A.D. 1612." Such a Psalm-book was, we dare say, seldom seen: for it is a commentary, a music-book, a metrical version, and a Psalter proper, all in one. The prose and metre versions are printed in parallel columns, the latter in many cases with the tune at the top; and each Psalm is followed by comments, which strike us by a brevity and freedom from strained interpretation which we do not always associate with the writings of that time. The 84th Psalm, for instance, is accompanied by notes of quite remarkable suggestiveness, and here we may observe one curious reading which occurs in it. In the 5th verse, where the Authorized Version which we use has "Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee; in whose heart are the ways of them," Ainsworth reads: "O blessed is the earthly-man, whose strength is in Thee; they in whose hart, are the hye-wayes;" and this he explains by a note: "Hye-ways, or causeys [causeways]; namely, which lead to Thy house: that is, which affect hartily, long after, and delyte to goe up to Thy howse. Spiritually, these ways or paths are made by preaching of the Gospel." The translation which he gives of the 10th verse of this Psalm gives us a much finer idea of it than that suggested by "door-keeper" in our version. He has: "For better is a day in Thy courts than a thousand: I have chosen to sit-at-the-threshold, in the house of my God; rather than to remain in the tents of wickedness."

Of the prose translation generally one must speak with great respect for its quaint and beautiful English, and its evident faithfulness to the original. The metrical version, perhaps, cannot be so highly praised, for it must be confessed that it walks at times but lamely on its feet; but it is only fair to remember that a determination to be faithful to the literal meaning had much to do with this. The good man says in his preface: "Rather than I would stray from the text, I streyn now and then, with the rules of our English poësie in the just ending alike of both verses, and sometime in the quantitie of a syllable, which in a work of this sort, I trust al sincere-minded wil forgive."

The days were not yet when men contented themselves with taking the "spirit of the Psalms" and gave poetry free wing; nor will we say that even in such days Ainsworth would have been on terms of poetic equality with the two sweet singers, who have both sought thus to liberate Christian psalm-song, Henry Francis Lyte and Harriet Auber. He was no poet; he was but a man immersed in those well-springs of everlasting life, the Hebrew Psalms. And what his metrical versions lacked in grace of diction and evenness of flow, they gained in giving to the heart the meaning of those Divine words to which it was to attune its song. Here, for instance, is the Hundredth Psalm:

"Showt to Jehovah, al the earth,
Serv ye Jehovah with gladnes;
Before Him come with singing-merth,
Know that Jehovah He God is.

Its He that made us, and not wee
His sheep, and folk of His feeding,
O with confession * enter yee
His gates, His court yards with praising.

Confess to Him, bless ye His name
Because Jehovah He good is,
His mercy ever is the same:

All this is very quaint, and not always very even: "feeding" does not make pleasant rhyme with "praising," and "good is" is sadly rhymed with "ages." But we confess there is something to us in this stalwart literalness, which makes us excuse it: it carries us back to days when life was hard and stern and practical, and when the form of devotion, like that of the men who used it, must be, not slender and fine, but of strong bone and manly sinew. We doubt much whether the little company at Amsterdam, who first used these psalms, and the Pilgrim Fathers who used them afterwards, would have thanked us for our modern versions, which better express our spiritual life, as theirs was expressed better by Ainsworth. Taking for instance, the 103rd Psalm, we prefer to sing with Lyte:

* He explains that in Scripture the Hebrew word for "confession" is used for "the sacrifice of thanks."

> "Praise, my soul, the King of heaven,
> To His feet thy tribute bring;"

But John Alden and Miles Standish, and even Priscilla Mullins, we do not doubt, could find nothing better than

> "My sowl, bless thou Jehovah thankfully;
> And al my inward-parts, His holy name.
> My sowl, bless thou Jehovah thankfully;
> And His rewards, forget none of the same."

The accomplished editor of the "Lyra Americana" seems to the present writer to take a partial view of the matter when he says, "The Puritan element was intrinsically unpoetical. It was intensely polemical and practical. . . . To the Puritan, the Beautiful was recognised in none of its spiritual relations. . . . Its verses, therefore, were as rugged and forbidding as were the domestic and social polity whence they sprung." It is difficult to accept this view: lyrical beauty may have been in abeyance, but there was enough of epic grandeur at times. Was there no poetry in the souls of Cromwell's Ironsides when they prepared themselves for the battle with the 68th Psalm? and, if we turn to the American side, to which this writer chiefly refers, there seems to us poetry in every motive and every act of the Pilgrim Fathers, from the day when on the shores of Delft the saintly John Robinson knelt and prayed on the beach for a Divine blessing on his departing flock, to the day when—on the other side—they "sound the harbour, find it fit for shipping, march into the land, see diverse corn-fields and running brooks, with a place they judge fit for habitation, and return to the ship with the discovery, to their great comfort."

So, too, when they took to Ainsworth's Psalms, they found a rich poetry in them which is not in them for us. For, first of all, were they not Divine songs, so near in translation to the original that they knew them to be the very thoughts of God? Then, also, they were Henry Ainsworth's, and that was much. Most of them, perhaps, had listened amazed to his powerful expositions, and marvelled how so feeble a voice could say such heavenly things; all knew of him as one with them in their troubles, and as a brother in affliction to good Robinson of Leyden. And the book came to them in English, got from Holland, rich thus in sacred memories and holy suggestions,—its very title-page with "Amsterdam" upon it, a commentary upon the words which they no doubt often sang:

> "Jehovah's song how sing shal wee;
> Within a forreyn-people's land?
> Jerusalem, if I doo thee
> Forget: forget, let my right hand."

Doubtless the Pilgrim Fathers had sung from this book on the mighty waters by the way, to Him

> "In whose hand are the earth's deep secrecies,
> The strong heights of the mountains eke are His.
> His is the sea, for He did make the same;
> And the dry land, for that His hands did frame."

And if anything else was needed, it was found in the music, which Longfellow so well describes:

> "Rough-hewn, angular notes, like stones in the wall of a churchyard, > Darkened and overhung by the running vine of the verses."

"Tunes for the Psalms, I find none set of God," Ainsworth had said in his preface: and so he had thrown together familiar melodies, English, French, and Dutch, the "gravest and easiest." "Like stones in the wall of a churchyard" these are, for they are rich in memories of them that sleep: but stones over which the growth of the great American nation has enabled us to write, "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto Him."

HORÆ PETRINÆ.

BY THE DEAN OF CHESTER.

SECOND SERIES. I. CÆSAREA AND CORNELIUS.

IT is obvious that no course of reflections upon the life and work of St. Peter could even approach completeness, unless a prominent place were assigned in it to the transactions which took place at Cæsarea in connection with Cornelius. Concerning the great importance of that short section of the Bible which fills the tenth chapter and the greater part of the eleventh chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, no question can be raised. In any biography of St. Peter, in any history of the Church of Christ, it must have a commanding place. It is evidently meant that we should attend reverentially to every part of the narrative; and, in whatever way we look at it, we find it to be full of instruction. On two occasions previously we have taken a glance at this subject—once in regard to the remarkable emphasis which in this part of the history is given to the Apostle's surname, once in regard to the preparation made in Peter's mind during the Gospel-time for the part he was to play in this Gentile city on the Hebrew shore. Now we may revert to the subject with a still closer attention, and with the view of analysing and scrutinising the narrative, so as to judge of its truthfulness and the reality of its claims on our believing and reverential regard.

Cæsarea and Cornelius—the place and the man both arrest our attention. Both are, so to speak, grandly prophetical. Cæsarea was connected by its name with the empire of the world: its buildings were a reflection of imperial greatness: its harbour was the outlet for all trade and enterprise towards the West. The man, too, corresponds with the place. He was a Roman soldier; and among soldiers he was an officer of distinction: he was a true-born Italian, with a most illustrious and historical name. What place could more fitly be chosen for the first assertion of the universality of the Gospel? What man more suitable, even in regard to his office, to stand at the head of the whole line of Gentile Christianity? And if we pass from the office of Cornelius to his character, we find new reasons for appreciating this fitness—and of his character something must be said presently. But the thought with which we are for the moment contemplating this section of the Bible, is the consideration of those coincidences and coherences which, being undesigned, yet natural and exact, tend to give us confidence in the whole story.

What we have to deal with appears like a continuous narrative; and such, indeed, in one sense, it is. But we must separate it into parts, that we may pursue our scrutiny and see how each part supplies strength to the other parts, and gives character to the whole. We are very apt to read the eleventh chapter as if it were a repetition of the tenth; and perhaps we wonder at the repetition. Commentators pass over all this early part of the eleventh chapter, and leave their pages there almost a blank, as if in the account given by St. Peter to the "Apostles and brethren" we had merely a reiteration of what had been related in the tenth. And it is quite true that Holy Scripture has none of the formality of a work of art, but is free and unrestrained like Nature. But still, like Nature, it has riches which reward inquiry; and trouble devoted to a close examination and comparison of the diverse elements which we find in this part of the Apostolic History, is not without its reward.

In dividing the whole into its several portions, we should observe that we have—first, the direct account of the vision of Cornelius, with its effect on his own mind, and its consequence in his sending to Joppa for Peter; secondly, the direct account of the vision of Peter, the inward questionings to which it gave rise, and the startling coincidence of the arrival of the messengers from Cæsarea; next, the account of Cornelius given by these messengers to Peter; then the direct narrative of the dealing of Peter with Cornelius, after the arrival at Cæsarea; finally (and here we come to the most important element in this work of comparison), we have the apologetic account of St. Peter's own experience, both at Joppa and Cæsarea, before Apostles and brethren at Jerusalem, who had called his conduct in question in regard to this great transaction.

We have a special purpose in view: otherwise it would be natural to dwell chiefly on St. Peter's address to Cornelius, as a specimen of apostolic teaching intended for all time. But our business on this occasion is mainly with the smaller and most unobtrusive features of the narrative. It will be our best plan, probably, to take the paragraphs simply in their order, without any regard to systematic reasoning, and to see how the interest of the matter gradually grows under our hands. In any such case, on a careful examination, confidence either increases more and more or tends to become less.

"There was a certain man in Cæsarea called Cornelius, a centurion of the band called the Italian band, a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God alway." The particulars which come suddenly here to view bear with great distinctness on the various points of this man's character; and there is more in this enumeration than appears in a hasty reading. He was a "devout man": he "feared God"; and this piety was diffused over "all his house"—the domestic side of his religion is strongly marked from the first. He was charitable—he "gave alms"; he was very charitable—he gave "much alms"; and his charity, while copious as to his own heart, was not restricted as to the recipients. Though a heathen by birth and education he gave alms to the Jewish "people" (for that is the meaning of the phrase); and, above all, he was a man of prayer. And he was in the habit of prayer: "he prayed alway." Such is the starting-point of this history; and it is full of moral and religious meaning.

Then follows the account of the entrance of the heavenly visitant, and his assurance to Cornelius that his prayers and alms had gone up as a memorial before God (the prayers, it is worth while to observe, being mentioned first by the angel); and then we have the direction to send to Joppa, with a precise description of the apostle and an exact statement of the place where he is lodging. The promise relates to words that are to be spoken by Peter. It is true that the sentence in the angel's address, "He shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do" (Acts x. 6), and also the phrase "to hear words of thee" (x. 22), are not found in the best manuscripts. But there is no doubt that a communication to this effect was made by the angel to Cornelius. An equivalent expression, and a fuller and stronger expression, is found in St. Peter's own statement to the Apostles and brethren: "Call for Simon Peter, who shall tell thee words whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved" (xi. 13, 14), where we should not fail to observe that "all thy house" is a special addition here, and an addition in harmony with the preparation made for the Gospel in the family of Cornelius, as well as with the scene which is described as taking place on St. Peter's actual visit to Cæsarea. Here is one of the advantages which we gain from a minute comparison of the direct narrative in the tenth chapter with the indirect in the eleventh. The latter supplements the former very unexpectedly, yet quite easily, and without any need of ingenuity. But, to return to the direct narrative: "When the angel which spake unto Cornelius was departed, he called two of his household servants, and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually; and when he had declared all these things unto them, he sent them to Joppa." We should mark here once more, as we pass, new indications of the character of Cornelius, shown by the thorough confidence subsisting between himself and his servants, and by the description of the soldier that was most closely attached to his service. It might be asked why Cornelius did not send a letter to Peter, as Claudius Lysias did to Felix (Acts xxiii. 25). It has been suggested that probably Cornelius could not write. But it is more to the purpose to remember that he had not been in any official or personal relation with Peter, that, in fact, he knew only his name and his temporary residence. His best course was to tell the whole story to messengers thoroughly trustworthy and like-minded with himself, and to leave them to discharge their errand according to their judgment. How they did actually perform this duty we see from what follows.

The scene now suddenly changes, in the progress of this narrative, from Cæsarea to Joppa. Leaving the travellers proceeding on their afternoon journey, with the sea on the right and the sun in their face, we turn to the Apostle. We must first note, in putting together the vision of Cornelius and the trance of Peter, the coincidence of prayer in the two cases. When the messengers were coming in on the next day among the houses of Joppa, after their journey along the coast, Peter was praying: and the outward circumstance of his prayer, and his condition of body when the trance was upon him, are very minutely described (Acts x. 9, 10). He went to the "housetop" to pray: it was about the "sixth hour," about noon: he "became very hungry, and would have eaten"; and it was "while they were making ready" the food which he needed, that the trance came. All these particulars are most interesting in the narrative, and indeed important for the natural telling of the story. But it is to be observed that Peter himself does not name any of these things, the place, the time, the hunger, the making ready—nor does he say that he "came down" from the roof to meet the messengers—when he relates his experience either to Cornelius at Cæsarea, or to the Apostles at Jerusalem (x. 28, 34; xi. 5). This, too, is quite natural. The essential point for Peter to name to Cornelius was the moral conviction which had been wrought in his mind; the essential point to name to the Apostles was the communication which had been granted to him from heaven. And to them he does name one circumstantial particular very carefully. He says (xi. 5) that he was "praying" in the city of Joppa, when the Divine communication came to him. Whatever lingering doubt there might have been in the minds of the Apostles, while Peter was making his statement, they knew what their Lord had said concerning prayer and the answer to prayer. Thus in each case Peter tells his story in the proportion best fitted to produce the proper effect on his audience. All this has an air of thorough reality. Yet hardly any one will venture to say that these variations were ingeniously woven into the narrative so as to produce the impression that a story is true which is not true.

The hunger, however, the condition of body in which Peter was before the trance, though not an essential point to name, either in his sermon before Cornelius, or his defence before the Apostles, is a very essential part of the trance as related by St. Luke. The Divine revelation was precisely adapted to the physical condition of the moment. A deep and indelible impression was to be made upon him; and it was an impression having a connection with all the future relations of the Jewish race and the rest of mankind. How could this be done more effectually than by the dream or vision which he had on the housetop at Joppa, with the sea before him, over which the Gospel was to travel to the western world? He needed food; and a great abundance and variety of food were presented to him, but in such a way as to shock all the feelings of a strict and scrupulous Jew. The voice which came to him was far more wonderful than the vision; and the voice addressed him by name: "Arise, Peter, kill and eat; from among these animals select thy food, without any distinction between clean and unclean." This command was inconsistent with the whole previous tenor of his life. He had never eaten without discrimination, according to the law; and to him the distinction of food had been a type or emblem of the religious difference between the Jews and the Gentiles. The crisis came, when, after his expostulation, the second voice reached him, reminding him of words spoken by Christ during the Gospel-time: "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." And, not to repeat what was said in a previous essay concerning this early preparation for what was now occurring, we see what good reason there was for describing the trance at length, and quoting the words he had heard in it, when he defended his conduct before the Apostles. Not only was he virtually recording his own reminiscence of the Gospel-time, but he was also appealing to a reminiscence of their own; for they too had heard the Saviour's words; and this was perhaps one reason why their conviction was so rapidly and so decisively formed.

But, to revert to the orderly sequence of events in the history, "when Peter doubted in himself what this vision which he had seen should mean, behold, the men which were sent by Cornelius had made inquiry for Simon's house, and stood before the gate, and called, and asked whether Simon, which was surnamed Peter, were lodged there. While Peter thought on the vision, the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee: arise, therefore, and get thee down, and go with them; for I have sent them" (x. 19, 20). This seeking for the house, this standing before the gate, this calling and asking whether Peter were lodged there, all belong to the outer framework of the narrative, and make it more animated and real. But they are of no moment on the grave occasion afterwards when Peter is called to justify himself before his brother Apostles. Moreover, they are all outside of his own experience. Accordingly they find no place in the statement at Jerusalem.

But, on the other side (and it is of high importance that this should be noted), two other particulars are of the utmost value during this interview at Jerusalem, as arguments which will tell upon the minds of the other Apostles, as they had told upon Peter's. There was the startling coincidence of the arrival of the messengers just when he was thinking in perplexity of the meaning of the vision, and still more the inward voice of the Spirit, which interpreted the coincidence, and gave him the command. These two particulars, therefore, are stated in the eleventh chapter in the most pointed manner. "This was done three times," says St. Peter at Jerusalem of his experience at Joppa: "and all were drawn up again into heaven. And, behold, immediately there were three men already come unto the house where I was, sent from Cæsarea unto me. And the Spirit bade me go with them, nothing doubting." The Apostles were hearty believers in the doctrine of special providence, and their Master's solemn instruction regarding the Holy Ghost was fresh and strong in their memory.

Hitherto we have been following the direct narrative in its two great parts, which are the basis of the whole. With the arrival of the messengers we begin to get a reflex light, as it were, upon the facts of the case. Peter does not speak to them of his vision—that is between himself and God, and he has still much to learn. His mind is only gradually opening to the great truth which lies before him. Moreover, these three messengers are not Jews. But they, on their part, communicate something to Peter concerning Cornelius, which we should not fail to notice. It is interesting to see how they describe the man who has already been described in the direct narrative. They add something to what we knew before. Moreover, we must remember that they had an errand to discharge, and that their business was to persuade Peter, if possible, to go to Cæsarea. Their message is given thus: "Cornelius, a centurion, a just man, and one that feareth God, and of good report among all the nation of the Jews, was warned from God by a holy angel to send for thee to his house, and to hear words of thee." Cornelius is described as a just man, as one that feared God, and as being highly and generally respected and honoured by the Jews. This, as I have said, adds something to what we knew before, and especially calls attention to the fact that Cornelius both possessed and deserved the esteem of the Jews. All this was conciliatory, persuasive, and judicious. It should be observed, too, these men being Gentiles, that they speak respectfully of the nation of the Jews, and name the angel in such a way as not to shock any feelings of Jewish reverence. All this strikes us as extremely natural. These men have a point to gain, and they speak as trustworthy men would speak under such circumstances, and yet quite artlessly and with simplicity.

It was of high importance that for such an occasion Peter should take witnesses and companions In the tenth chapter (x. 23) we are merely told that "certain brethren from Joppa accompanied him." But unless we had the indirect narrative in the next chapter (xi. 12) we should not have known that there were six, and that thus ten now journeyed together—seven Jews, three Gentiles—along the coast to the north. Nor should we have otherwise known that these six men went afterwards with Peter as witnesses to Jerusalem—a most important fact, and one which comes to view unexpectedly and yet evidently without premeditation or contrivance on the part of the writer of the Acts.

The same kind of analysis might be continued, with similar results, in regard to the meeting of Peter with Cornelius, and the occurrences which took place at Cæsarea. But we may limit ourselves simply to the climax of this occasion, taken in connection with the reference to it made afterwards at Jerusalem. The sudden descent of the Holy Ghost at the close of St. Peter's discourse, or rather on the Divine interruption and sanction of that discourse (x. 44), is a point on which the utmost stress is to be laid: "While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the Word: and they of the circumcision were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost"; and the question was at once asked by Peter, "Can any man forbid baptism to those who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" In Peter's mind, as we see afterwards, from what he said to the other Apostles, this miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost presented itself as a reminiscence of Pentecost: "As I began to speak to them, the Holy Ghost fell on them, as on us at the beginning" (xi. 15). And more than this: it brought back to his recollection words spoken long before by Christ Himself: "Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that He said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. Forasmuch then as God gave unto them the like gift as He did unto us, who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, what was I, that I could withstand God?" (xi. 16) No argument could be more persuasive to his brother Apostles; for they too had been witnesses of the miracle of Pentecost, they too had heard "the word of the Lord Jesus."

It is well worth while to observe that these thoughts, which came into the Apostle's mind and brought him to a strong conviction, are not named in St. Luke's direct narrative, which deals with outward particulars, but come to view only in the indirect apologetic account given by St. Peter himself, when he relates the process which had brought him to a strong conviction. All this again is perfectly natural. And now two more particulars may be added out of several which might be adduced, all tending in the direction of the same argument. Though, as we have seen, Peter, in addressing the Apostles, omits the preliminary circumstances of the trance at Joppa and hastens to the trance itself, he adds certain touches which we do not find in the direct narrative; for he says, that when the sheet descended, "it came even to him," and that he "fastened his eyes upon it and considered." This is the natural language of one who tells what has laid strong hold on him, and has fixed itself minutely in his memory. And, finally, let us mark that, in persuading reluctant Jews on this occasion, he gives no detailed account of Cornelius, and pronounces no panegyric upon him. Cornelius is simply "the man." He does not speak with any respect of his office, or any praise of his character. We can see how well chosen was the office of "the man," as well as his character. But the fact that he was a centurion had no particular charm for them. They heeded not that he belonged to the Italian cohort. The military terms of the Romans were probably viewed by them with repugnance, for they might yet have some lingering hope of "the restoration of the kingdom to Israel." And as to the character of Cornelius, which weighs so much with us, it would not at first sight be persuasive to them. They were not predisposed to regard very favourably any goodness not found among the Jews. They might even have been inclined to suspect any appearance of goodness among "sinners of the Gentiles."

If our subject had been the evidential value of the Acts of the Apostles in general, it might have been proper to have pursued this line of analysis more fully. Our present inquiry is restricted to the life and work of St. Peter. But part of the plan before us is to trace this narrower subject evidentially; and it is important to mark carefully how much reliance we are justified in placing on the literal truthfulness of that history of Cornelius, to which the Apostle referred afterwards (Acts xv. 7): "Ye know how that a good while ago God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the Gospel, and believe."

A Winter Day.

YE who have marked perchance
The placid beauty of some winter day,
Watching the snow-flakes dance
Upon the leaden air, while far away,
Like a great jewel wrought
Of ruddy fire, down dropped the dying sun,
And nature's silence brought
A sense of utter peace but seldom won:
Say, is it hard to trace
In the fair scene a likeness well expressed
To the sweet Christian grace
Of Resignation? Perfectly possessed,
We find her ever clad
In snowy robe of meekness—wide its scope—
And lest she be too sad,
A ray from heaven gilds her brow with hope.

MRS. JOHN BOND'S TROUBLES.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. BOND found Sammy's shop nearly full; she took her seat at the back, and very soon "the new curate" arrived.

At first she felt a little dull; in spite of her resolution in coming she had an uncomfortable feeling of John's unfriendly disposition towards her in consequence of it; and it was not so pleasant a place to her as church. She did not want to look at her neighbours who were seated around her, and she had no dear little ones in a gallery to gaze up at! Suddenly, however, she was brought to remember the purpose that had brought her there. Mr. Shepherd made no long address. After a few words of introduction, he preached the gospel plainly and powerfully.

She listened as she had never listened before; her heart opened to the wonderful fact that she had a Saviour; that the Lord Jesus Christ had not only taken her child, but that He had died for her. Something of this blessed fact had shone in on her before, while she was rejoicing in his love to her Susy; but now "the wonderful fact" confronted her in all its glory—Jesus died on the cross for her!

Full of strong emotion she left the meeting, speaking to no one. When she opened the shop door, the bell of course tinkled; she went in to John; he was asleep on the settle.

He asked no question, nor did she make any remark. She concluded he had eaten his supper and smoked his pipe, for he took his candle and walked upstairs to bed.

"He's taken it hard, my going," she said to herself. "But he's got no right to do that; may be he'll be better to-morrow; he do turn cross sometimes; I must 'bide it a bit."

But John did not get better; neither the next day nor for many days after. She went on as usual, working from morning till night; doing, as she had always been wont, all in her power to make him comfortable; but beyond necessary talk on business matters, he maintained a dogged silence, and although it was rather trying to bear, even to her imperturbable temper, she did bear it, always hoping "he would come to in time."

Every week she went to the lecture, and every lecture evening widened, it seemed, the breach between them; but she would not give it up. She argued the matter over with herself often, but could see no reason why she should do it. She was, if possible, more diligent and hard-working than ever; she left nothing undone in order that she might go. It had, she felt, been a blessing to her, and much as she loved peace—more now than ever—she would rather live with John's frown than his smile if the question of her going to learn the gospel depended on it. "Wish as he'd go; sure he'd be different—sure he would!" she would often say to herself when meditating on his churlish behaviour.

Autumn glided into winter; a hard winter it was, and all garden produce became very dear. Work, too, was scarce; many men went past the street bearing long poles with withered green-stuff tied on the top, crying, "Please to pity the poor froze-out starved gardeners!" Still Mr. Shepherd kept up his lecture, which was well attended, Mrs. Bond always being one of the number.

Her brass spectacles struck him. He saw she was the woman that he had noticed in church; but he never spoke to her; indeed, he had no opportunity, for she always sat by the door, ready to slip out the moment the lecture was over.

Creeke and her husband were no longer on the same friendly terms that had existed between them. Bond was offended with his neighbour for giving into "such ways," "making the women idle, and doing a lot of mischief." This was a trouble to her, for "The Silver Fish" and John's visits to it had enabled her to have a little freedom for following her own devices; whatever those once were, now she spent every moment she could get in reading her Bible.

Mr. Shepherd had lately been speaking to his hearers on the life of the Lord, and trying to show them how that life set forth, in type, the life of his disciples. In dwelling on the temptation, he told them, what strongly moved her, that all the Lord's people must be led into the wilderness, as He was, and tempted, as He was. "But you see," he said, "as He was led up by the Spirit, they are also led by the Spirit, and as He overcame the devil for us, his children through Him, by his Spirit, overcome the devil too. And remember for your comfort, that when the time of temptation is past, as the devil left your Lord and fled, so He will leave you and fly, and as they came and ministered to the blessed Jesus, so angels will come and minister unto you. Oh, believe it! there is no comfort equal to that which Christians enjoy when they have patiently suffered and boldly borne witness to the truth of God's word, and resisted the devil till they have beaten him back, as the blessed Son of Man did in the days of his flesh. This comfort is worth working for, worth waiting for; it is a foretaste of heaven."

Poor Mrs. Bond! (we say "poor" in love, not pity), she wept tears of delight as he spoke. Yes, "the wooden woman," the woman without a blink of imagination, was filled with thankful joy, for she put the case to herself thus: "Sure, I've been in the wilderness all this time as John Bond have been so angry with me, wanting me to give up coming. Yes, and so far as I can see, I'm 'in the wilderness' now, and may be there ever so long. Never mind; I'll wait till it's over, I'll be helped to do that, sure*ly*, and then the angels 'll come."

The thought of the angels was reflected on her face as she lifted the latch of the door, and no one that saw her then would have called her the "wooden woman."

The house was quite dark, and John must have put the fire out and gone to bed. It was a very cold night, a sharp frost had reigned for some time; but now snow had set in, and even in only crossing the street she had got covered with it.

That was before the day of lucifer matches, a flint and steel must be used then to light the tinder; but her hand was practised in all such arts, and she soon lit her candle. She could have kindled a fire, but John had used all the coal in the hod, and, as it seemed, burned all the shavings, for she could find none. "He'd a mind to have a good warm," she said to herself; and she thought for a moment that to leave her without a bit of fuel to light a fire in the morning was not "friendly like." "But there," she said, "it's what I must take patient, being as it's 'wilderness' I'm in. And sure I wouldn't but bear all as I'm put to bear, no, not to be rich and comfortable like Mrs. Robins of the 'Golden Lion.'"

So trying to forget John's "unfriendliness," she took her lantern into the little yard, with the coal-hod and shaving-basket, almost blinded by the snow, and shaking with the cold.

It struck her that perhaps she had better take a bit of bread and cheese, and go straight to bed, as kindling a fire would consume time, and John might be grumbling at her already for keeping him awake. So, taking her supper in her hand, she went upstairs.

She had not got into the "chamber," as they called it, when a groan struck her ear. Going with her lantern to the bedside, she was surprised to find her husband lying outside the bed, in his clothes, and apparently in great pain.

"Thought you'd never come!" he cried in no pleasant tone.

"What is it, John?" she answered, wholly taken up with the conviction of his being in suffering.

"I slipped down and hurt my leg very bad," he said.

She might have said, "You didn't slip in getting coal and shavings for the morning?" but she merely went close to him to examine the hurt, and see how she could relieve him.

Pain cures pride for the time being. John allowed her to examine the leg, which she did with much tenderness and care.

"It's a bad place, Bond," she said, shaking her head; "I think I'd best fetch the doctor; legs is such sorry things to meddle with."

But he would not hear of a doctor, "she might do anything that she'd a mind to do to it," and that was all he would allow.

So she went down and lit the fire, and made a poultice; and finding he had gone to bed without any supper, she soon got him a cup of tea to warm him, for he was very cold; and when he had got into bed and felt the comfort of her work, he became a little softened, and told her something of "how it happened."

But the next morning it was so bad that she went over to Sammy Creeke to ask his advice about fetching the doctor. Sammy had had a "turn-up" with John the day before, and was afraid to interfere; but at her earnest entreaty he went across to see him.

His advice was to send for the doctor at once.

"It's a bad case, I'm afraid, John; and the sooner it's cured the better. Legs should never be trifled with."

John grumbled out something about "expense;" but Sammy assured him that Doctor Spencer was very feeling, and cheap in his charge to all poor people. So after a little demurring, Doctor Spencer was summoned and came, and very grave he looked, saying he hoped he might be able to save the leg. "But you are not a very good subject, Bond; and I can assure you appearances are not favourable," he added, for he could see that the patient must be plainly dealt with, if a cure was to be effected.

Throughout that long dreary winter, John was obliged to lie on his bed; his patient "wooden wife" waiting on him with as much assiduity as if he repaid her with thanks and smiles, instead of groans, complaints, and reproaches.

Often he told her that if she had been at home that night it would not have happened, for he should not have gone into the yard only to get more shavings because he had let the fire go low. "Ah!" she thought, "that night! that was the night I heard about the wilderness; good night that!" And indeed the remembrance of its teaching never deserted her; many a time, as she sat at her work watching John, she wondered if he was in the wilderness. "He's in trouble enough, sure," she thought; but then came the thought, Mr. Shepherd had said, "They who are the Lord's people, are led up into the wilderness, as He was, by the Spirit." She doubted if John knew anything about the Spirit. She was perplexed; she wished she could ask him; but she dared not even allude to the subject.

That night had indeed been one of the most important value to her, for she had not been able to go to another meeting, John positively refusing to be left alone till he could move about and help himself.

Spring came, and with it a great improvement in his condition; but with it also—the doctor's bill.

If it had been but a shilling, John could have "made a trouble of it." As it was, though the bill was very moderate, he was downright angry, and so foolish as to wish he had never seen a doctor. "It was your doings," he said to his wife, "I shouldn't have had him if you hadn't teased so about it!" With deep grief he opened his box, "It's all going out now," he said, "and little or nothing coming in;" and truly, the shop's custom had fallen off of late, for Mrs. Bond had been so harassed by his peevish state, and so worn by broken rest and hard work, that things had not prospered; and the new shop which, in spite of reports to the contrary, had opened three doors lower down the road, was doing a fine stroke of business and took away many of their customers.

Mrs. Bond knew all this; but she looked cheerful, she did not contradict John when he said, "things had taken a bad turn with them, and it would end in their having to give up the shop, he could see that!" She could see that things had taken a bad turn, but where that "turn" might land them, she could not see—and she did not want to see. When things were at the gloomiest she resolutely set her face as a flint to it, and looked with a confidence which she could not have explained, for the end of "wilderness trouble" and the ministering angels to come. John sometimes could not help wondering at her serenity, but he put it down to her being so "unsensible and dull;" she could work when things were put straight before her, but now she was "done!"

We cannot follow the old shop in its decline, and the new one in its prosperity; things got worse and worse with John and his wife, and by degrees his money-box grew nearly empty, and his power to refill it was gone. It was not his way to confess himself wrong in judgment, not even to himself would he own it, but a misgiving occasionally rose in his mind, that Sammy Creeke had been wise in safely investing his money, though he had so often triumphed over him and his foolish venturesomeness. If he had done so with his, it might have been better for him, but Sammy might still lose all, banks were continually breaking!

Creeke tried to comfort him and cheer him up; but the unpleasant conviction that he had possibly been wiser than himself, made John dislike his company; besides, he had not forgiven him for allowing the meeting at his shop, by which means he had helped his wife to a course which he absurdly looked on as the origin of all their troubles.

Finding himself unwelcome, Sammy thought it best to give up his visits; but he did all he could to help Mrs. Bond, for whom he felt a hearty sympathy and brotherly friendship.

The crisis came at length. Another summer, spring, autumn and winter, and the matter was decided. The shop must be given up; they tried to part with the business, but Mrs. Bond told the honest truth to all who came to see about it; it had been going down ever since the new one had started, and the landlord, who wanted to raise the rent and let the shop to a more enterprising tradesman, would do no repairs nor help them in any way. So every treaty fell through, and it was settled they should quit at Christmas.

GOOD NEWS AT LAST.

CHAPTER IV.

Everybody was sorry for this sad wind up of the poor Bonds. Truly "the wooden woman" had been "led into the wilderness to prove her, and to show her what was in her heart." The neighbours agreed that she had changed wonderfully of late. "She showed herself so feeling; and certainly her patience with John Bond was something past believing."

Yes, it was true; she had learnt much of which she spoke little, except in broken prayer to her Lord to whose guidance she was daily more thankful to submit herself, and whose constant grace and mercy often turned her prayer into praise.

Neighbour Creeke's sympathy showed itself practically. Whenever he could get opportunity, he used to tell her the substance of Mr. Shepherd's lectures on "The Temptation." And how she listened to him on one of these opportunities!

"He told us," said Sammy, "how that the words 'man should not live by bread alone, but by every word of God,' meant for us that we should not look for our portion here, nor care the most for being comfortable and prosperous, and that sort of thing; but that we should look up to Him for faith to believe his promises, and patience to wait for the good things to come; and that then the devil, who is trying all he can to make us angry with our troubles, will be forced to fly."

"Yes," said she, with a joyful smile, "and then the angels will come. I mind all that, Sammy, I do."

"I believe you do!" he cried grasping her hand, "and I was telling Mr. Shepherd how comforted you had been in your dark days by the little you had heard from him, and he seemed so pleased."

"I never spoke to him," she said with innocent surprise.

"No, but he knows you, for all that you were always out at the door afore he could get a chance to speak to you; but when I told him about you, he said in a minute, 'What, her with the great brass spectacles?' So, you see, he had got his eye on you, as he has on everybody he is preaching to; he is a good man, is Mr. Shepherd!"

Mrs. Bond was not likely to dispute this, and Sammy went on to say, "I was thinking he might do something to help you, so I told him about your troubles, and he heard me straight out, and said, 'I'll see, Creeke, I'll see.'"

"He has not said anything concerning it since; but I'll mention it again in a little time; he's got many ways of helping; he's very friendly with Madam Penton, who is as free and willing to do good as she is able to do it."

Mrs. Bond felt it to be very kind of her neighbour, but she had not much expectation, if any, of help from the source he spoke of. She was very literal, as we have said, and her faith was so simple, that she could not be diverted by any hopes of aid from "the creature," from looking for a straight-down deliverance from the Creator. She was content to remain in the wilderness during his will, firmly resting on "the word" by which she was told to live. "May be there's more and worse trouble for us yet," she said, when checking a rising of complaint; "Never mind, 'I will never leave thee!' that's the word. I never minded to seek Him while I was pretty easy and comfortable, and I don't believe I ever should have minded to do it, if He hadn't put trouble upon me. Yes, I was out of heart and broken down when He took Lucy from me; that was the beginning of 'wilderness' to me; but I see now, it was his good spirit as led me there, yes, and the thing comes plainer and plainer as the trouble comes thicker."

It was such a night. The cold wind was driving the snow into blinding wreaths, and it was almost dangerous to tread the glassy pavements which the naughty little boys had polished so dexterously by making slides on them; they were like looking-glasses.

"Shall I go, John, and see if that room is to be had?" said Mrs. Bond, who had been hard at work all day packing their goods, which were ranged round the shop and room in forlorn state, ready for departure.

"It's a bad night," said John; "but I can't go. So I 'spose you'll have to."

"Don't mind the night," she said, though her teeth were chattering with the cold.

"Best take the lantern," said John, who could not help feeling how cheerfully she did and suffered everything.

So she took the lantern and walked cautiously round the corner towards the lodging of which she had spoken. A poor place it was, but "the box" was all but empty, and they could not afford a better home till she had got into some sort of work which would add to their means. John's leg was still so weak and untrustworthy that there was little hope of his being able to work at anything again; indeed, his health altogether had for some time been failing, partly through the confinement to which he had been obliged to submit, his stout, robust frame requiring regular exercise, and partly from the fret he had undergone from the failure of his affairs.

She had just turned the corner when she met her friend Sammy Creeke.

"Oh, good!" he cried. "The very woman! Come with me to 'The Fish.' I've got good news for you."

The wind was too boisterous to allow of any more talking, so, stepping carefully on, they went into "The Silver Fish."

When they were in and the door was shut, Sammy pointed to the sign, which at night always hung inside, and said,

"It was a good for many when Mr. Shepherd rattled his cane on yon fish, and said he wanted to 'come afishing' in my house; now," he continued. "Here's a bit of news for you. You know what I told you about Madam Penton being able to help you through Mr. Shepherd?"

She nodded assent.

"Well, the job's done; you've got the empty almshouse. One of the Penton almshouses, of course you know all about 'em: house and garden rent free for life, and seven and sixpence a week, and a chaldron of coals at Christmas."

Mrs. Bond could not speak; her surprise and thankfulness were too much for her, but she looked unutterable things.

"Aye; it's very nice—very pleasant, isn't it?" said Creeke, his face twinkling all over with delight. "I wouldn't say a word to you about it till I was sure; but as soon as I heard old Cross and his wife were out (their son has taken to them now he can afford it), I went to our good friend Mr. Shepherd and told him as I hoped this might be your time for coming out of the wilderness, and he put on his hat then and there and walked off straight to Madam Penton. He did not get an answer then; but a promise as 'inquiries should be made.' But this afternoon he sent for me, and he was as pleased as if it had been for one belonging to him, I do believe. 'Creeke,' he said, 'go to your friend in the brass spectacles and tell her she and her husband may move into the house as soon as they please; the inquiries have been answered very satisfactorily; all the neighbours give the man a good name for respectability, and they can't say too much in praise of the poor woman!'"

Mrs. Bond, undemonstrative, wooden Mrs. Bond, fell on her knees and looked straight up to the ceiling.

"Aye, mother," said Creeke, much affected, "you are right; give the glory where it is due." And kneeling by her side, he offered up an earnest, hearty thanksgiving, to which she sobbed an "Amen."

"Out of the wilderness!" he said, smiling as he helped her to rise, for she was stiff with cold, and wearing and strong emotion.

"Yes, Sammy," she said, when she could speak, "and you and Mr. Shepherd and Madam Penton are the angels! I see it all."

The almshouses were close to the church; they had been built by the husband of the widow who had now acted as one of the angels to minister to Mrs. Bond. Her lot seemed perfect; her cup was running over; thankful to be out of the wilderness, she was still more grateful that she had been led into it.

"Ah," she thought one day, while listening to Mr. Shepherd's sermon on "the rest that remaineth," "I should never have known about 'that rest' if I had not been 'in the wilderness.'"

THE SONG OF MARY. (LUKE I. 46-55.)

GOLDEN TEXT, VERS. 46, 47.—'And Mary said, My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour.'

CONNECTION WITH PREVIOUS LESSON.—We left the aged priest in the Temple, listening to the angel's words. Did he believe them? How was his want of faith punished? Picture him coming forth, after long delay, and stretching out his hand to pronounce the great Benediction,* but standing dumbly there before the multitude! Then, day by day, till the solemn week of his silent service ended, they were reminded of what had happened, and we may be sure that those who looked for redemption in Jerusalem 'spake often one to another' of their growing hopes.† How long did the ministry of Zacharias continue? Where was the home to which he returned? Imagine the wonder of Elisabeth as her husband, still speechless, would write down for her the account of what had happened—her joy at the tidings, her sorrow at his affliction! Months passed away; the time had almost come for the fulfilment of the promise; when to the hill country a VISITOR came, a village maiden from the north, a young relative of Elisabeth's. The visitor's name? Her home? What wonderful announcement had been made to her, and by whom? Full of the news, she came to her aged kinswoman, and Elisabeth greeted her at once as 'Mother of her Lord,' saying, Blessed is she that believed! For Mary had not doubted, like Zacharias. Meekly had she received the word of Gabriel (ver. 38). So while the doubting priest was stricken into silence the believing maiden burst forth into a song. The song, like that of Zacharias afterwards, ver. 67, was inspired by the Holy Ghost; while in its echo of Old Testament Psalm and Hymn it shows what thoughts and studies had filled the Virgin's mind since Gabriel came. Mary's hymn is one which we love to sing to this day. Let us consider it in three parts: the celebration of God's goodness to Mary herself; to all the meek and lowly; and in particular to Israel.

> Those who use this hymn in the daily service of the Church of England will notice a few differences between the Prayer-book and the Bible versions. The former, as in the Psalter, employs an older translation than that 'revised version' of 1611 which is the 'Authorised Version' now in use.

I. GOD'S GOODNESS TO MARY.—Read vers. 46-49. Every word in the Golden Text is full of meaning. My soul . . . my spirit—not quite the same (see 1 Thess. v. 23). The soul feels and loves, the spirit knows God and is like Him. Both together make up what David meant by 'all that is within me,' Psa. ciii. 1. So, mark the difference between magnify and rejoice. The former denotes adoration—ascribing greatness to God Himself; the latter gratitude, thankful gladness in what God is to us. So in David's song just quoted. We 'magnify' God when we 'bless His holy Name,' we 'rejoice in' Him when we 'forget not all His benefits.' Both are parts of the one tribute of praise. Note that the Latin word for 'doth magnify' is MAGNIFICAT, which word, standing first in the Latin version, gives the title to Mary's hymn. It has been used in the services of the churches for more than thirteen hundred years.* God my Saviour; not here the promised Divine Child, but God the Father, the 'God of salvation,' Psa. lxviii. 20; see also Isa. xlv. 21; 1 Tim. ii. 3; Titus iii. 4. Observe: Mary needed a Saviour, like the rest of us—she was not, therefore, sinless, as some teach.

The wonder to Mary is that she should be so honoured; being a maiden of low estate, or condition. This, God hath regarded, or looked upon, i.e., in kindness (comp. ch. ix. 38, 'look upon my son,' with Matt. xvii. 15: 'have mercy on my son'). In contrast with this lowliness would be the honour done to her memory through all generations. Not the mistaken honour and false reverence which so many pay to her name. This would have shocked her utterly. She is blessed, as all the meek are blessed (see Matt. v. 5) only with a special honour as mother of the Lord; but see the yea, rather, in ch. xi. 28. Even she was more blessed in keeping the word of God than in being mother to Jesus. 'Blessed is she that believed,' ver. 45.

See in ver. 49, how Mary's sense of the favour done to her again lifts her up to the contemplation of God Himself. Holy is His Name (Psa. cxi. 9). The great things that He has done should already remind us how great and glorious HE IS.

II. GOD'S GOODNESS TO THE MEEK AND LOWLY.—Read vers. 50-53. Mary passes now from the thought of self to that of God's mercy to all who fear Him. In the words from generation to generation the Virgin brings up the thought of the past, when in successive ages the meek and lowly were exalted; the proud and mighty cast down. The arm of God means His power (Psa. lxxxix. 13; Isa. liii. 1). Strength is that power put forth. The history of God's people, that Mary knew so well, is full of illustrations. The proud and mighty, like Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, had been put down from their seats, or thrones; the chosen nation, though despised and oppressed, had been delivered from captivity, while in many cases those of low degree had been exalted, as Joseph from the prison, David from the sheepfold. See Psa. cxiii. 6-8; Psa. lxxviii. 70-71. But the Virgin's words were not only of the past. In her own day the Sadducees were rich, the Pharisees were proud; yet more, the power of the Herods was great: that of the Roman Empire seemed overwhelming; yet they all vanished in their turn, and the meek and lowly One set up His everlasting kingdom! The reference to the rich sent empty away, and the hungry filled is of the deepest spiritual application (Isa. lxv. 13, 14; Matt. v. 6). To those who hunger for truth and goodness the blessing is given; those rich in self-esteem (like the Pharisees and Scribes) lose all!

> 'Happy they who in this world experience the sentence of the Magnificat; in whom pride and self-reliance is put down from its seat, and spiritual hunger is rewarded; who discover ere it is too late that, in Scripture language, they are poor and blind and naked; and who take the Divine counsel to buy raiment and fine gold and eyesalve from the Son of Man' (Rev. iii. 18).†

III. GOD'S GOODNESS TO ISRAEL.—Read vers. 54-56. Observe the order of thought in the hymn. Mary passes from herself to the meek and lowly in general, and then to the whole Israel of God; God's Servant, in a peculiar sense, Isa. xliv. 1, 2; for whom God had always wrought deliverance, and to whom now the greatest gift of all was sent. Holpen, an old English form for helped: the word in the original is very expressive, took by the hand. The words to Abraham (ver. 55) are to be connected with the word mercy (ver. 54); 'in remembrance of His mercy (as He spake to our fathers) to Abraham, and to his seed for ever' (Gen. xvii. 19; Psa. cxxxii. 11).

It was to the literal Israel that Jesus first came, to the Jews dwelling in Palestine. But the true Israel, the inheritors of the highest promises, the children of Abraham, the Servant of God, is the Church of Christ (Gal. iii. 7, 16, 28, 29). So the words for ever reach their largest fulfilment.

QUESTIONS.

1. Trace out the similarities between the Magnificat and the Song of Hannah in 1 Sam. ii. 1–10. Cite also illustrative passages from the Psalms.
2. To what events in Jewish history does the Virgin especially allude?
3. Which of the Beatitudes in the Sermon on the Mount are anticipated in the Virgin's Song.
4. Adduce proofs that Mary, like Joseph, was of the house of David. What incidents in her history show her to have been of lowly condition?
5. Give some simple and Scriptural reasons against the Mariolatry of the Church of Rome.

THE PROPHECY OF ZACHARIAS. (LUKE I. 67–80.)

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 78.—'Through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us.'

CONNECTION WITH PRECEDING LESSON.—How long did the visit of Mary to Elisabeth last? She seems to have returned home just before the birth of John. What long and wonderful talks there must have been between the gentle maiden and her aged relative, about their own hopes, and the hope of Israel! And now the child of promise is born. A great and joyful company assemble in honour of the event. What is his name to be? Zacharias, of course! the friends and kinsfolk say. The mother knows better, but her opinion is set aside.* Let the appeal be made to the silent father standing by. They made signs to him—showing that he was deaf as well as dumb. Observe what he wrote: not His name ought to be or shall be; it is John. This is already settled by the angel's word! Then his dumbness is suddenly gone, and he breaks into a song of praise. 'He could not but sing, as his fathers had sung in every great crisis of their history.' 'The song which had been composed in the priest's mind during the time of his silence broke solemnly from his lips the moment speech was restored to him, as melted metal from its crucible.' And this song, the BENEDICTUS, as it is called, may well be placed side by side with the MAGNIFICAT, which we considered last Sunday. Zacharias speaks of a Mighty Saviour, the Promised Saviour, and of the Saviour's great Forerunner.

I. THE MIGHTY SAVIOUR.—Read vers. 67–69. It is probable that this song was uttered at the time of John's circumcision, in the hearing of the whole company: like Mary's hymn, it was inspired by the Holy Ghost. The word prophesied may be taken in its widest sense. It means both fore-telling and forth-telling, and denotes inspired utterances generally, with or without the prediction of future events. The great subject of this song is Prophecy accomplished. See how the father's own joy is placed second to his joy in God's salvation. The first thought of Zacharias is not of his own family but of Israel: his song begins not with John but with the coming JESUS. How does he speak of the blessing? Note the words visited . . . redeemed (or 'wrought a ransom,' as Titus ii. 14). Here are the two great Christian doctrines: Incarnation and Redemption. The horn is the emblem of might (as the horns of a bull or stag), a natural figure among an agricultural people. See 1 Sam. ii. 10; Psa. xviii. 2, and especially Psa. cxxxii. 17, which passage seems to have been in the speaker's thoughts. 'Horn of Salvation' therefore means a mighty Saviour. In the house of His servant David; a plain reference to Mary, whose visit to Elisabeth had just concluded.

In ver. 27, the words 'of the house of David' might grammatically refer either to 'the Virgin' or to Joseph. The former is probably the case, and the verse should read: 'To a virgin (espoused to a man whose name was Joseph) of the house of David.'

II. THE PROMISED SAVIOUR.—Read vers. 70–75. Zacharias shows that he had grasped the meaning of the Old Testament. Where is it written that the 'testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy?' His holy prophets. See Luke xxiv. 44 (Matt. xi. 14). All ancient Scripture was in a sense prophetic—it all looked forward to Him who was to come. And this was from the very first: since the world began. There were prophets before the days of a written revelation. When, and to whom, was the first prophecy of a Redeemer given? Who were prophets before Moses? (See Jude 14; Gen. ix. 25–27; Gen. xlix. 1, 10.)

It has been beautifully suggested that the name given by Adam to his wife after their expulsion from Eden, places him also among the prophets. 'He called her Eve—"Living," not only because she should give birth to all living, but perhaps with a further prophetic meaning, in reference to the promise just given; because the race of man, now subject to death, should be made alive by the "Offspring of the Woman."' (Bishop Harold Browne, in the Speaker's Commentary, on Gen. iii. 20.) A word of hope at the very gate of the Paradise lost!

The first result of Christ's coming: that we should be saved: one word in the original, Salvation, as if in repetition from ver. 69. 'This is the salvation that I mean,' from our enemies—the enemies of Israel, the proud Romans that oppressed them—and from them that hate us, perhaps a reference to Herod, the tyrannical king. But no doubt the meaning goes deeper. We have all worse and mightier enemies, and Jesus came to set us free. See how Zacharias turns into prophecy the names of his son, his wife and himself (Lesson for Jan. 2). To perform the mercy (John); to remember His holy covenant (Zacharias); the oath which He sware (Elisabeth). And the end of all this is not deliverance only, but service. If we belong to Christ, we have changed masters, but now the law is Love. We serve without fear. True, we fear God, but we are not afraid of Him. Every child will understand the difference. In holiness towards God, righteousness towards men. So Eph. iv. 24.

III. CHRIST'S FORERUNNER.—Read vers. 76–79. The grateful father, having spoken of the coming Saviour, can now think of his own joy; and turns to his child, little child (as his word means) lying there in the cradle, all unconscious of the glorious task that lay before him! Zacharias takes up the strain of ancient prophecy, and echoes the words of Isa. xl. 3, Mal. iii. 1. The Highest is God the Father—the 'Most High;' the Lord is plainly Christ himself, in the Old Testament, JEHOVAH. And again all leads up to the thought of salvation, the third time that the word occurs in this song; but by what means? Salvation means deliverance: the Jews expected to be delivered; but in their own way, by war and conquest. God's way was by remission (or forgiveness) of their sins. Such was to be the burden of John's message, ch. iii. 3. Then in the Golden Text Zacharias tells of the source from which flow remission, deliverance, victory. It is all of tender mercy; John iii. 16. Sin is darkness, but behind, beyond that darkness there is

* It has been noticed that the words 'There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name,' show that Zacharias did not belong to the high-priestly and Sadducean branch of the Aaronic family, in which the name of John was common. See Acts iv. 6.

the light of God's love; and by-and-bye this prevails, like the dawn of day, or the dayspring, first glimmering softly in the east, then slowly rising to full splendour. The picture, says Godet, is that of a company of travellers who have lost their way in the desert; the night is around them, as the shadow of death, for death is all they expect as they sit trembling in the gloom. But at length in the horizon the morning star appears, the streaks of light widen through the heavens, the darkness is lifted from the plain, and the travellers find again their path—the way of peace. So the world, without Christ, was wandering in darkness; John came as the morning star, and Christ is Himself, the Light, the Way.

IV. Growth of the Child: the Years of Preparation.—Read ver. 80. John grew, and waxed strong in spirit, like young Samuel (1 Sam. ii. 26), like the Child Jesus (Luke ii. 40). Farrar remarks: 'Nothing is said of "favour with men." In the case of the Baptist, as of others, "the boy was father to the man;" and he probably showed from the first that rugged sternness which is wholly unlike the winning grace of the child Christ.' So from his youthful days, he lived a lonely life: in the deserts. 'The wild waste region south of Jericho, and the Fords of the Jordan to the shores of the Dead Sea.' There is no ground for the view that John and Jesus were companions in childhood. The stern solitary young priest, in his mountain-home and desert wanderings, most probably spent his early days apart from the loved and lovely child of Nazareth. John was a Nazarite from his birth (ver. 15), self-denying and secluded; waiting the time (at the age of thirty) of his shewing, or public introduction to the ministry, in Israel.

Questions.

1. On what great occasions is God said to have 'visited' His people in Old Testament times?
2. Cite the prophetic passages which declare that salvation would be wrought for men 'in the house of David.'
3. Distinguish between Salvation and Redemption, and show how they are combined in Christ's work.
4. To what oath sworn to Abraham does Zacharias refer? What other reference is made in the New Testament to this oath and its fulfilment?
5. In what other passages is the dawning light used as the emblem of Messiah's coming?
6. What is the great lesson of John's thirty silent, waiting years?

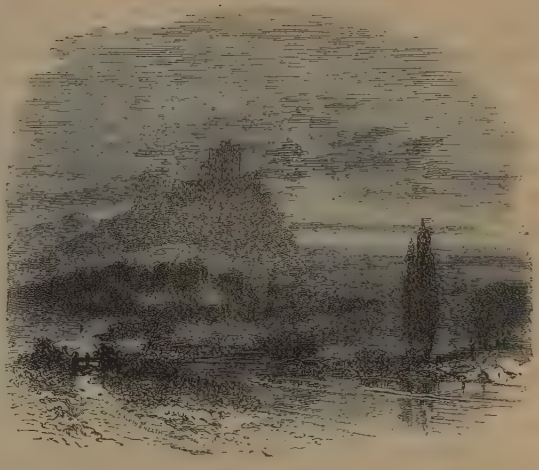
THE MYSTERIOUS LIGHT.

I.



IT was in the days of good Queen Bess, when hearts and minds were all ablaze with the pure faith as it is in Jesus; and, in a retired country region in the west of England. All the neighbourhood round about Lydstone Hall, the seat of the ancient family of Needham, a race renowned for many a year for fair and gracious deeds, had been startled by a sudden prodigy which appeared in the midst of it.

Near Lydstone Hall, on the top of a little hill, there stood an old, ruined castle, which, before the hall was built, had been the residence of the Needhams; and one late autumn, when the nights began to grow long and were disturbed with frequent storms of wind and rain, the people, who lived on the Lydstone estates, were much troubled by seeing, each evening after the sun was set, and all the land was wrapped in gloom, or touched at the best with pale, cold moonshine, a light shining within those decaying, grey, deserted walls.

Those were times when superstition held a heavy dark sway over the minds of the common classes in England; the gospel brightness, which streamed through the kingdom, had not as yet dispelled such mists as these; they still hung about the fancies of men and women. The tenantry of the Needhams took this mysterious light greatly to heart, they insisted on it that some evil, supernatural being took up his abode nightly in the ruined castle, and no one was bold enough to go and clear up the matter. They forgot that God is everywhere, and that no harm can come to those that fear Him.

By-and-bye two or three misfortunes happened rather suddenly in the families of farmers who rented the Lydstone broad acres. The wife of one was killed by her palfrey falling with her as she returned home one evening from a distant market in the dusk. The favourite cow of another died of what seemed a rapid, unknown disease; a third had two of his finest apple-trees blown down in his orchard in one night. The worthy folks on the Lydstone estate thought much of these mischances, and joining to them a few other smaller ones, which their lively imaginations wonderfully enlarged, came to the conclusion that this was no pleasant or safe part of the country to live in; no doubt the evil influence shed around by the castle light was entirely to blame for every misadventure which had come to pass. With this foolish idae rooted in their brains, two or three of the largest tenants of the Needhams gave up their farms and left the neighbourhood hastily; and those few who remained, believing themselves to be under a spell for ill luck, set about their work in field and garden in such a dreary, listless way, that the whole Lydstone property, from being some of the most carefully-cultivated land in the district, became a scene of disorder and desolation. But still the yellow light in the ruined castle burnt on.

Such was the state of things, when the lady Agnes Needham came, in early spring, to Lydstone Hall, with her little son, a boy of seven. Agnes Needham was one of those rarely-gifted ladies who were among the many rich products of that age when the leaven of the Reformed Doctrine, stirring and working in the nation's heart, seems to have brought to the surface all things fair and noble in the land; a lady who was at once a saintly heroine and a tender woman, a deep scholar and a skilful housewife. Her husband, Sir Archibald Needham, had died some three years before this period, and since then Lady Agnes's mind had been given up to making herself ready to follow him into the inheritance of the saints of light when it should please God to call her, and to ruling well her household, and estates, and bringing up her son so that he should do brave work one day for both his heavenly King and his native country. She and her husband had always been firm upholders of the Reformed Gospel teaching, and in the days of Queen Mary had suffered much persecution in the good cause; therefore, little Archie, so they commonly called the boy, was brought up from his very babyhood, with purest Christian light pouring full upon his young soul.

The Needhams had other property nearer London, and as Lady Agnes, who was an earl's daughter, was a great favourite with the queen, and as her majesty required her frequent attendance at the court, she spent more of her time on her eastern estates than on those which lay in the far west. She did not however, neglect these her more distant possessions; she was far too good a woman to be careless about anything which her Master above had set her over; she paid periodical visits to Lydstone Hall, and did her utmost to forward the well-being there of both the souls and bodies of her tenantry and those who worked under them. Therefore, when the Lady Agnes, on her arrival at Lydstone, found her estates in such a bad and unusual condition, she was both surprised and distressed; and still more was she astonished and troubled when she heard the cause. Lady Agnes was not quite free from the superstition of her time, not even the highest cultivated men and women were; but still her strong, brave, confident, religious faith kept such notions from having as much power over her as they had over most other people in her day. She knew that she served an Almighty Lord, and she believed that if evil spirits did indeed walk the earth, that Lord held perfect rule over them, and would not let them harm or even frighten those who love and fear Him.

One night, soon after her arrival at Lydstone Hall, she was speaking of the light in the ruined castle to her bower-woman Elgiva, while the girl combed out her long, bright hair before she retired to rest, and was lamenting its fatal results to the whole property.

"Whatever the being may be which kindles yon mysterious flame," said the lady, "it is subjected to the will of God; and it is a disgrace for Christian men to have shown themselves so cowardly in this matter as all my tenants have done."

"Oh, my lady!" cried the damsel, with a little scream, "it is a fearful thing to live in such a neighbourhood; I caught a gleam of the terrible light yesternight from my chamber window, and till daybreak my dreams were haunted with strange shapes. I think, madam, sorely though it would grieve me, I must leave your service if you dwell long in this unlucky, ill-starred place."

"Girl, you are foolish, and sadly wanting in trust in your dear Lord," exclaimed Lady Agnes. "Some night, for Christ's sake, I will mount the hill, and search into the cause of the light in the old castle, and shame every serving-man and man-at-arms about me, by showing them what the courage of a woman can do in Christ's dear name."

And her cheek flushed as she spoke, and her eyes flashed with pure, holy zeal.

"Oh, my lady! God keep far from you such a hazardous intent," said Elgiva, in an awe-struck whisper.

Soon after that, mistress and maid separated for the night, and all the house was sunk in sleep.

Yes, all was sunk in sleep save one busy little mind, which was as wide awake as if at noon-day; and that was the mind of little Sir Archie. The child occupied a small room opening out of that of his mother. And it so happened, that that night, when she and her waiting-woman were talking together, he had awoke just at the end of their discussion, and caught a few, but only a few, of Lady Agnes's words.

Now Archie had been brought in a somewhat peculiar way, apart from other children, and was in many things different from them. In his infancy he had shown a singular delicacy of nerves, and a great physician of the day, to whom his mother had made known his case, had told her that if he met with any mental shock before his bodily health strengthened with years, it would bring forth results most disastrous for the boy. In consequence of this, Lady Agnes had resolved that until he reached a certain age, little Archie should hear nothing of the innumerable stories of the supernatural, and strange, superstitious beliefs, which were floating hither and thither through the land. In order to prevent such thoughts and ideas coming near the child, she or his old tutor never let him out of their sight; and the few servants who approached him were forbidden, on pain of their mistress's severest displeasure, ever to mention such subjects before him. The foolish fancies which distress so many children, were banished by her wise and kindly teaching, which ever set God before him as our shield and defence.

The result of this judicious treatment was, that Archie grew up the most fearless of living creatures. He had never so much as heard of witch, or ghost, or goblin; he would pass down the darkest passage alone with the utmost tranquillity; he would lie awake at dead of night gazing at the stars and indulging in pretty, childish fancies about them; he would run out into the garden in the grey winter twilight, and play there all by himself. The only supernatural beings of whose existence he was aware were the angels; of them his mother had spoken much and often; and his imagination always showed him these shining guardians hovering near him, and watching over him.

The words of his mother, which Archie had heard to-night, were just those which she spoke about going herself to the ruined castle to try to discover the mystery of the light, and to show what a brave woman will dare in Christ's name; the waiting-maid's answer had been so low that he had not caught it. But Lady Agnes's words had been quite enough to rouse the little fellow's curiosity, for he was always an inquisitive, inquiring child; he had not, in pursuance of the usual rule observed with regard to him, been allowed to hear a single syllable about the mysterious light since he arrived at Lydstone Hall, so it was little wonder that his childish brains were perplexed on the subject.

He meditated on this theme until out of his many thoughts and questionings there grew up a sudden resolution: he would go himself and see all about the light, then he would be able to tell his mother everything, and besides he would be so proud of doing something for the sake of that dear Lord Jesus, whom he had been always taught to love so much, and who had taken little children in his arms; he was quite sure, from what his mother had said, that such an act would in some way please Him. His conscience whispered, it is true, that his mother would not quite approve of what he was going to do; but one of the boy's faults which good discipline had not yet conquered in him, was wilfulness, so he hushed this inner voice, as grown-up people often do such silent warnings, and made up his mind to carry out his intention without further delay.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

A SLEIGH JOURNEY.

AN EPISODE OF COLONIAL MISSION-LIFE.

JUST as the sleigh with my little bay mare was being brought round to the front door of the parsonage, my wife said, "I think I should like to go with you."

"Do you think you can bear the cold?" I asked.

"Well," she replied, "I can bear it at least as well as yourself; besides, I want to see the people again. I have not been to the 'Ridge' for some time. And," my wife added mischievously, "you are hardly to be trusted alone; you will need some one to look after you, especially if a snow-storm should come on." And so it came to pass that, in the missionary journey I was contemplating, my wife occupied the vacant seat in our little sleigh.

We were living on the left bank of the St. John River, in the province of New Brunswick, then lately incorporated into the dominion of Canada. Our home was in a lovely spot, especially so in summer time, when the broad river which ran past the settlement gave life, motion and beauty to the stillness of the forest-crowned upland on the farther bank. But the river was not now visible; it ran silently beneath the heavy field of ice which stretched from shore to shore, a mile in width, forming the general high road of the district, available for every kind of traffic. If the ice were "glare" or glassy, the skaters would be out in force, or the farmer would hitch two loaded sleighs to a single horse; but whether the ice were clear or snow-covered, it was the great highway. Sometimes even a house would be drawn upon it, by a dozen teams, from one neighbourhood to another; the three-feet thickness of ice being sufficient to bear even this strange load.

Spite of its isolation (some twenty miles distant from the town), my position as a Christian pastor was one of peculiar privilege and interest. Dwellers in great cities can hardly realise the existence of English-speaking communities where the Christian Church and its work is the chief factor in the thought and life of the people; where the Sabbath is always a "high" and a holy day; where the Bible occupies the post of honour in every house; where sermons are not only listened to, but remembered and discussed, bought and read; where the religious newspaper and the Sunday-school library are the light literature; where the voice of salvation is in the house, and the minister of Christ an ever-welcome guest. Yet such a people had I found when I assumed my charge; a people thoughtful and grave, even to the children; but hospitable, kindly, moral; and evangelical in their faith and worship. Perhaps I may have more to say about them another time. Just now I must go back to my wife, and the little bay mare standing at the door.

Our journey had come about in this wise. Lonely as was our own parish, there were others still more so. Thirty miles away, on a high ridge of hilly land, was a small community which had been for a long time deprived of the privilege of a settled ministry. It had originally been colonised by an exodus from my own people. Therefore it was natural that—when the settlement heard of the coming of a new minister to the parent church—it should ask for an occasional service. Such a service I had undertaken to render once a month; and I was now, on a Saturday morning, about to start.

My wife's insinuation that I might need some one to take care of me was not altogether unwarranted. Accustomed only to the life of cities, I was unaware of the severe strain of a remote district upon the physical powers; and especially where one had a five months' winter, with a horse as the only means of locomotion. And I had already once or twice "come to grief" through my unfamiliarity with "winter roads" and their special difficulties. So I was not very averse to having company on my lonely drive of thirty miles along a frozen river, and over narrow roads four feet deep with snow, or through forest paths heavy with the winter's gloom. So it was settled that we should both go to the "Ridge." Coats and cloaks were donned, fur caps duly pulled down over the ears, and mittens drawn on. Our boys brought the heavy buffalo robe to tuck in close around us, and Annie, our servant, contributed two heated bricks, just drawn from the oven and wrapped in carpet, to serve as a pleasant footstool. "Good-bye" was said to the children, and we started down the path by the well to the garden gate, crossed the roadway, tore down the steep bank, slewed round to the westward, and away up the river on the ice.

We reached our destination without much incident. The first six miles of our journey lay along the surface of the river, then heavily coated with snow. On our right the land stretched back for a mile or two, a perfectly level plain, divided into grass farms; the neat wooden houses standing about a furlong apart along the river's brink. The other shore rose more steeply; the soil was poorer and therefore the dwellings fewer, and the hills were crowned with the untouched forest. Then we reascended the bank, and wound in and out some twelve miles till we approached the town, which had to be reached by crossing the stream.

Here we halted to dine and "thaw out," for the mercury was unpleasantly near the zero point. Resuming our journey, an hour brought us opposite the lowest foot of the great continuous ridge of land for which we were bound. Re-crossing the river, we began to climb the heights, and at last reached the farmhouse which was our destination as the early March day was closing in.

A hearty welcome awaited us. If a New Brunswick winter is cold without, it is generally warm enough within. A great heap of blazing logs burned in the rough kitchen, where we removed our wraps and shook the snow and frost from cap and hair: for in that chilly atmosphere a very short exposure congeals the breath, till eyebrows and beard are thickly coated with white ice. The horse is, of course, in a worse condition, whole fringes of icicles depending from head and body. But all sense of discomfort yields to the genial warmth within doors. We pass from kitchen to "best room," from the log-fire to the well polished stove, which is a feature in every Canadian house; and soon gather round the ready tea-table. No wine or spirits are offered to "warm" the travellers—the intelligent New Brunswicker has long found out that such things are no help to him—but the tea is hot and strong, the food varied and abundant, if somewhat rough. Dough-nuts, crullers, biscuits, buckwheat cakes, are a few of the substantial defences on which the farmer relies against the cold; and which now awaited us.

Yet this was but a part of our welcome. A visit from strangers bringing with them a pleasant flavour of the outside world, was a delight to our entertainers which was reflected on ourselves. That the visitor was a minister was an added charm. If there is one thing dearer than another to the old Canadian farmer it is the opportunity of discussing the great questions which underlie the Gospel. He will "reason high" about freedom, fate, free-will, fore-knowledge absolute, even at the risk of finding no end to the discussion. In the solitude of his daily life, these things press heavily upon his mind. The echo of the questions raised by the so-called "modern thought" have, as yet, hardly reached him; the language in which that thought is clothed would be strange to him. He reasons only in the familiar terms of the Bible, which has been his one text-book, and which is still to him the end of all controversy if he can get a passage bearing directly on his perplexity. On this ground the Canadian farmer is no mean antagonist. He is the "man of one book," whom a foe may well dread, for that book is the Word of God: and if he is given to the discussion of great spiritual mysteries, not often does the discussion end in bitterness. Of course the odium theologicum is not entirely unknown to the lonely colonist, but he is usually glad to turn to those simpler gospel truths in which all Christian hearts rejoice. Here he rests from controversy; taking his stand on Divine love and on the atonement it has provided for man's sin, as on a rock which stands firm on its base, whatever cloud or mist may gather round its head.

Pursuing such thoughts as these with my aged entertainer, the evening wore away; the farmer's married son and some younger members of the household being attentive listeners. Meanwhile, my wife had been quietly appropriated by the young mother, who, in her own room, was timidly pouring the story of her spiritual troubles and difficulties into her visitor's ear. It had soon come out that this quiet woman in her lonely home upon the hills had had some deep experiences. Her soul was consuming with intense longing "to be a Christian." She did not dare to call herself one; she was too unworthy. It was scarcely possible that God had looked upon her with the favour of eternal purpose to have mercy upon her; imperfection and failure were in all she attempted. She had no hope but in Christ, yet hardly dared to cherish that, so great was her sense of her own demerit. The atmosphere of her thought was prayer that God would save and sanctify her. But her life was overshadowed by the fear that perhaps it was not the Almighty will to save her for the eternal kingdom. I may say here that, when I came to know all this, it was one of my pleasantest privileges to direct this earnest, struggling soul to the light of Christ's gracious teaching; and that on a subsequent visit, it was my joy to welcome her to the communion of the Lord's Table. She was then rejoicing in the peace of the assurance that God sent His Son, not to condemn the world, but that it might be saved.

The sabbath dawned brightly; the cold of the previous day had moderated, and though snow might follow, I understood that a large congregation was expected. Far along the "Ridge," and down both slopes, the news had somehow been carried that there would be preaching on Sunday. The great box sleigh was brought out and filled with clean straw: on this the "buffaloes" were spread, and all the inmates of the house climbed in and packed closely. We soon found ourselves part of quite a procession of similar vehicles, all tending to the same point. We reached the church: a low oblong of wood, raised on short logs some three feet from the ground. It was clap-boarded without and plastered within; but boards and plaster, roof and floor, were hopelessly dilapidated. The floor was "humpbacked," that is to say, the end supports had sunk, leaving the middle highest by nearly a foot. The square pews were of plain pine, innocent of paint or varnish. Two large iron "box-stoves" (the name describes them) were filled with burning logs, the smoke finding its way through long black pipes hung just above the people's heads. At first it seemed as if the congregation would be exclusively of women, for, according to a foolish custom of the country, nearly all the men hung round the doors till the service was actually commencing, then they streamed in, and the great, bare building was soon quite full. Where the people had all come from was a mystery, for habitations seemed few and far between. A steady, serious set they were. They meant business—both men and women—and the business was the worship of God and the hearing of His Word. My congregation was not fashionably dressed; scarcely a black coat or a silk gown was there; "homespun," in simple checks, or simpler grey, predominating. But there were no rags, nor unsavouriness; and if there were none very rich, there were none very poor, none so poor as to be needing food, raiment, or shelter.

Our worship was very simple; perhaps its defect was that it gave little audible part to the people, except singing, but in this they joined heartily, and with some attempt at part-harmony. I remember being somewhat puzzled to find suitable hymns in the meagre and time-worn book I found in the pulpit. But I selected the well-known piece beginning:

"Come, we that love the Lord,
And let our joys be known."

Sung to such a tune as "Lonsdale," there is both sweetness and vigour in the old hymn; but I was not to hear it thus. An old farmer rose to lead the singing (we had no organ) and sang the first line by himself in a tremulous tenor, the people joining in as he reached the second line. But, alas! the air was a slow and lugubrious minor, with numerous dying shakes and trills; and when we reached the words

"Join in a song with sweet accord," all were silent but one sturdy son of the soil, who began some low rumbling notes in a stifled voice, that seemed to come from beneath the floor. This was a "bass solo;" and presently a treble voice started after it, and tried to overtake it in a sort of fugue movement. This musical strife continued through various lines of the stanza, till in one grand thrilling wail the last line was given by the whole congregation. And if the singers were somewhat abroad during the progress of the tune, at least they came in well together with the dying rallentando "doh: te: lah." Yet the spirit of the whole service was good. There was melody in the hearts of these simple people; and I am glad to record that a few years have swept away the ruder and more grotesque surroundings of their worship. Not the least of the service I was enabled to render them by my voluntary mission-work was the inciting them to take a more hopeful view of their position. They were encouraged to attempt the support of a resident minister; to replace the worn-out cottage, formerly used as a parsonage, by a new and handsome building; and, later on, to erect a new house of worship. Under the same vigorous ministry, begun a year after my winter's work, the church on the "Ridge" is a centre of good and elevating influences for miles around.

But to go back to that Sabbath morning, when all outward things were so primitive and rough. During the sermon, each honest face was turned towards the pulpit, with an earnestness that was evidenced by the tears that ran down many a weather-stained cheek. The preacher, happily, had grace enough to confine himself to the simple story of the Cross, and to tell it in plain English. He has preached since to more cultured gatherings, but has often longed to see again the eagerness with which these hungry souls laid hold on the word of God as very bread to them. The subject was "The harmonies of the Cross," from the Psalmist's words, "I will sing of mercy and judgment." The preacher said it was evident from this psalm (the hundred and first), that although David was now in safety and peace, with his power and authority established, yet that he had gone through a previous sad experi ence of sin and of its punishment. Indeed, mercy and judgment had been the alternating phases of his whole life. God had visited his transgression with the rod; but had not utterly taken away his lovingkindness. And God's dealings with David were representative of His methods with mankind generally. The whole Bible was a song of mercy and judgment; while the Gospel was the combined harmony of these distinct notes. There was the sad strain of disobedience and the curse—sin, sorrow, and suffering; but there was also the "new song" of salvation: of the Lord God, merciful and gracious, who had no pleasure in the death of a sinner. On the one hand, God must punish sin, on the other hand, "God is love." The cross of Jesus Christ combined and harmonised the apparently discordant ideas. Gethsemane and Calvary showed how God could be just, and the Justifier of the believer in Jesus. In the Cross, not only did mercy temper justice, but mercy rejoiced against judgment. This was not only Scriptural theory, but practical Christian experience. Finally, the people were urged to make their own experiment of the power of the Cross to bring their life into harmony with God.

At the close of the service all was haste. Another of my good farmer friends made room for me and my wife in his sleigh beside himself and his bonny daughters, and away we went at a fast trot down the almost precipitous slopes of the hill towards his home. These young girls were fine samples of the new generation of Canadian country-women. Fair, fresh, and well-taught, they had all the easy grace of city life. Their home showed taste and skill in adornment, which contrasted oddly with the daily pursuits of housework and dairy, knitting, spinning and weaving, which I knew formed the staple of their life. And there was the same reverent religious spirit which is so marked a feature in the women of Canada.

I was to preach in a country school-house that afternoon, and at another, three miles farther, in the evening. Both these services were well attended: the men and women filing in by separate doors, and seating themselves on opposite sides of the room. On arriving at the evening station, an extra excitement was caused by the appearance of a large brown bear on the road, just as the congregation began to assemble. Bruin, however, was as much scared at the crowd as the crowd was startled by him; and beat a hasty retreat into the forest fastnesses.

Altogether this was a hard day's work. Three services are generally enough to cause fatigue; but when to these is added travelling, and a constant fire of eager questioning and argument, it will be understood that the quieter ride back to our first resting-place was most acceptable. Very solemn is the path through the pine forest even by daylight; but in the gleam of a young moon, with the sleigh gliding swiftly and silently over the deep snow, the effect is startling. It is "an arrangement in black and white" which would charm a modern painter: the shadows fall across the road as sharply as if a deep chasm were cut in the path. No wonder the horses sometimes swerve aside, accustomed as they are to the local aspects of nature. And the trees take on such weird fantastic shapes as startle and bewilder one; while indescribable and inexplicable sounds strike out from the forest depths. But the peace and rest which follow a Sabbath of humble endeavour were in our souls, and we felt naught of the scene but its solemn beauty. We slept late next morning, however, resuming work in a series of friendly pastoral visits to persons who were too old and infirm to be out to the services. It would benefit the people who are surfeited with sermons and gospel ministrations, if they could see the eagerness of most of these solitary invalids, to hear again those gospel truths which, while simple enough for the young, the old are glad to fall back upon as their only hope and stay. And the servant of Christ feels little fatigue in such a happy ministry; though the weakness of the flesh may be felt afterwards.

Towards night, snow began to fall. It fell heavily all through the night. It was snowing next morning. Anxious as my wife and I were to return home, it was scarcely possible all that Tuesday. But on Wednesday morning it had ceased. About twelve inches depth of snow had fallen, and had been followed by a keen westerly wind which had swept with such force along the ridge as to leave the road in many places bare and hard. So in spite of urgent entreaties to stay another day, till the road should be made more passable by travel, we decided to start homewards, and the little bay mare was brought from the stable.

All went well at first. The snow-drifts which we encountered for the first two miles presented little obstacle, and—apart from the cold wind which blew at our backs—we were not uncomfortable. Presently, however, as we began to descend towards the river, the snow-drifts increased in depth and frequency, and the mare's progress was reduced to a walk. Here we met a young man on snowshoes, the only pedestrianism there possible. He warned us that the drifts were deeper still in the hollow, and advised return. But we were without experience in the difficulties of snow travel, and anxious to get home. We thought we should get through, and so pushed on. But we found progress increasingly difficult. I had soon to leave the sleigh to tread down the deep snow in front of the horse. This was exhausting work to a man of light build, encumbered with heavy clothing; and soon, streaming with perspiration, in spite of the intense cold, I had to cease. The little mare struggled on gallantly, till coming to a deeper drift still, she sank half out of sight, and was powerless to move.

Help, however, was not far off. A low farmhouse was visible on the slope at our left, and our repeated cries soon brought a man to the barn door. He took in the situation at a glance, and hastening slowly with a broad shovel set to work to dig us out of the snow. He then led the horse aside into his field and toward the house. Here kind hands ministered the ever-ready cup of tea, and after we were rested, the farmer showed us a path to the river across his land, by which we escaped the drifted hollows of the road. Soon we were speeding across the ice and down the road on the opposite shore. Here all was well till we neared the town. Our road had been for a time sheltered by a wood which skirted it; but presently we reached a spot where a gap in the trees had allowed the gale to pour a torrent of snow across the road till it had accumulated some twelve feet high, absolutely barring the highway. No dwelling was near, and we had met no vehicles. Nonplussed for a time, I bethought me that this could scarcely be the accumulation of a single storm; and that there was probably a beaten path over the hard-packed snow if I could find it. I accordingly struck for the very middle of the huge bank, and had the satisfaction of seeing my little mare find firm footing beneath the loose upper snow, and crawl fairly over the drift.

Now on to the town, the ready stable and the welcome fireside of a friend; said friend kindly earnest that we should not venture upon the eighteen miles which still lay between us and our home. But we would not hear wisdom; our own little ones and a dear girl of my charge who lay near death, urging us on. So, as the clock struck three, we recrossed the stream and struck down the left bank, the snow at the same time recommencing its fall with ominous thickness. Six o'clock found the bay mare twelve miles on her road; not without adventure, for we had again become stuck in a deep drift, and had again found deliverers. But it was now dark, and we were worn with fatigue, exposure, and anxiety; moreover, friendly homes were near, where we would be gladly entertained. Had we not better stay till morning? True, there were only six miles to go; but the mare was in as bad plight as ourselves. We fairly hesitated, but finally determined to complete our enterprise. So down the bank we urged our little beast, to retake the road on the river.

But the road on the river was not easy to find; the snow had obliterated every trace of it, and it was now completely dark, and the river a mile wide. We could but walk slowly along the white plain, the poor little mare having lost all ambition to move quicker. Presently we left the guiding shelter of the bank to cross a great bend in the river, and soon found that we were fairly "at sea," without a landmark in the wide black night. We were now nervous and almost frightened. Memory recalled the terrible stories told of people who had wandered about all night on the mysterious white plain of the river's surface; of some who had even perished. Presently the mare stopped, her forefeet deep in the snow. We were at the bank, the same bank we had left, and not far from the same spot. For there against the gloom of the sky we could just discern the outline of a bridge over a certain creek which we had been instructed to avoid. But this was the end of our troubles. We crept close along shore for another three miles with little difficulty, and soon the welcome sound of a bell came booming on our ear. It was my church bell calling the people to prayer. Then the lights of the settlement twinkled along the bank above us, and recognising her own home-track, the little bay mare fairly rushed up with the load, and deposited me in time to cross the intervening field, and take charge of the evening service.

Such is a faithful picture of ministerial life and work in New Brunswick. It is in no sense overdrawn; indeed, many of my brethren could tell of far worse exposure, and of more self-denying labours. But to me, used to city life, this was a journey to be remembered; and its sweet and bitter will linger long with me. The reaction was severe, but in the happy knowledge of some souls helped and blessed by one's humble ministry, the volunteer mission-work of that winter and spring has never been regretted.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

"THE ROUGH TEA."

ONE cold night in the winter of last year a crowd of very poor and wretchedly-clad people were clamouring for entrance into a house in one of the poorest streets of Dublin.

Such a motley set they were—men, women, and little children! The men, who were most of them in tatters, were holding the remains of their rags together over their chests to keep out the piercing wind of that bitter winter night, and stamping their poor benumbed feet on the ground to get some life into them, while the women, no less poorly clad, hugged their puny infants to their bosoms, trying thus to shield them from the icy blast.

And the cause of all this excitement, what was it? Merely a "Rough Tea," as we call it in Dublin, consisting of dry bread and tea, which is offered gratuitously to the half-starved and homeless; and the building in front of which they had congregated was the Irish Church Mission House, so dear to all workers in the Master's vineyard. On this particular night the crowd was unusually large, and in the crush and struggle to get near the door some were knocked down and injured and had to be carried to the hospital.

After what seemed a long time to the tired crowd, the door was opened, and the people poured in eagerly, pushing and jostling each other through the lighted hall and corridor into the large well-warmed room where both souls and bodies were to be refreshed. It was a sight never to be forgotten, as many said who saw it for the first time. It reminded one forcibly of the Master's command to his servants to go into "the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in." And in this case there was no need for compelling, for the invitations to the tea were accepted with an alacrity given by hunger and starvation.

The room is lit up brightly, and looks very pleasant and inviting, with its large texts of Scripture against the walls, and the bright faces of the girls from the "Home" who are seated on benches in the rear and are to lead in the hymns chosen for that evening. At the door a lady stands and gives out the allotted portion to each one, half a fourpenny loaf to a man, and a quarter to a woman. They then pass on into the classes arranged for them, and seat themselves on the benches, awaiting the tea that is to be served presently.

The room is divided into classes holding from twenty to twenty-four persons each, and every class is superintended by a worker whose business it is to keep order if required, and also to try to speak to each one and find out his circumstances.

A curious motley set they are, truly! The men are some of them almost savage-looking in aspect, with their unkempt locks, unwashed faces, and often tattooed arms and hands, sailor fashion. The women, with the weakness of their sex, sometimes make a poor attempt at finery, in the shape of old artificial flowers and bits of faded ribbon, and one woman we remember seeing who held a tiny infant of a week old, the sleeves of its frock being tied up with strips of pink calico! But as a general rule the class of women who attend these "teas" are too poor to indulge even in such vanities as these, and are thankful if the poor rags they wear can be tacked together sufficiently to cover them. Sometimes they may be inclined to be a little unruly, but a few kind words usually quiet them. By-and-bye several of the Scripture-readers come in, laden with huge delf mugs, which are brought round and filled with tea, poured in by the teachers. Then a general feeling of comfort and happiness comes over the poor people, and they begin to be communicative. "Bless you, ma'am, that's the first cup I've drunk to-day," one will say. "It's nice and strong and sweet," another remarks, as he raises the steaming beverage to his lips. The mugs are filled and refilled, and hearty thanks given to the teachers each time! It does one such good to see the colour coming into the blue cold faces, and light into the dull eyes.

In many cases it is not the poorest class of all that frequent these gatherings. Last winter many really respectable people were thrown out of work, owing to the dulness of trade, and were thankful to avail themselves of the "Rough Teas." It was sadder almost to see the look of want on such faces than on those accustomed to poverty. We remember noticing especially a respectable young couple who evidently had seen better days. They were well dressed, and the man seemed to be enjoying his bread and tea as if he had tasted nothing for days, and such was nearly the case as we learnt afterwards. He was a tall, gaunt young fellow, and joined lustily in the hymns, which he sang in good tune and time. Beside him sat his wife, a sweet-looking young woman neatly dressed. Her look of patient endurance told its own tale of suffering and want. She drank the tea eagerly, but the bread she folded in her apron and did not touch. "Are you not hungry?" asked the teacher, as she refilled her mug with tea.

"I'm too hungry, ma'am. I can't eat; I feel filled up like."

"We've neither of us tasted a thing since yesterday morning," put in the husband. "She's not as strong as I am, and she can't bear the hunger so well."

"You see I've never been used to it, ma'am," continued the woman. "It's all along of his being out of work. He can't get any, and he'd take anything he could get."

It was touching to see their faces when the gospel message was preached, the interchange of looks as Christ's love was spoken of, and the tears in the young wife's eyes; both were evidently much impressed. No one who has ever seen it can forget those lines of upturned faces fixed intently on the speaker who is telling them of a Saviour's love, especially when one realises that many of them are hearing of Him for the first time in His capacity of a saving Christ, "a just God and a Saviour." Tears are wiped away stealthily by the backs of sooty hands, and smiles follow them as rapidly, whilst one of the town missionaries, with an Irishman's power of adaptation to the people he addresses, tells them how "Satan's own imps tried that very evening to prevent their meeting together." The term was not inappropriately applied to some small boys who were set on by the priests to throw stones at the people as they were going into the Mission House.

Sometimes two or three will leave in the midst of the address, but this is exceptional. As a rule they behave well. The women are usually the most noisy, especially if there are two or three seated near each other, and when called to order, the men will often remark, "It's always the women that make the noise," which indeed is the case. It is also astonishing to see how much real unselfishness there is among this class of people, for although sometimes one or two may try to secure a double portion of tea or bread, it is the exception; you will oftener hear remarks such as: "He's not got any tea yet," or "Her mug's empty, ma'am."

Leaflets with the hymns printed on them are handed round, so that all who are able to read may join, but unfortunately there are few who can.

And how are these many hundreds gathered in? may be asked; for we see new faces at every different meeting. Various means are used. The city missionaries seek out the parents of the children who attend the ragged-schools, besides distributing notices and leaflets everywhere. Last winter, however, a new method was adopted. The night asylums were visited.

At about nine o'clock these places of refuge were already crowded, and some of the lady-workers undertook to visit the women's department of the Night Asylum. It was really a sight to be remembered, as we have heard these ladies say. The poor creatures were literally packed together so closely that there was not a spare inch of room. The young women who had babies were allowed to lie with their heads resting on the wooden ledge that runs round the room, but all the others, old and young, had to sit bolt upright all through the long nights, for there was not any room to lie down. The cramped position must have prevented their getting any sleep, one would think, and yet the respectable houseless poor were thankful for this haven of rest. Numbers had to be turned away every night into the cold streets, to seek shelter where they could, because there was no room. The visitors tried to talk to these poor destitute ones, and to tell them of the loving Saviour who came to seek and to find such as they.

We can imagine what it must be to such as these to enter the well-warmed room of the Mission House, and to drink the warm sweet tea, and have their hunger satisfied, and how gratefully they will listen to all they are told about the Saviour who put it into the hearts of his children to provide for the destitute and homeless.

We know that such is the case. A lady asked a poor man at one of these "teas" how he enjoyed it. His reply astonished and pleased her, "Indeed, I do enjoy it, ma'am," he said. "But I'm still gladder to hear about the blessed Saviour's love. I've learned much more since I came here than I ever knew before." And this is only the expression of a feeling common to many. The result of these "teas" may be seen in the regular attendance at the ragged-schools of a class of people who were never got at before, simply because it was impossible to find their abodes. They burrow like rabbits, many of them, sleeping at night on the barges and coal-boats on the river if they can manage that; or if not, in sheds and outhouses, and even in doorways. The schools have never been so crowded since the mission began. The individual influence gained at these "teas" has been an unspeakable blessing. Many a tale of sorrow has been poured out, and consolation sought and given.

No inducement is offered to any to come, and only the very destitute would care for the tea and dry bread offered.

These "teas" have always been held from time to time, but never in the same way as last winter, when they were provided to meet a special need, and saved many, no doubt, from starvation.

Two or three "Rough Teas" were given on an average about every fortnight, and the barm-brack of former occasions was replaced by baker's loaves, thus enabling the "teas" to be multiplied without involving the heavy expense they would otherwise have done, and also as offering no inducement except to the needy.

The gratitude of those who attend is touching, and teaches one often a lesson. And surely this department of the work has the sanction of the Saviour's example in his feeding the famished multitude who had followed Him even into "desert places" to hear from his lips the Word of the Kingdom.

A VISIT TO CONSTANTINOPLE.

BY THE REV. W. URWICK, M.A.

THE ROBERT COLLEGE, BEBEK.

THE Christian tourist, as he passes through the graceful Dardanelles and steams up the Sea of Marmora, feels awakened in him an interest less only than that with which he approaches Palestine. Approaching Palestine he is about to tread the Bible Lands; approaching Constantinople he is drawing near the cities of the early creeds. Palestine is the cradle of Christianity; Constantinople, with its surroundings, is the school-room of Christian dogma. The interest which in the first century centred in the Holy Land—in Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Jerusalem—was in the fourth century transferred to the re-built and Christianised Byzantium; and within its walls, or at no great distance from them, most of the early Councils of the Church were held. Away on our right, before we come within sight of the city, at the foot of Mount Olympus lies Nicæa, where, in A.D. 318, the first great Œcumenical Council was held, that council whose dogmatic decisions—arrived at after close combat between ecclesiastics of giant learning and zeal, presided over by the Emperor Constantine—still echo, Sunday after Sunday, in the parish churches of England, and wherever the Nicene Creed is said or sung. And when now that most impressive and never-to-be-forgotten sight, the view of the mistress city, queen of eastern cities, rising from the placid waters and glittering in the morning sun, is already dazzling our eyes and kindling our imagination, we pass by the site of old Chalcedon opposite, where, in October of the year 451, six hundred bishops sat in council, annulled the decisions of the Robber-synod, and avoiding alike the error of Nestorius and that of Eutyches, adopted the doctrine of the two natures in one Person, together with the other important canons of what has ever since been called the Fourth General Council.

Nicæa and Chalcedon have long since as cities passed away, but there stands Constantinople in its beauty and glory, the same blue sea kissing its shores, the same clear sky arching over it above, tier upon tier of dwellings and of palaces as of yore, gracefully clothing its slopes, but crowned, alas! now for centuries, by the Crescent, and no longer by the Cross. The minarets of the False Prophet complete the view. But memory quickly travels back to those early days, ocean and the continent to bring the gospel of Christ to these very peoples of the early creeds, and to the central city of early Christian triumph and Christian when within the city and within the walls probably of that very church of St. Sophia built by Constantine, now a Mohammedan mosque, there were assembled from time to time no fewer than four of the great councils that have moulded the creed of Christendom. Here at the second Œcumenical Council (381), summoned by Theodosius the Great, the two Gregorys, Gregory Nazianzen, and Gregory of Nyssa, preached and argued. Here met the fifth great council, which slavishly obeyed the Emperor Justinian, and condemned "the three chapters." Here, too, in a vaulted chamber of the seraglio, hence called trullum, the sixth Œcumenical Council (680), under the presidency of Constantine the Bearded, denounced the Monothelite doctrine, and decreed that in Christ were two wills, the Divine and human, in perfect harmony. Here again, in 754, a council of 338 bishops passed an edict against image worship. Further, in 869, another council, called General, at Constantinople, condemned Photius, who had placed the churches of Bulgaria under his jurisdiction, and had excommunicated the Pope. And once more, in 879, the Patriarch Photius, having returned from his exile, assembled here that decisive council in which the word filioque was erased from the creed.

Recalling these old associations, these early days of deep theological thought, keen argument and passionate strivings about subtle points of Christian dogma, it seems strange, passing strange, that now, after the lapse of fourteen centuries, we should hear of missionaries, not from Rome, not from Britain, but from the Puritan home of the West, crossing the controversy. The necessity for such a mission is not to be accounted for by the conquests and thraldom of Islam, wide and devastating as these certainly were, because these missionaries have been sent, not directly to labour among Mohammedans, or to bring the votaries of Islam to the Cross, but in the first instance and mainly to those peoples under Mohammedan rule who still retain the name of Christian: to Bulgarians, Armenians, and Syrians, still holding to the letter of those ancient creeds of which they long have lost the spirit. It is to the nominally Christian populations of the Turkish empire, the descendants of those early churches in creed as well as blood, that the American missionaries have in the nineteenth century of the Christian era come. It is among them they chiefly labour, among them their successes have been won; and only through them indirectly do they hope to convert Mohammedans. Mohammedans have so long had among them a sadly-marred and deeply-degraded representation of Christianity, they have so long identified our holy religion with dead forms, lifeless creeds, and slavish, down-trodden, hopeless lives, that the first work to be accomplished lay among these degenerate Christian nationalities themselves, who needed to be converted again, to be raised from their moral degradation, and to be brought into the liberty of the children of God. By this method of procedure the Christian soldiers from New England hope that the citadel of Mohammedanism, so long impregnable, will, with God's Word and Spirit, be made to totter and to fall.

The explanation of the strange fact before us, is to be found, in part at least, farther back than the days of Mahomet, and even in the centuries of the early creeds. It is a startling fact, but no less true than startling, that at the very time these deep reasonings and passionate controversies were moulding our creeds, the manners of social life and the tone of thought and conversation among the professedly Christian population of Constantinople were anything but pure and high. We have a very vivid picture of the Christian society of the time in the writings of the golden-mouthed Chrysostom, Archbishop of Constantinople.

The portico of the church was thronged with victims of squalid want and disease, but pompous ecclesiastics and gaily-attired ladies passed haughtily on. "Within," says the preacher, "are the tumult and confusion of an inn, the laughter and hubbub of the bath and the agora." During the prayers, the congregation sat and chattered, and sharp and witty repartees were circulated with success. At home, parents were too ignorant of the Scriptures to be capable of instructing their children.

Side by side, with deep metaphysical reasoning about theology, and hot contests about dogmatic statements, and noisy councils of bishops to make creeds, the fashionable Christian population of the city went on its way; not indeed deserting the churches, but bringing their vanity and folly into them. Speaking of the manner in which Divine things were handled even in the Council (the first in Constantinople) Gregory Nazianzen says: "Ye jest and trifle about them as about circuses and plays."

If such was the state of things in the palmy days of the early Councils and the early Creeds in what was then the mistress city of Christendom and under the patronage of Christian emperors, it can hardly be matter of surprise that in after-centuries degeneracy advanced, and those who professed the true religion failed to make any stand against the incursions of Islam. The halo of the Creeds, like planets shining in a hazy night, has thrown a faint glare over the moral darkness and chill of those centuries of established Christianity in the East. But the Christianity of Constantinople in the fourth century cannot cast the first stone even at the Mohammedanism of Constantinople in the nineteenth. And the facts that Chrysostom records help us to understand the deadness and depravity reigning in the countries nominally Christian under Turkish rule even down to our own time—countries whose population numbers about twelve millions of souls.

MOSQUE OF SULTAN AHMED.

The thought of Protestant missions to these nominally Christian peoples in the lands of the Bible and of the Creeds took practical shape in the first efforts of the American Board at Boston in the year 1819. William Goodell, the well-known translator of the Scriptures into Armeno-Turkish, Pliny

Fisk, and Levi Parsons were the first from New England homes to begin mission work at Smyrna, Jerusalem, and Beyrout. At the last-named port, schools were commenced in 1824, and Isaac Bird and Eli Smith, with the valuable help of a converted Maronite—Asaad Sidiack, "the martyr of Lebanon," who, persecuted by the patriarch, afterwards died in prison—carried on the work successfully for many years. In 1831 Goodell went to Constantinople, and, joined by H. G. O. Dwight, began to labour among the Armenians, who then numbered about one hundred thousand, in the city. William G. Schaffter became missionary to the Jews. At Broosa, west of Olympus, and not far from Nicæa of old, Benjamin Schneider began to teach and preach in 1834, and at Erzeroum, among the Nestorians, Justin Perkins settled (followed by Austin Wright and Cochran) in 1835. To Greece went Jonas King; and subsequently (1858) to the Bulgarians, C. F. Morse and J. F. Clarke. To Constantinople again, in 1839, came Cyrus Hamlin, of whom we have more to tell; and following him were Josiah Peabody, Van Lessep, and Edwin Bliss. All these are names worthy to be remembered in the early records of modern missions in Turkey.

For twenty years the work was carried on amid constant opposition from ecclesiastics and others of the lapsed and stagnant churches on the one hand, and from the Ottoman authorities on the other. As early as 1846 the first Protestant Evangelical church was formed in Constantinople. But after the Crimean war in 1855, the famous Hatti Humayun was wrung from the Sultan, pledging religious liberty and equal rights to all parties; and after another five years of shuffling and delay, promising and promise-breaking, this Hatti was proclaimed the law of the empire. It gives liberty to the Protestant missionaries to labour among the Christian populations; but here the liberty is to cease. Liberty to make converts from the Turkish State religion was not granted. It never has been granted. Turkish law even still renders all attempts at direct influence on Mohammedans virtually impossible.

As one steams up the Bosphorus from the Golden Horn to the Black Sea, above the marble palaces and picturesque hareems which line its beautiful shores, a noble building, high on the hill, arrests the eye, and is visible from afar. This is the Robert College of Bebek, founded in 1863 by the munificence of Christopher R. Robert, of New York, and under the direction of the American missionary, Cyrus Hamlin, D.D. It was incorporated by the legislature of the State of New York, and is governed by a board of trustees residing there. An Iradé for its establishment was granted to the United States Legation at Constantinople, securing to it all the advantages which Turkish educational institutions enjoy. The object of the College is to give its students, without distinction of race or religion, a thorough education, equal to that obtainable at any first-class American college. It occupies spacious fireproof buildings of dark grey limestone, erected expressly for its use on a site which is acknowledged to be the most beautiful and most healthy on the shores of the Bosphorus.

The history of the origin of this college is almost a romance. In order to provide employment for Protestant Armenians, whose evangelical principles had thrown them out of business, Dr. Cyrus Hamlin had established a flour mill and bakery at Bebek. When the Crimean war broke out, large quantities of bread were furnished to the English troops by the Protestant bakery thus established, this being judged the safest quarter whence the staff of life could in that district be obtained. Christopher Robert, a merchant of New York, then travelling in the East, saw a large boat-load of excellent bread en route from the bakery to the English camp. This led to inquiry, and, in due course, to friendship with Dr. Hamlin, and hearty co-operation and ready help in his laudable work. The sons of Dr. Dwight, one of the founders of the Armenian Mission, suggested the formation of a college, and in spite of many difficulties it was decided to try. Opposition arose, not only from the Turkish authorities, but from some of the Armenian ecclesiastics, and from the Jesuits, whose diplomacy seriously hindered the work. A fundamental determination was that it should be a Christian and Protestant institution; that the Bible should be read, and prayers offered daily, and that there should be Christian worship on the Sabbath at which all the students should attend. The religious instruction, accordingly, in the College is not controversial, but practical, unsectarian, and based upon the principle of perfect freedom of conscience for all. Students attend morning prayers every day, and on the Sabbath preaching in the morning, a Bible exercise in the afternoon, and an informal lecture in the evening.

Christopher R. Robert, the founder, was a successful business man in New York, an earnest Christian, member for many years of the Fourteenth Street Presbyterian church, superintendent of the Sunday-school, and esteemed highly for his large, systematic, and wise beneficence. One of his favourite methods of doing good in his earlier days was to make one and another young man studying for the ministry, an inmate of his own house, giving him a home and an education at the same time. How many he thus aided probably no one knows, but he was in himself a society for the education of students for the gospel ministry. The good he accomplished in this way is simply inestimable. He also maintained a mission-school for Germans in Rivington Street, New York City, and contributed largely to maintain a German church worshipping there. He died in Paris, the 27th of October, 1878, in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

The college founded by him in 1863, and bearing his name, became a valuable coadjutor to the mission, providing men from time to time well fitted for mission work. After much difficulty the site for the new building was secured; but seven years of vexatious parley and hindrance elapsed before leave could be obtained to build on the site. At length the new building rose, of stone, with iron beams, filled in with brick, supporting the floors. It is a quadrangle, with five stories, surmounted by a noble flag-tower, commanding a magnificent view. The number of students is now two hundred, each paying forty pounds a year, and belonging to seventeen nationalities. The older building is converted into a girls' school under Protestant Prussian deaconesses, and the place has become the centre of a large British and American community forming a Protestant evangelical union, and holding Divine service on Sundays.

It was a lovely morning in April, when, in company with an American clergyman, Mr. Bonnell, and under the conduct of the Rev. Charles Brook of Constantinople, I was rowed in a caique across the placid bay of Bebek, and climbed the grassy hill on which Robert College stands. On every hand along the Bosphorus the palaces of pashas glitter in the sun. The college, with its surroundings and associations as a Christian and an American institution, stands out in striking contrast with the scene around. Dr. George Washburn, the president, met us as we entered, and gave us a hearty greeting. He is professor of psychology, ethics and political economy. He conducted us through the building, into the several class-rooms, studies, dormitories, library and museum, which last is rich in its collection of Turkish birds, and contains a specimen of the largest hornet's nest I ever saw. In one of the class-rooms an examination was being conducted viva voce by Mr. Edwin A. Grosvenor, professor of Latin and history. The subject was Guizot's "Lectures on Civilisation." Fourteen students were present, Turks, Armenians, and Greeks, all intelligent-looking young men; and their answers (in English) were marked by accuracy and clearness. They would bear comparison with any similar class of young men in our English colleges. A capital laboratory under the direction of Dr. Albert Long, the vice-president, together with a gymnasium and workshop, completes the well-arranged appliances for study and exercise.

We came away deeply impressed with the earnestness and thoroughness of the instructions here given. The students are divided into the higher and the lower school, and in the lower school the teaching is of course elementary. All who enter have to learn English. The young men receive degrees, B.A. and M.A., and some are successful in obtaining Government situations. Indeed, whether in law, medicine, or business, those who pass through Robert College usually take a high and honourable position. Most of them become Christians, and some are especially prepared for missionary labour. Four of them are already working in Cyprus under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Spencer, who has lately been appointed by our Government to organise schools in that island.

The founding of Robert College under Dr. Hamlin's presidency in 1863 was followed by the establishment of the Syrian Protestant College at Beyrout, presided over by Dr. Van Dyke, one of the ablest of living Arabic scholars; the Central Turkey College at Aintab, and more recently by that of the Armenian College at Harpoot, farther to the east. These four institutions together have an attendance of over six hundred students, among whom a number of men are being prepared to take up the work of the American missionaries. Each student is required to take a thorough course in his own vernacular and in the ancient language from which it is derived. Each pays substantially for his board and for his training; and this secures a sense of independence, regularity of attendance, and reality and diligence in the work done. It also fences the colleges from a low and indolent mediocrity in the class of men who enter.

Another day during my sojourn in Constantinople I took one of the steam ferries across the Bosphorus to Scutari on the opposite shore, and near to the site of the ancient Chalcedon. Climbing the hill I reached the American Home School, one of the highest buildings overlooking Scutari, and commanding a most impressive and glorious prospect. Lying before us as in a map are the Bosphorus, the Sea of Marmora, and the Golden Horn with Stamboul on the one side and Pera on the other. The American Home School is a boarding and day school for girls, containing all the comforts of a well-ordered young ladies' school in England. Each girl has a bed and dressing-closet of her own, and in the large airy school-room a desk and chair. All learn English. The girls are of various nationalities—Armenian, Greek, Turkish, American, English—and all pay for the education they receive, the boarders about twenty pounds, and the day pupils seven pounds per annum. The Bible is read and expounded daily. The pupils after a three years' course become teachers, or, if unmarried, get other situations. Many are employed in the Asia Minor missions. Dr. Wood is at present the president of this important institution, and the vice-principal whom I saw is a most bright, intelligent, and charming lady. Here one sees what the American mission is doing for the down-trodden women of Turkey. The great offence of Islam against the civilisation of mankind, is its treatment of woman. In Mohammedan countries she is the slave and chattel of man. She is treated as having no mind and no soul. One hardly ever sees a woman in a mosque. In the only way and at the only age in which rescue and reform are possible, this home school receives the maiden when she is still young, trains her intellect, informs her understanding, and kindles in her heart the fear and love of God. Here she tastes the sweets of liberty and partakes of the blessings of a Christian home.

The name home-school is most appropriate, for here all the happiness of home, its freedom, its pleasures, its affections, are cherished. Each pupil evidently feels at home, and enjoys far more liberty, peace, and comfort, than she could in any Turkish dwelling. Above all, Christian principles and truths are, from the outset, implanted and carefully nurtured in the heart and life. The associations are pure and elevating. The influence for good thus going forth from this one seminary, and it is one of many, as each successive company of scholars passes on into society and life, is incalculable. In a thousand ways, directly and indirectly, it must tell for good upon coming generations. The institution has been reared and is maintained by the generous offerings of Christian women of the United States. During the last few years a large number thus educated have been sent out to labour in behalf of their sex. Working at first through the seminaries, in a little time they gain access to the homes of the people, go out on tours, visit their pupils, and establish branch girls' schools. Girls' schools, moreover, independent of the missionaries, are being built. At Eski Zagra, for example, some years since, a Bulgarian woman, loyal to her old church, pointed out to a missionary lady a large stone building, erected for a girls' school in that city, saying, "We owe this to you missionaries. Had you not come, nothing of the kind would have been provided."

One other centre of light and blessing which I visited must not be omitted in this sketch of mission-work at Constantinople. In the heart of Stamboul itself, the headquarters of Mohammedan and Turkish power, there stands the Bible House, where the British and American societies unite, and have their offices and stores. To this important position in the heart of Islam the Bible Society Depot was removed from Pera after the Crimean war in 1855. Here, in room after room, one sees tier upon tier of Bibles and Testaments, Psalms, gospels, and other portions, in the various languages spoken under Turkish rule: Armenian, Armeno-Turkish, Greek, Greco-Turkish, Hebrew, Spanish, Bulgarian, Albanian, and Arabic. Here I met the esteemed Dr. Bliss, secretary of the American Society, and brother of the well-known Dr. Bliss of Beyrout. Here, also, I found the Rev. Dr. Thomson and Mr. Christie, of the British and Foreign Society, and the colporteurs Goldstein and another. Here every day at noon, a prayer-meeting is held, attended by most of the employés of both societies, to implore God's blessing upon the work done. Thirty thousand copies of portions of the Scriptures were sold last year. There is hardly a district, town or village, in Asiatic Turkey where at least one copy of the Bible is not to be found; and the publications of the Protestant Missionary press are more numerous than those of any other in the empire.

Thus in the midst of the lifeless or torpid ancient churches of Turkey, a new Protestant Oriental church has sprung up which now ministers to 92 congregations with 6,000 communicants, and 30,000 persons in attendance. Also 300 day-schools, and upwards of 11,000 scholars, 20 colleges and high schools with 800 scholars and 280 preaching stations. In these are employed 132 American missionaries and professors, female American teachers, and upwards of 500 native instructors. The country is divided for mission purposes into three provinces. The Western province has its headquarters in Constantinople, and includes 30 churches with 1,500 communicants. The Central province has its headquarters at Aintab, north of Antioch and Aleppo, and includes 26 churches with 2,600 members. The Eastern province has its headquarters at Erzeroum, and contains 33 churches with 1,800 members. These churches may be said to be based doctrinally on the Westminster Confession of Faith; subscription, however, not being demanded, and in government they are half Presbyterian and half Congregational. It was not originally the design of the missionaries to set up a new organisation, but simply to revive spiritual life in the old Eastern churches. But the ecclesiastical rulers in these churches, after some years of milder persecution, deliberately cut off from their communion all who would not accept the superstitions and errors of the old, and thus no alternative remained but to form, under the common protection of the state, Protestant churches that should be free.

Politically, as well as religiously, this movement and the work of American philanthropy in the East, thus briefly sketched, cannot be ignored by any who would rightly estimate the future of the various nationalities under Turkish rule. Side by side with the absolutism, the barbarism, the licentiousness, which have so long held their baneful and blighting sway over these fair lands, there has been spreading the leaven of intelligence and liberty, of purity of life and of manners, which true Christianity always carries in its train; and the people, long in darkness and in slavery, are being prepared for the independence and enlightenment which await them when, let us hope at no distant day, they shall obtain their freedom. Mohammedanism itself is catching somewhat of the influence. Mohammedans regard these Protestants with esteem. "Protestants will not lie;" "Protestants can be trusted:" such are the remarks they make. Last year, in Kurdistan, a savage Koord accepted the word of a Protestant when on the point of plundering his household, on this simple ground: "I can believe you; you are a Protestant." In the Berlin treaty, moreover, freedom of religion for all men is no less than five times in elaborate phrase affirmed.

Above all, to the thoughtful Christian, watching the progress of the kingdom of Christ, these labours of the American Puritans are full of hope and promise. A blessed retaliation it is that America, which first derived her Gospel light and freedom from Europe and from England, should now be honoured to bring back that light and freedom to the very lands whence first they sprang. To the lands of the Bible and of the early Creeds, so long overshadowed by a degenerate Christianity and overrun by the infatuated votaries of Islam, Christianised America is now republishing the Bible truths and the Gospel doctrines which first shone forth in Palestine, and first were formulated in Nicæa, Chalcedon, and Constantinople.

THE PULPIT IN THE FAMILY.

THE NAME JESUS.

"Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for He shall save his people from their sins."—Matt. i. 21.

THESE words set briefly and clearly before us the great purpose of our Lord's coming into the world. His life, with its many strange incidents and its works of wonder; His teaching, with its patient love and its deep searching wisdom; His death, with its sorrow and shame, were all directed for the accomplishment of this great object. All other purposes were subordinate to this; whatever was said and done was all with the view of promoting this grand purpose of salvation. Therefore these words of the angel, uttered before the birth of Christ, stand most appropriately at the very commencement of the Gospel history. They remind us that in this book, in the life of this wonderful Teacher, we are to see, above all, the history of human redemption. Whatever other points of interest may be in them, and there are very many points of extreme interest, this is the one great absorbing theme: that which gives to the Book and to the Life an everlasting interest.

The purpose is briefly expressed in the text, but it is a very comprehensive one—Salvation. Not simply or chiefly to deliver men from any punishment to which for their sins they were liable, did Christ come; it was from sin that He came to save His people; not to relax the terrors of God's justice, and procure for men a hope of heaven, but to renew men again in the image of God, to relieve them from the burden of guilt, and to overthrow the power and influence of sin in the heart. He came to oppose and crush and conquer this evil influence that had so blighted the beauty of God's moral creation. He came to lead us back to the love of that holiness which is the image of God; to show us in our ignorance a perfect pattern of that pure and holy character which God intended that we should bear. He came to give an impulse of increased strength and energy to the better principles within us, to set them free from the dominion of our lower and baser nature, to create in us new hearts and right spirits, to animate us to more zeal in struggling against the power of evil in our hearts and in our lives, to awaken in us new and stronger desires to rise above what is mean and selfish and temporal and earthly, and to aspire to the practice and love of what is pure and noble and holy and godlike and eternal. He came to summon us to renounce and cast off the image and influence of Satan, and to put on the new man which after the image of God is renewed in righteousness and true holiness; to follow Him, and under His standard to fight against all that was bad in the world and in ourselves. In a word, Christ came among men to abolish the universal dominion of evil, to make men better, purer, holier, nobler, freer from sin, more like the great Father in whose image we were at first created.

This was His great work on the earth; this was the business which the Father had entrusted to His care; and in all His life and teaching this great purpose was constantly kept in view. Whatever He said and did was all directed to the great end of saving His people from their sins. If He instructed men, it was that they might see more clearly the nature of the tyranny under which they lived, and might understand better the nature of that image of God which He wished to restore in them. If He reproved them, it was that they might be ashamed of their willing surrender of themselves to the influence of evil. When He saw any love of good, it was His care to foster and promote it, waiting so tenderly and patiently on the feeble, uncertain steps of those who attempted to follow Him, sparing no pains to win men back to God, unmasking hypocrisy, rebuking vice, censuring pride, commending lowliness, praising self-denial, holding up before all the image of purity and truth, and seeking, by all that love and wisdom could do, to induce men to forsake that which was evil and to follow that which was good. By wisdom, by entreaty, by fear, by authority, but most of all, by the gentle influences of love, He sought to save men from sin, and to win them back to the knowledge and service of God. His character, His life, and chiefly His death, appealed to all the emotions of love and gratitude that were in men, if haply they might be drawn to love and follow One so gentle, so humble, so patient, so willing to receive all that came to Him, so full of grace and truth, forgiving His murderers, praying for His enemies, willingly going up to Jerusalem, the great Paschal, spotless Lamb, to make atonement for the sins of men, lifted up on the cross that the sight of such love might draw all men unto Him. Such, therefore, was the purpose of Christ's life, and such the means by which He sought to effect it.

And as we read the Gospel history, and follow the life which was devoted to this great purpose, we are compelled to observe that our Lord's ministry was received in widely different manners by those amongst whom He taught. Some believed, we are told, and some believed not; some left all and followed Him; abandoning everything at His word; others had doubts and hesitation, and wished to postpone their following till they had first of all accomplished something else. Some were glad to hear His voice and thronged to listen to Him; some entreated Him to depart from their neighbourhood; some listened with joy to His words as to the words of life; some went away sorrowful; some followed Him to the end; some abandoned Him when difficulties seemed gathering round His path. Thus His life and His teaching served as great tests to divide men into two classes, those who were willing to follow Him, and those who hated Him. His summons: "Follow Me," "Come to Me," "Take My yoke upon you," was like the fan of the husbandman separating the wheat from the chaff. All were called, all were invited, but many refused; only the smaller part were willing to follow His guidance through evil report, and through good report. Thus we see what is meant by the words His people in the angel's announcement, "He shall save His people from their sins." His people are those who have heard His voice and followed Him, who, with much diffidence and faintness it may be, yet with honesty and from the heart, have sought to walk in His steps; those who have attempted to imbibe His spirit and to conform to His example; and it is those only whom He will save from their sins. It is to them the benefit of His birth and life and death are confined.

They are renewed and regenerated, and the image of God is restored in them. "My sheep," says Christ, "hear My voice and follow Me." His people hear His voice summoning them to believe and to obey, and they reply, "Lord, we believe; help Thou our unbelief," and they forthwith arise, and leave all, and follow Him. And He cheers and guides, and animates them in their course, and has left them the promise of a Comforter to be ever with them. He has bequeathed them the assurance of peace and reconciliation with God to support them in all difficulties. For those who refused to hear His voice, for those who pursued resolutely their own sinful way, who declined to forsake their pride or their hypocrisy or their covetousness or their uncleanness, for those Christ came not to provide salvation—He saves people from sin, He provides no salvation for men who will not abandon their sins.

God Himself manifest in the flesh was to call upon men to turn from their wickedness and live. As St. Paul expresses it, "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

Such was Christ's salvation while He lived and walked on this visible earth so many centuries ago, and such it is still. The Saviour has lived and died for us and amongst us, that He might save His people from their sins. He has long ago left this scene and returned to the bosom of the Father, but still, in the story of His life as recorded in the Scriptures, in the ordinances of His Church, in the exhortations of His ministers, in the promptings of conscience, in the suggestions of His spirit dwelling in us, we hear that voice which called upon the publicans and Pharisees, the harlots and Sadducees of ancient Judæa to leave their sins and follow Him. Still His call divides the Christian world into the two great opposing factions of the friends and enemies of Christ, those who follow Him and those who cleave to their sins; those who are His people and who hope and pray to be delivered and saved from their sins through Him; and those who when they think of salvation, think of it as a future blessing which they hope somehow to obtain without any effort of self-denial, without any diligent endeavour to follow in the footsteps of Christ's holy and humble life. It was of no avail to the Jews of our Lord's time that they heard His voice calling them to follow Him and be saved, if they remained as before subject to sin, and refused to follow His example; it was not the mere hearing of His call that was to benefit them, but the honest effort with His help to obey it. And it will be of no avail to us that the same call is again addressed to us, that the same assurance of God's love and forgiveness is made to us, that the same story of that perfect life of meekness and holiness and love is read over to us, and that our thoughts are turned to it, unless we forsake all and follow Him. We must join Him in fighting against the sin which in so many shapes rules over us. There must be, by His grace, kindled in our hearts some feeling of love to God, some honest resolution to repent and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance. He may teach in our streets as He taught in the streets of Jerusalem, we may be familiar with His call, we may even teach in His name, as we have all been baptized in it; but if all this is mere empty outward form, if there has been no sincere attempt to follow Him in the example of His life, then in spite of all these privileges, Christ will only say to us what He said of old, "Ye are not of My sheep. He that is not with Me is against Me. Depart from Me, I never knew you." We have again begun another year with all its well-ordered cycle of religious instruction, and the end of all should be that we might become the people of God, and be saved from our sins.

Wisdom is far above Rubies.

WISDOM is beautiful, gain her, my son,
Thou hast a treasury of wealth untold,
Far above rubies, diamonds, or gold;
She will be sought of thee and wooed ere won,
Give her thy heart, and she will lead thee on
To perfect peace and pleasures manifold;
Blessings shall compass thee till thou art old,
Aye, even till life's latest hour has run.
Immortal beauty is upon her face,
Her eyes are e'er toward the heavenly land,
True as the magnet her outstretched right hand
Unerring points up to her native place.
Whate'er thy earthly lot, is Wisdom thine
Thou hast indeed a heritage divine.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

JANUARY 23.

THE BIRTH OF JESUS. (LUKE II. 8–20.)

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 14.—'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.'

CONNECTION.—After the return of Mary to her home in Nazareth must be placed the angel's visit in a dream to Joseph (Matt. i. 18–23). Then came the decree of Cæsar Augustus which brought Joseph and Mary from Nazareth (70 miles distant) to Bethlehem, after the Jewish, not the Roman custom.

> The discussion of these points hardly belongs to the present lesson. The correctness of St. Luke's note of time, when Cyrenius (Publius Sulpicius Quirinus) was governor of Syria, has been fully established by modern researches.*

I. THE SHEPHERDS AND THE ANGEL.—Read vers. 8, 9. The field, or hilly slopes, about Bethlehem, with the little valley at their foot, had a famous place in Jewish story. There Jacob had fed his flocks in the sad days when Rachel died (Gen. xxxv. 19); there Boaz walked among his reapers, and thither came Ruth from Moab to put her trust under the wings of Israel's God (Ruth ii. 12). There David kept his father Jesse's flocks, and, we may be sure, composed his earlier Psalms. On those hill-sides, we learn from Jewish writers, the sheep destined for the Temple sacrifices were pastured around the Tower of Edar, i.e., of 'the flock.' Such associations may well have been present to the minds of the devout shepherds, as they watched their flocks by night, beneath the bright Syrian stars, and talked together of the hope of Israel.

> Nothing can certainly be gathered here as to the season of the Nativity. On the one hand, the flocks were generally driven home in November, to escape the 'early rains,' but, on the other, they were often led out again near the end of December, when the herbage is fresh, and the flowers bloom after the rain.

Then a sudden glory lighted up the scene, and an angel was by their side! How many angelic visits had there already been in connection with these events? Probably the same

* It may be useful to remind some readers that the difficulty has arisen from the fact that 'Cyrenius' is known to have been proconsul of Syria at the time of the 'taxing,' Acts v. 37, made by the Emperor, on the deposition of Archelaus, ten or eleven years after the birth of Christ. Hence, different explanations of St. Luke's words: 'The taxing was made before Cyrenius was governor,' or 'The taxing first took effect when Cyrenius was governor,' or (as Paley), Cyrenius is called 'governor' by anticipation, having actually begun the enrolment in another capacity. But all these explanations, more or less admissible in themselves, are set aside by the learned labours of Dr. A. W. Zumpt, who shows that Cyrenius was in all probability twice proconsul of Syria: at the era of our Lord's birth, as well as after the fall of Archelaus. For the evidence, see any of the later Lives of Christ, Bible Dictionaries, or critical Commentaries; and in particular, Dean Merivale's History of the Romans under the Empire, in loc.

angel, Gabriel, appeared on each occasion. What was the first feeling of those to whom the angel came?

II. The Angel's Tidings.—Read vers. 10–14. Note the first words of the angel; so to Zacharias, to Mary, ch. i. 13, 30. Good tidings—the word in the original is the same as that used for preaching the Gospel. To all people; lit., to all the people, Israel, to whom first the good tidings came. Unto you, 'the shepherds to whom I speak.' So the Gospel which is for all comes home to each one. Saviour, Christ, Lord; the threefold name—Jesus; the promised Messiah, or 'Anointed One'; King of heaven and earth. In the city of David—Bethlehem; so fulfilling the ancient prophecy. But how should the Infant King be known? A sign, or token, is given to distinguish this Infant from all the rest. 'No halo of light around His head, as we see in pictures, no angels visible hovering above Him.' Swaddling clothes were the dress of all infants: but only this one would be lying in a (the) manger. This not only would be a guide to the shepherds, but was the sign of 'great humility,' on the announcement of which the heavenly song burst forth. The heavenly host, or army, Psa. lxviii. 17; Matt. xxvi. 53. Their song, the Golden Text, the Gloria in Excelsis (so called from its first words in Latin) tells of the honour of God in the salvation of men. For this the angels care, 1 Peter i. 12. Glory, praise for His wisdom, power, love. In the highest, i.e., in heaven. See Rev. v. 12. On earth peace, peace with God, reconciliation; peace of conscience; peace of men one with another. The first blessing announced, and among the last promised by Jesus, John xiv. 27. He is the 'Prince of Peace,' Isa. ix. 6; (Eph. ii. 14–18). Good will toward or among men, i.e., God's good will. His 'good pleasure' appears in this great Gift. Isa. liii. 10; Eph. i. 5. Compare Matt. iii. 17, and corresponding passages. The salvation of sinners is God's 'delight.'

Another reading divides the heavenly strain into two parts:

'Glory to God in the highest,
And peace on earth to men of good will.'

See Keble's Christmas Hymn:

'Glory to God on high, on earth be peace,
And love towards men of love—salvation and release.'

Yet even if this reading should be adopted, the 'men of good will' must rather be taken as 'men of God's good will'—objects of His choice and pleasure. We prefer, however, the text as it stands, in its threefold division. It is of His love to mankind at large that the angels speak; and this they celebrate as revealed to heaven and earth, in heaven awakening praise, on earth diffusing peace.

III. Visit of the Shepherds to Bethlehem, and their Return.—Read vers. 15–20. With haste they left their flocks, for a greater interest called them! They found what they sought; these shepherds were the first to find the Saviour. They were the first also to spread the news; probably to the travellers who would be stirring around the 'inn' at early dawn. These were the first hearers of the Gospel, and shepherds were the earliest evangelists! How were the tidings received? Men wondered, it is not said that they believed. Little indeed did they know the true meaning of the tidings which thus reached their ears! Yet the great purpose of God was answered. These shepherds were important witnesses to the facts, that the Son of Mary was born in Bethlehem (not in Nazareth, as the Jews afterwards said); that His birth had been announced and His saving work made known by messengers from heaven. No doubt the news also would in some way or other reach Jerusalem, only six miles away; adding to the excitement when, a few months afterwards, the 'wise men' came with similar tidings, Matt. ii. Observe the different effect produced in different hearers: the wonder of people generally, the silent thoughtfulness of Mary, the joy and praise of the shepherds, who nevertheless returned to their daily work, to be no more heard of in the Gospel story.

'Did any of these shepherds live to witness the mighty works of Jesus? To hear Him speak as never man spoke before? To behold Him "despised and rejected," crucified, dead and buried, but soon triumphant over death and risen from the grave? Was there one of them among the five hundred to whom He showed Himself in Galilee after His resurrection, or among the hundred and twenty on whom He shed down the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost? We cannot tell. It is quite possible: for the manger and the cross were parted by little more than three-and-thirty years. And it is not profitless to consider any question which helps us to realise the men and women we read of in the Bible, and whom we may hope to meet and converse with in the paradise of God. For we "believe in the communion of saints."'*

Questions.

1. Where was Bethlehem? Meaning of the name? Why called Bethlehem Ephratah? What prophecy had marked it out as the birthplace of the Messiah?

2. Show that it is not unlikely that the 'inn' or public khan of Bethlehem formed part of David's ancient heritage.†

3. What heavenly songs in Scripture may be compared with this Gloria in Excelsis?

4. What differences of meaning are there in the two readings of the angel's song?

5. What lessons may be learned from the revelation to the shepherds, and their manner of receiving it?

* The 'manger' was probably the range of stone cattle-cribs belonging to the inn, or khan; or perhaps it was the ledge or shelf that ran round the stable wall; this would be wide enough for a rough couch, and would be cleared on occasion of special pressure. We need not suppose, as in old pictures, the oxen standing around.

* The Story of Christmas (R. T. S.).

† See Jeremiah xli. 17 compared with 2 Sam. xix. 38. It should be noted that the khan of a mountain-village like Bethlehem, would be among its most substantial and permanent buildings: and the 'manger' may have been hewn out of the limestone rock, or a natural grotto, as early tradition has it.

THE MYSTERIOUS LIGHT.

II.

ARCHIE rose from his little bed, and dressed himself by the light which the moonbeams shed through the window; then, very softly, he stole down a narrow back staircase, which he reached by a door opening out of his own little room without passing through his mother's chamber. He stood at length in the great entrance hall, where the moonlight streaming in through the large oriel window, showed the antlered stags' heads with which the place was adorned, and made the weapons glint fitfully which hung upon the walls. How grave the stags' heads looked, quite as if they meant to speak to him; he certainly was beginning to feel rather as if he should like some living companion, when a living companion appeared at his side, making him start a little, it is true, with the touch of his cold nose. This was Bellman, the big, beautiful deerhound; the old huntsman had named him Bellman because of the musical deepness of his bay, and had given him as a present to little Sir Archie.

"Bellman, will you go with me to see what the light is in the ruined castle?" asked the child.

And the dog said "yes" with a wag of the tail, and the pair went on together.

And now a sudden difficulty rose up before Archie: how was he to get out? How strange it was that he should not have thought of that before in his eagerness. The chief entrance was all bolted and barred; he turned to a little side-door, and, oh joy! that yielded to his small hand. The fact was, one of the maids had been out for a late gossip, and being frightened at the glow of the dreaded light, had run in in such a hurry that she had forgotten to fasten the door behind her.

They were in the garden now, he and Bellman. How the dewdrops that hung upon the grass were glistening in the moonshine, just like so many bright eyes looking at him, and how broad and white the face of the sun-dial was. It surely was staring up at the stars, and how odd it was to find the bed of snowdrops, which he had been playing round this morning, with every petal closed; and what a strange feeling it was to be out thus, all alone, in the middle of the night, with no one but Bellman at his side.

The night wind came sweeping softly past him, lifting gently his curls, and he fancied it was the touch of the wings of angels who were going with him; and, folding his little hands, he began to say some of his texts and hymns. Then he put one arm round Bellman's neck, and began a low, confidential talk with him; and the dog looked very wise, and fondled his huge head against the boy's cheek.

On they went in the moonlight, and now they were crossing the little bridge that led over the stream; what a noise the water was making to-night. The rising ground on which the ruined castle stood, was reached very soon, for it was only a very short distance from the hall. He could see the light now plain enough, casting down a yellow gleam towards him. His heart beat quicker, he threw back his little head with a determined movement, and planted his small feet very firmly as he mounted the hill.

At last they were at the entrance of the ruin, and were looking in. What did Archie see there? An old man bending over a bright fire, busying himself, as it appeared, very assiduously, with one or two vessels which were placed upon it. He had his back to the child, and Archie stood watching him wonderingly for some moments, not quite knowing whether to advance or draw back. He might go home now, and tell what the light was. But then he glanced up at the sky and fancied Joseph, and King David, and all his favourite Scripture heroes were looking down at him from it, and made up his mind to enter the place.

Just then the old man happened to turn round. A low exclamation of surprise escaped him as he beheld the child standing there in the ruddy firelight, one little foot slightly advanced, his face full of serious wonder, but very sweet.

"Little one, what do you want here?" said the stranger, fixing his eyes on the child with such a gentle look in them that Archie felt no touch of fear.

"My mother wants to know why you keep this bright fire burning here in the ruins," answered the boy. "I am come to see for her. Besides, I don't understand why, but it pleases the dear Lord in heaven my coming here; it is doing something for Him."

When the little fellow spoke of his mother, the old man cast at first a quick suspicious glance at him, but when his clear young voice uttered those words which told of his simple, childish faith, his face again softened.

"The dear Lord in heaven, the dear Lord in heaven," he repeated in a low, trembling tone; "there was a time when I loved his service, but He smote me sore, and I rebelled against Him."

And as he spoke, a tear ran slowly down his withered cheek.

"Are you unhappy?" asked the child, going close to him, and taking hold of his hand and looking up at him with his earnest eyes.

Then the old man cried out, "How like he is to what he was at his age—just the same bright hair!" and fell a-sobbing as if his heart would burst.

The child stood gazing at him with bewildered pity in his face. He stroked his hand, and was just going to say something to comfort him, when suddenly he heard his name spoken by a dear, familiar voice close behind him. He started round, and the next moment he was in his mother's arms.

Lady Agnes had come out herself with the intention of reconnoitring round the ruined castle with its mysterious light, when she met Bellman, her little son's dog, to her great surprise, wandering just outside the old, grey walls, for she knew that the hound never went abroad at night. Then, to her far more violent astonishment, to which was added sudden alarm, she had thought she heard her boy's voice within the ruins; motherly anxiety had thereupon overcome every other feeling, and she had rushed in, not knowing what to fear or what to expect.

A few minutes after that the whole mystery of the light in the ruin was made known to Lady Agnes. The old man recognised her at once, for he had seen her in former days ride past his house. He knew that his secret was now discovered, and knowing the lady's reputation for large-hearted, Christian kindliness, he thought it best to tell her the plain, simple truth. His story was shortly this. He had once been a flourishing tradesman, working with his only and well-loved son at the same business. But some little time ago his son had been implicated in an insurrection in the west against the government, and had been condemned to several years in gaol. The old man had entirely lost his trade when this younger and stronger arm was taken from his side; his small savings were quickly expended, and he was a beggar.

He wandered about, living on any chance work that might fall in his way, until he happened to become servant to a man who was an alchemist, and who, according to one of the strange delusions of the time, believed he could make gold. The old man learned the false art, and then, knowing that after a certain number of years his son might be freed by payment of a sum of money, resolved to make enough gold if he could to effect his release. In order to carry on his proceedings unnoticed, and fearing greatly that any treasure would be stolen from him, he sought out a retired place for his work-shop, and chose the old ruined castle. He laboured at his unprofitable task by night, hid away his crucibles and other tools in a corner of the old building, and busied himself by day in other work, which he had met with at a village a few miles off. At first he had had no notion that he should create such an uncomfortable sensation in the neighbourhood, but when he found it out, he had selfishly gone on with his own schemes, caring nothing for the trouble and terror he was causing.

Lady Agnes forgave the poor man, like a true Christian woman, and repaid the wrong he had done her and her tenantry by an act of solid kindness. She made his case known to the Queen, who, at the Lady Agnes's request, granted the young man a free pardon, and the happy, grateful father once more held his son in his arms.

Years after, when Sir Archibald Needham was a distinguished naval officer, sharing in the honours of the great and glorious days which saw the Spanish Armada fly before the English flag, Lady Agnes, her bright hair turned now to silver, yet with a face still which it did sad eyes good to look upon, would sit with another little Archie on her knee, and tell him the story of the light in the ruined castle, and bid him be as simply, truly brave for God as his father had been that night long ago.

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .

WOODLAND SOUNDS.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

CHAPTER I.—AN OLD HOVEL.

THERE was not another home like it in all the parish of Broadmoor. It was a half-ruined hut, with walls bulging outwards, and a ragged roof of old thatch, overgrown with moss and yellow stone-crop. A rusty iron pipe in one corner served as a chimney to the flat hearth, which was the only fireplace within; and a very small lattice-window of greenish glass, with a bull's-eye in each pane, let in but little of the summer sunshine, and hardly a gleam of the winter's gloomy light. Only a few yards off the hut could not be distinguished from the ruins of an old lime-kiln, near which it had been built to shelter the lime-burners during their intervals of work. There was but one room downstairs, with an earthen floor trodden hard by the trampling of heavy feet, whilst under the thatch there was a little loft, reached by a steep ladder and a square hole in the ceiling, where the roof came down on each side to the rough flooring, and nowhere was there height enough for even a short person to stand upright.

The furniture was as rude and simple as the home itself. The good household chattels, on which Ruth Medway had prided herself when she lived in her pretty cottage in the village street, had never come to this poor hovel. There was a broken chair or two, a table-top propped upon an unbarked trunk of a young fir-tree from the woods behind the lime-kiln, a little cracked crockery, two or three old boxes, and the indispensable saucepan and kettle in which she did all her cooking. Upstairs was a low pallet bedstead with a flock-bed, and, on the floor beside, a mattress stuffed with chaff, close under the roof, where the thatch must almost have touched the sleeper's face. There was no window into this loft; the only light came through the square hole in the floor.

"Home is home, be it never so homely;" and Ruth Medway had learned to love the quiet place where her youngest child and her dearest had been born. Behind the house lay the Lime-kiln Woods; once a busy place of quarries and kilns, but left long ago to the growth of trees and brushwood, the haunt of all kinds of wild woodland creatures, hollow with rabbit-burrows, and thickly peopled with singing birds, and with the game that the squire loved to preserve. Excepting in the shooting season, when the sharp crack of guns was to be heard all day long, there was no noise to drown the buzz of the humble-bee, and the low whirring of the unseen grasshopper, and the hundred faint and delicate sounds which fill the stillness of an unfrequented greenwood. Day and night, summer and winter, had their special signs and sounds there, all well-known to Ishmael, the youngest son of old Humphrey Medway.

He was the youngest son, and the most unwelcome to his father. Humphrey had given but a scanty welcome to his first-born child, and each successor had been received with growing surliness. Ishmael came the last, when his mother's hair was already grey, and her back bent with hard toil at out-door labour. The eldest son was himself grown-up and married, and the little love he might have once felt for his mother had hardened into indifference; whilst the other children, those who were living, were scattered abroad, seldom caring to return home. Humphrey never mentioned any of them; but sometimes of an evening, when Ruth rested for a little while, and sat watching the kettle boil on the crackling fire of sticks, she would count their names over on her fingers; eight names over which she sighed, but at the ninth her brown wrinkled face wore a fleeting smile as she muttered, "Ishmael."

On the whole, Ruth was not given to brooding over the past; for she lived too hard a life to keep her memory green. She had grown fond of this lonely hut, where Ishmael had been born; and he had never known any other home. There was nothing in it to prevent him keeping pet dormice, and hedgehogs found in the hollows of the wood; though the gamekeeper would not let him have a rabbit, or allow Ruth to keep a cat; and a dog was not to be thought of. But a tame starling, and the white owl which had chosen its roost under their thatch, and answered his call in the dusk, swooping noiselessly through the air, made the place full of life and interest to him. All the woods behind had been his play-ground from his earliest childhood; and not the finest house in Broadmoor could have tempted Ishmael to exchange his home for it.

Ruth had taught herself to read after she was married; when Humphrey soon began to leave her alone in the evening, and kept her sitting up late for his return from the village inn. Her loneliness had led her to reading the Bible, the only book she possessed beside a Prayer-book and an old collection of hymns. She had learned to believe quite simply, with no doubt in her inmost heart, that "God so loved the world, that He gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" and that Jesus Christ has really "given His life as a ransom" for her. With these two thoughts firmly rooted in her mind she read the Bible eagerly; and it was from its old well-worn pages she had chosen the name of her youngest and dearest child, "Ishmael; because the Lord hath heard thy affliction."

Ruth had never been a woman of many words; and she was very silent about those things which were deepest in her heart. Humphrey was accustomed to boast himself of her subjection to him, as not daring to "cheep" a word against him. In her young days she had been one of the village choir; and now Ishmael sat in the singing gallery in her old place. It was one of her greatest pleasures to creep just within the church door, where her poor clothing would be least noticed, and listen to the voices in the gallery overhead, and to join in singing "Glory be to the Father" at the close of each familiar Psalm. There her bent back seemed to ache less, and her wearied limbs felt rested. Often in the week, as she picked stones, or hoed thistles in the fields, her withered lips would murmur the words, "Glory be to the Father," and she would feel as a way-worn traveller feels in a hot and desert country, when he comes across a little fountain of fresh water springing up in his path. His journey is not over, but the living waters give him strength to go on with it.

So bad a name did Humphrey and his eldest son bear in the parish, as being idle and drunken vagabonds, that it overshadowed Ruth and Ishmael, and they found themselves banished by it from all intercourse with decent and friendly neighbours. Ishmael did not feel it until he went to the village school, where the other children were warned against Humphrey Medway's boy. The women who worked with Ruth in the fields kept aloof from her; not so much because they were better off than she was, but because she was so silent in her ways. Thus there was no companionship for them but in each other; and it was sufficient. It was enough for Ruth to think of her boy all day, and to hear his regular healthful breathing beside her all night; and for Ishmael the woods that lay all around his home gave him never-ending occupation and delight.

But though they were without friends, they were not without an enemy. The nearness of the low hovel to the woods was enough to arouse the suspicions of the squire's gamekeeper, even if he had had no reason to dislike Humphrey Medway and his family. But before Ishmael was born, there had existed a bitter hatred between Nutkin, the gamekeeper, and young Humphrey, Ishmael's eldest brother. Humphrey had succeeded in winning away from Nutkin the girl he had wished to make his wife; and though the keeper had himself married shortly afterwards, he had never forgiven the offence, or ceased to hold him and all belonging to him in bitter enmity. The very name of Medway was hateful to his ears. Of late, too, Ishmael had won two or three prizes at the village school over the head of his own boy, who was about the same age, and who lamented loudly over his defeat by old Humphrey's despised son.

Yet in spite of all Nutkin's efforts he had been unable to dislodge old Humphrey from the miserable hut. The rent of a shilling a week was paid punctually by Ruth, who would rather have gone without food than omit its regular settlement, since nothing else could keep her drunken husband and herself from the parish workhouse. The farmer who held a lease of the lime-kiln and the hut, found her work on his farmstead and showed her some little favour. So all the keeper could do was to suspect and to watch, ready to take advantage of any trespass that could be punished by the law.

For thirteen years now Ruth had worked upon the Willows farm; and many a hot summer day had Ishmael, when a baby, lain all day long under the hedgerows, carefully swathed in an old shawl, while his mother toiled in the harvest fields. He had himself begun to earn a few pence as soon as he could scare crows from the springing corn, or could help to tend the sheep in the chilly days of spring during the lambing season. For the last two years his father had been grumbling at his being an idle mouth to feed; though it was rarely Ruth saw a penny of his money, and it had been with difficulty that she had been able to keep her boy at school. But now the time was come when Ishmael must cease to be a child, and must begin to get his own living by regular work. Mr. Chipchase, the farmer, had consented to try him as waggoners' boy; and had promised if he was a good and steady lad to "make a man of him."

"Mother," said Ishmael, as they sat together on their door-sill in the long, light June evening listening to the cuckoo and the thrushes singing in the woods, "I told teacher I'm going to service on Monday; and she says I may take little Elsie into the woods to-morrow; and she'll give us dinner to eat there; for me as well as her, mother; because she says I've always been a good boy at school, and she's sorry to lose me."

"I'm glad she's sorry to lose thee," said Ruth; "and if thee weren't to sleep at home every night, I hardly know what I could do without thee, Ishmael. I almost wish thee were a tiny little lad once again."

"When I'm a man," he answered eagerly, "you shan't ever go out working in the fields, or tire yourself, mother. We'll never, never leave here, because there's no place like it; but I'll get the master to let me build a better house that'll keep you warm and dry, and we'll live together till we die; won't we, mother?"

"Please God!" she said softly, with a smile on her brown face, as she thought how much earlier she must die than the young lad, little more than a child, who sat beside her.

"I should think it would please God," answered Ishmael, in a quiet voice. "He doesn't want us to be always very poor, poorer than other folks, mother?"

"Nay, I don't know," she replied; "His own Son was born in a stable, and died upon the cross, with folks mocking at Him. I don't know what thee and me may have to go through, Ishmael. We can only say 'Please God'!"

It was late before Ishmael mounted the ladder to the close loft overhead, and crept into his bed on the floor under the low thatch. But it was after midnight when Ruth, with her wrinkled yet sinewy arms, helped her drunken husband from one rung to another, fearful every night lest her strength should fail her, and that he might fall, crippled or lifeless, on the floor below.

"Thank God!" she always cried in the depth of her soul, when his sluggish and leaden feet were safely planted on the floor above.

CHAPTER II.—IN THE WOODS.

The village school-mistress, Mrs. Clift, knew Ruth well, for she had employed her as her laundress from the time she had taken charge of the school; and no linen could be sweeter and whiter than that which Ruth washed, and dried in the sun on the gorse-bushes growing about the old lime-kiln. Ishmael had been one of the most constant and least troublesome of her scholars; and she was willing to mark her approbation of him by entrusting her little girl to his care for a long day in the Lime-kiln Woods.

The spring had come slowly on during May, and though it was already June the trees were not yet in full leaf. The delicate network of boughs overhead still kept many an open space for the sunshine to stream through; and the half-transparent leaves glistened with a green light. There was no thick tangle of burdock and thistle at present to catch their feet and hinder them as they strolled along under the hazel-bushes. Here and there patches of bluebells covered the dusky earth; and in a few rare spots, known to Ishmael, white lilies of the valley were growing amid their broad green leaves. No very tall or massive forest trees grew in the thin soil; but now and then an elm or an oak, somewhat stunted, spread out its crooked branches; and there were clumps of larches, tall and thin, growing in close companionship, with their pointed tops piercing the sky. And what a sky it was! A deeper blue than the bluebells under the hazels, with little clouds scattered over it whiter than the lilies, some of gleaming brightness, and others of a pearly grey, floating lazily along before the soft fresh westerly wind. Ishmael felt a pride in it all, as if the woods, and the flowers, and the sky belonged to himself.

"Sit down and listen, Elsie," he said, throwing himself under an elm-tree, and holding his breath for very pleasure, as he strained his ear to catch the different notes of the birds, singing in these early hours of the sunny day. There was the merry whistle of the starling—did Elsie hear that?—and the deep, soft cooing of the wood-pigeons from their great clumsy nests in the fir-trees; and the harsh cry of the jay, as he flitted across the open space between some trees, displaying his bright blue wing-feathers. Oftener than any other note, except the chirp of the sparrows, came the deep, grave caw of the rooks, as they sailed by high in the air. Or was not the clear merry song of the thrushes and blackbirds in the bushes all about them the most frequent sound of all? But Ishmael knew also the note of the kingfisher, and the woodpecker and the plaintive cry of the lapwing, and the call of the little moor-hen in the swampy ground, overgrown with water weeds, and tall bulrushes. Every sound, loud and low, of the busy woodlands was known to him; but they had never been so sweet to him as now, when, for the first time, he had a companion gazing admiringly into his face as he displayed his knowledge. Elsie was far before him in school; but here she sat with wide-open wondering eyes, drinking in every word he spoke.

"Oh, Ishmael!" she exclaimed, with a sigh of happiness and admiration, "I should think nobody in the world knows as much as you!"

Never before had Ishmael had such words spoken to him, and he felt almost dizzy. He began to think what other wonders he could show or tell to her. Yes, there were more wonderful things to disclose to her admiring eyes. The woods were beautiful; but he knew what was hidden underground as well as what lay open to the eye of day. For underneath their feet the earth was honeycombed with long, deserted galleries, and roadways, and tunnels, where ages ago the limestone had been dug, and brought to the surface by level shafts opening on the hill slopes. Far away from the light of the sun, these subterranean paths ran in many windings and twistings. Even on the surface there were indications of them in basin-like hollows of varying depths and sizes, where the treacherous ground had sunk in. Some of these hollows were filled with water, forming little pools, which glistened up to the sun, while others were dry basins green with turf and coltsfoot, amongst which wild strawberries grew. Ishmael and Elsie had busily gathered the small red fruit, and strung it upon long bents of grass to keep it as a dessert to the dinner they were going to eat in the woods. Ishmael hastily formed a surprise for Elsie. When the right minute came, when she was tired and hungry, and the sun beat hotly upon them, he would take her to the cool shelter of a cave near at hand, where he could show to her the entrance into the old limestone quarry.

They came at length to a broad open glade, stretching far away between two rows of trees, which was the famous spot for shooting-bouts in the autumn, when the squire's visitors spent whole days in sport. Here in the long, untrodden grass lay the old cartridge-cases thrown hastily away last year. Ishmael told Elsie how the crackling of the guns rang all day long, and how the smell of the gunpowder and its thick smoke tainted the sweet air; and how, at night, when all was over, there seemed a sorrowful silence in the wood, as if its timorous inhabitants had been scared into utter terror.

"And the rabbits keep in their burrows," said Ishmael; "and don't come out to play after sunset, like they do other nights, aye, by hundreds and thousands, running after one another, and tumbling about like us on the green, when we've a holiday; and you can see their little white pads tossing about in the dusk. If you sit very still they'll come a'most to your feet. And the bats fly about, and the cockchafers, and big white owls, that make no noise when they fly. I'll show you our big owl at home before you go home to-night."

They were sauntering along the glade slowly, when suddenly, from under their very feet, as it seemed to Elsie, there sprang up, with a loud whirr and a great fluttering of wings, a pheasant which had been sitting close on her nest among the long grass, till their feet nearly touched her. Elsie uttered a little scream of fright; but Ishmael was down on his knees in a moment, parting the tangled grass which hid the nest. There lay a cluster of brown eggs, ten of them, packed closely together, and warm with the brooding heat of the mother-hen.

"Oh!" cried Elsie, eagerly, "can't we have some of them for dinner? Only we can't cook them, you know, without a fire and a saucepan."

"Ay, but we can!" answered Ishmael, proud of doing what seemed impossible to his companion; "we can make a fire, and roast one in the ashes. We won't take more than four, two apiece; and I can tell which are the newest laid. See, I've got a match in my pocket, and we'll pick some sticks, and light a fire in a place I know of, where nobody can ever find us."

Gathering up the sticks as they went along he led Elsie to his cave. It was situated about halfway down a steep slope which was overgrown with hazel-bushes and brambles. The low archway of the entrance was little more than a yard high, and was quite concealed by the brushwood. Within, the roof rose to a good height, and the floor of limestone was dry, forming altogether a pleasant retreat, large enough to hold from twenty to thirty persons. A green twilight reached them through the closely-interwoven network of underwood; and a delicious coolness made it the pleasantest place possible now the sun was so high in the blue sky.

"Look, Elsie," said Ishmael, leading her to the back of the cave, where a small hole, not unlike a large rabbit-burrow, led darkly into some space beyond, "I've crawled through there many a time; and if it wasn't for your frock we'd go now—you and me. Oh, it goes for miles and miles under the wood; and sometimes there's a little bit o' light coming through cracks in the ground; and there are pools all black and still, with just a tiny sparkle on them to show where they are; and there are glistening stones hanging down from the roof, and drops o' water always falling, falling from them. Oh, I wish you were a boy, and could creep in along with me!"

"Oh, couldn't I?" cried Elsie.

"No, it 'ud never do," he said decisively. "Never mind; I'll light the fire now, and we'll have our dinner."

The fire was quickly kindled, and after it had died down a little, the four eggs were covered over with hot embers, and left to roast. Ishmael had brought a can of sparkling water from a little spring trickling down the rock, whilst Elsie had laid out their dinner. Now she was sitting beside it on a big stone, with her hands lying idly on her lap in simple enjoyment, and her blue eyes gazing out happily on the waving branches outside, whose shadows flickered up to her feet in a constant dance.

"Oh, Ishmael," she cried, "I must say the song mother taught me about, 'That's the way for Billy and me.' It seems as if it was made for us; and I'll say them while the eggs are roasting.

"Where the pools are bright and deep,
Where the grey trout lies asleep,
Up the river and over the lea,
That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the blackbird sings the latest,
Where the hawthorn blooms the sweetest,
Where the nestlings chirp and flee,
That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the mowers mow the cleanest,
Where the hay lies thickest and greenest,
There to trace the homeward bee,
That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the hazel-bank is steepest,
Where the shadow falls the deepest,
Where the clustering nuts fall free,
That's the way for Billy and me.

Why the boys should drive away
Little maidens in their play,
Or love to banter and fight so well,
That's a thing I never could tell.

But this I know, I love to play
Through the meadow, among the hay;
Up the water, and over the lea,
That's the way for Billy and me.'" *

But Elsie had scarcely finished the last line, when she saw the branches before her slowly parted, and a man's head bent down, and looking into their cave. It was a brown, burnt, rugged face: she knew it well enough, but she had never liked it, and at this moment it filled her with vague terror. Ishmael was kneeling by the red and smouldering fire, and touching the eggs with the tips of his fingers. So absorbed was he that he did not notice the darkening of the green twilight as the gamekeeper came stooping under the archway; and he laughed a low, quiet laugh of delight as he took one of the eggs from its hot bed.

"That one's done, Elsie," he exclaimed gaily.

"What's done?" asked Nutkin's harsh voice close beside him. "I saw the smoke from your fire, you young rascal, and I came to see what mischief you're up to. What, pheasants' eggs, pheasants' eggs! Would nothing else serve you for your dinner?"

Ishmael knelt unable to stir, and gazing up aghast into the gamekeeper's angry, yet triumphant face. What could he say? There were the eggs in the ashes between them; he could not even drop the one he was holding in his outstretched hand. He felt as if he could neither move nor speak. He had no right to those eggs; they were stolen; but he had not thought of that when Elsie had uttered her childish wish.

"I suppose you know," said Nutkin, very slowly, as if he meant every word to strike home, "that I shall take you to gaol for this."

"Oh no, no!" cried Elsie, in an agony of fright; "we didn't know it was any harm, did we, Ishmael? The eggs were on the ground, and we might have trodden on them. Don't send us to gaol."

"It's not you, only this young scoundrel," continued Nutkin; "you may have to go before the justices, but it's him as 'll go to gaol for poaching and stealing. I've told the squire scores of times, and now he'll believe me. Get up, you rascal, and come along with me."

Suddenly Ishmael broke into a loud and bitter cry, which rang through the cave, and seemed to be muttered back again from the old quarry.

"Oh, what will mother say when she hears of it?" he cried.

"And what will father say?" jeered the gamekeeper, "and brother Humphrey? We'll take care you don't grow up a drunkard, and a disgrace to the parish like them, my fine fellow. Come along! Elsie, you run home to your mother, and tell her to be more careful who you keep company with another time. The squire 'll believe me now."

So saying, he dragged Ishmael out of the cave, and taking a strong rope from his pocket, he knotted it into a sort of handcuff, by which he bound the lad fast to him. Elsie followed them, sobbing, to the white dusty road leading to Uptown, where there was a police-station; and then sadly watching them out of sight, she went home, almost heart-broken, to her mother.

MY BOYHOOD IN THE EAST.

I.—THE DIAMOND RING.

A FEW years ago the political world of our England was startled by the declaration from a high authority that the origin of the Ashantee war was to be found in the Straits of Malacca. Some were amused, and some treated the announcement with ridicule, and some ascribed it to a passion for causing surprises, and generally it was received with incredulity. But, notwithstanding, there was substantial truth in the reference. The northern entrance to the Straits has on its western side the Sumatran state of Acheen, and on its eastern side the Malayan kingdom of Kéddak (Quedah). The friendliness of both states is necessary to secure a safe highway for European shipping on entering the Straits, and hence with both there exist treaties of peace and amity. England is their sworn friend and protector "for ever."

Now on the Western Coast of Africa, among the strips of territory which carry the flag of Britain, was the small town and fort of Elmina belonging to Holland. The laws administered and the customs levied at this spot differed from those of the British settlements on either side, and this caused frequent troubles between us and the inland traders and chiefs. Proposals (for some time secret) were made between Great Britain and Holland. The King of Acheen had offended the Dutch, and must be chastised and it may be subjugated. Let England promise not to interfere with Holland in her designs on Acheen, and Elmina should become British property. In effect this promise was given, and out of the cession of Elmina and consequent complications in the inland trade sprang the Ashantee war.

My subject has to do with the Eastern side of the entrance to these Straits. About one hundred years ago (1785) Francis Light, the master of an East Indiaman, who had become acquainted with the then Rajah of Kéddak,* and married his daughter, received from him as a marriage portion, Púlo Pínang. These words mean the "island of betel-nuts" (areca palm), but it should be observed that the word púlo is only applied to islands the insularity of which can be traced by the eye from some one point of the island. At that time the island was covered with dense forests and occupied chiefly by elephants, tigers, rhinoceroses and snakes, and on its shores stood a few miserable huts for fishermen. Under the new governor it soon began to prosper, and it has now a population of some 70,000, and has become an emporium of important trade. Of its beauty I can hardly trust myself to write. A physician * who had travelled far and long begins his chapter on it thus—"'See Naples and die!' says the Italian poet, in his wild enthusiasm for that city—what would he say of this island—the Eden of the world? On this lovely spot of earth the dream of endless spring is realised. I have never met with any one who after spending a few days in this beautiful oasis did not wish to spend the rest of his life in the delicious tranquillity and repose which this climate affords. Here is the calm loving face of Nature presenting the image of tranquil happiness—the sky always without a cloud, the sea never agitated, but smiling and basking in a continual calm."

* In this and such words as Pérak, Báttak, and Saráwak the accent is on the last syllable but one and the final k is only breathed.

There it lies before my mind's eye, this beautiful home in which I was born and spent my boyhood, with its silvery sea, its snowy beach, its stately palm-groves, its towering hills, its umbrageous dales, its thousand hues of green and gold glistening beneath a cloudless sky. Who that has seen its waterfall can ever forget it? Combine black rock with the whitest spray, the gayest flowers with the deepest green, bright sunshine with dark shadows, the noisy rush and resistless downpour of turbulent waters with the gentle flowing of a clear and cold stream, and put them all in relations of matchless picturesqueness, and the reader can imagine the scene. Retracing his steps he reaches the foot of "the great hill," and, ascending it, after a climb of nearly three thousand feet he arrives at the summit. Now let him look around. A glance shows him that this is an island and properly called púlo. Turning to the north-east he beholds an unbounded sea, dotted by Malay prahus, and Chinese junks, and it may be with here and there a British ship or steamer. To his right he will see the lake-like channel which divides the island from the Malayan mainland, and there in the distant horizon are lofty mountains. Immediately below are the eastern plains with their rice-fields and wondrous fruit-trees, and verandahed villas, ending in the town with its miniature fort, and beyond it, the deep and glassy roadstead with sloops at anchor. On the eastern plain are the plantations of coffee and sugar, and nearer, on the hill slopes, of nutmegs and cloves, the last being the finest in the world. The intervals on all sides are filled with masses of foliage of every hue of green. And as rain on the average falls on every other day, let him understand that the brighter the sunshine, the penetrating light only the more distinctly discloses the richness of these hues. Nothing in the world can exceed the verdure of the foliage in the scene before him. But this is not all. Dr. Yvan is right when he speaks of tranquillity and security. There are many beautiful scenes marred by the possibilities of desolation and death. But here there are no perils of tornado or earthquake, no withering hot winds, and scarcely ever a destructive storm. A resident of twenty-five years says he never saw a vessel driven on the shore or a large tree blown down. It is the chosen home of smiling and perennial peace.

On yonder mainland, immediately opposite the harbour, and divided from the island by the channel of about two and a half miles in width, is Province Wellesley, also ceded to Britain by the Rajah of Kéddak, and for this and the island we were to pay an annual income of about 2,000*l*. Adjoining it on the north is his ancient kingdom—consisting now of a territory 150 miles long, and about 25 broad, backed by granite mountains (abounding with tin, and in which gold is found), rising to some 6,000 feet. The present dynasty has occupied the throne for nearly three hundred years. When the treaty by which Penang was ceded was made with the Rajah, it was stipulated that England should stand by him and his successors against Siam, the hereditary foe of Kéddak. The Siamese had on several occasions overrun the country, and there had been an agreement made that the Rajah of Kéddak should every three years acknowledge his subjection, by forwarding to the King of Siam the bunga mas, or flower of gold. This sign of submission became very galling to the proud prince and his people, and was constantly being refused, and thus gave occasion for raids from the troops of Siam.

The animosity was intensified by the antagonisms of religion. The people of Kéddak were originally pagans, and pagans of the lowest type — fetish-worshippers, with whom religion is simply a gloomy and miserable superstition. But when the wave of Mohammedan conquest reached, in the twelfth century, the Eastern Archipelago, the Malayan tribes were universally overwhelmed by it, and thus Kéddak has become devoted to Islam. But the men of Siam are Buddhists, and Buddhism with its definite beliefs and humane precepts has almost always successfully maintained its ground against the assaults of Mohammedanism, and thus war with Siam meant with the men of Kéddak war with the accursed enemies of God and the prophet.

The following translation of a letter from the brother of the general commanding the Kéddak army in one of these campaigns, addressed to his mother sheltered at Penang, is interesting as indicating this feeling, strong even to fanaticism, and also as curious evidence of the continued existence among Malay Moslems of the powerful elements of their original superstition.

"I Mohammed Snarnee, make known at the feet of my beloved mother, that her letter came to hand, and I understood the whole of its contents. At present our circumstances are cheering, and we are all well in Kéddak, and my only anxiety is on your account, my mother. By the assistance of God and the Apostle, we have gained a victory over the infidels under the curse of God. While we were attacking a stockade of the accursed infidels, and going backwards and forwards, unexpectedly was seen walking in the air a beautiful green horse. Then all the generals exclaimed with a loud voice, saying, 'Behold, all ye people of Islam, the green horse come to assist us.' The green horse then soared over the camp of the Siamese (accursed infidels), but no man was upon him. Then by the almighty power of God, the horse suddenly vanished from the eyes of all, and there appeared thousands of soldiers attacking the camp of the infidels. Then all the people of Islam shouted with a great shout and rushed into the camp. The infidels fled, and by the assistance of God and the Apostle we gained a triumph, and now all is at rest. This I make known to you on the 11th day of the month. I wish to send you some rice, but the white people will not allow it to pass."

* Dr. Yvan's Six Months among the Malays.

In one of the frequent conflicts with Siam, the then reigning Rajah was so hard pressed that he was compelled to find refuge under the British flag. I have named the miniature fort on the island. It lies at its eastern extremity, with its green slopes, its broad ditch, its pierced ramparts, and a few guns with pyramids of shot here and there, and some sixty or eighty soldiers; so tiny as to seem almost a toy, but such power lies in it and all that it represents, that it is far-reaching in its influence as a "punishment to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well." There the royal fugitive landed, and, received and guarded by British sepoys, he was escorted to the house and "compound" adjoining our own. And thus it came to pass that he and my father became friendly neighbours. Nor was this all. There were several English residents, official and mercantile, who not only pitied the fugitive in his misfortunes, but regarded him as ungenerously and even unjustly dealt with by the British authorities in India. Our frequent collisions with Burmah rendered it politic that we should be on good terms with the adjoining kingdom of Siam, especially as the nations were alike in religious faith, and moreover, we were preparing to negotiate with Siam treaties of friendship and commerce. Hence not only did we withhold from the kingdom of Kéddak all material and moral aid, but even (as the letter already cited indicates) blockaded its coast so as to prevent the importation of supplies of food and of the munitions of war. The Rajah thus in effect became our prisoner, and to compel submission and peace with Siam, he was removed, under vehement protest, to a more distant residence from his country, and finally died with a broken heart, an exile from his throne and people; his second son slain in combat, and his firstborn son a captive in Siam. Eventually, however, the remonstrances and appeals of the friends of Kéddak prevailed, and for many years there has been a good understanding with Siam, and friendship with England—so much so that in the late war with Pérak, the British forces were accompanied by a detachment from the adjoining state of Kéddak.

In the temporary palace of this unhappy king I became a constant visitor and was admitted to its most secluded chambers. The little white boy—the only son of his true and kind and active friend—became his favourite companion, was caressed by his wives, and treated with marked respect by the native court. Of all the dramatic dances before the king, the boy must be a spectator, in all the feasts a guest, in all the games a playmate, and when the parting came, amid much lamentation, the sorrowing man turning to his little favourite and taking from his own finger a diamond ring, put it into the boy's hand, and bade his mother, as soon as he might be trusted with it, to have it worn by him in remembrance of the love and good wishes of his royal friend. This ring—of massive and pure gold, with two circlets of small diamonds, one sixteen in number, and the other ten, round a central and raised diamond of larger size, the whole set in silver—associated with the earliest incidents of my life which I can recollect, I wear with unabated interest, and intend to hand down to future generations, as the silent witness of a pathetic history, the enduring memorial of a remarkable friendship, and the pleasant token of the peace and prosperity which subsequently brightened the fortunes of the ancient kingdom of Kéddak, whose speech is the acknowledged classic of the Malayan people.

Medical Missionaries.*

WHERE Britain's soldier-blood was freely shed,
On many a well-contested battle-field,
The foremost rank—the victors and the dead—
Were lads who never learned to turn or yield;
From Lowland city and from Highland glen,
Came at their country's call these gallant men.

When war and wail proclaimed the Prince of Peace,
And death by torture sealed the Christian creed,
A dauntless few stood firm, and would not cease
To dare all evil powers by word and deed;
From cot and mountain, crowded street and hall,
Came forth those martyrs at the Master's call.

Our warriors' deeds are worthily enshrined
Within their nation's proud maternal heart.
Our witness-names are tenderly entwined,
Around the cross for which they did their part;
But Britain keeps a band of heroes still,
Who come from southern vale and northern hill.

And they are soldiers, though no sword is given;
Martyrs, and yet all blessings with them go;
They open, Christlike, every gate to heaven,
By touching blinded eyes, by soothing woe.
They walk, as walked the great Physician, when
He ministered on earth to stricken men.

They tread like Him a rough and lonely road,
Beset by death, despair, and mortal pain;
From aching limbs they lift disease's load,
From prisoned souls sin's ever-galling chain.
For healing of the nations far away,
Our country's bravest "do and die" to-day.

Well worthy they to wear the victor's crown;
For them the angels keep the "robe and palm;"
Our gallant band who turn from earth's renown,
To meet unnumbered foes with courage calm;
Who plant the cross of Christ in darkened lands,
And bear His banner in their stainless hands.

THE KING'S WINDOWS;

OR, GLIMPSES OF THE WONDERFUL WORKS OF GOD.

BY THE REV. E. PAXTON HOOD.

I.—A BEAUTIFUL WORLD AFTER ALL.

THERE is a fine passage in the works of one of the old Puritans of the court of Cromwell, in which he represents what it is to be hoped many since his day have felt, the pleasure of seeing in all things everywhere "the sunshine of the Godhead." As the beams from the high and sacred beauties in the face of God," says this old writer, "fall upon them, how will every bush of thorns shine in this light, how will every heap of dust sparkle as a heap of diamonds, a shining harmony of Divine excellences; what a heavenly heat or flame of Divine love and joy will each thing thus seen raise in us. What a heaven," continues the old writer, "doth he continually walk in, to whom all things round about him are hung with these curtains of Solomon, the living brightness of a Divine light; in what lovely images doth this light, as the looking-glass of eternal truth and love, present him to himself, his company, and all things round about him to him. And," he adds, "God is the substance hidden in the cloud and crowd of the creatures, then revealing Himself when He hath raised the spirit above the crowd."

Thus, following out the hint of this old writer, Peter Sterry, it will be the purpose of these papers to regard all created nature, and all the things of nature as the windows through which looking the spectator may see the King of all these lower dominions in His beauty, by their visibility witnessing to the invisible God. This God cannot be seen by us, because there is no suitableness, no proportion, in us to Him; there is that in Him which is beyond all representation by us; He is in His own person invisible, incomprehensible to us and by us, for we are only images, pictures of Him. God in His strength and life is a Being whose light and glory and blessedness may be seen in the things which He has made, even as objects are beheld through windows, or are seen reflected in mirrors. So while we read the Book of Psalms (ciii., civ., cvii.), it seems as if David everywhere in his walks with nature beheld the infinite and Divine beauty revealed in time; as he walked he heard the response of all things, they all spoke to him of One above them, behind them, beyond them, outside of them. As he walked through the night the heavens said to him, "We show forth His glory"; and the purple firmament said, "And I show forth His handywork"; the clouds said in their billowy and many-coloured magnificence, "We are His chariots." And the winds said, "He walketh on our wings"; and "I am the garment with which He covereth Himself," said the light; "He laid the beams of His chamber in us," said the waters; "He reneweth my youth," said the eagle as he darted through the immensity of heaven; "He heard my young when they cried," said the raven; "The high hills He gave us for our refuge," said the wild goats; "He blessed me," said the grasshopper, "with the dew"; "He quenched my thirst," said the wild deer, "when I panted after the water-brooks and the springs"; "Yes, we are His ministers," said the wild brooks, as they ran singing among the hills; "He sent us," said the mountain torrents, "to supply you"; "He sent us to purify you," said the lightnings; "I have found a nest," said the swallow or the sparrow, "even His courts"; "I worship Him in still repose," said the night; "And we too," said the mountains, as they seemed to kneel as if in the act of praise, "for He weighed us in His scales, and the dust of the hills in His balances." "He made me like a giant to run a race," said the sun. And then, as David heard them, he took his harp and sang to it: "The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever. The Lord shall rejoice in His works. I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live; I will sing praises to Him while I have my being. My meditation of Him shall be sweet; I will be glad in the Lord. Bless the Lord, O my soul, praise ye the Lord."

It is a beautiful world, a beautiful universe; as the wise preacher said, "He hath made everything beautiful in His time; also He hath set the world in their heart." Even perhaps while David seems listening, or we are listening to what David heard, we may hear also the notes of querulousness and complaint, "Is it a happy, is it a beautiful world after all?" There is a passage in Paley's "Natural Theology" which has vexed some readers; it is in the twenty-fifth chapter, on the goodness of God, and the writer, as if unable to restrain his feelings, joyfully exclaims: "It is a happy world after all. The air, the earth, the water, teem with delighted existence. In a spring noon or a summer's evening on whichever side I turn my eyes, myriads of happy beings crowd upon my view; the insect youth are on the wing, swarms of newborn flies are trying their pinions in the air; a bee amongst the flowers in spring is one of the most cheerful objects that can be looked upon." And then he further describes a scene, which has often been our own experience when walking along the fine sands of Shanklin in the Isle of Wight: "Walking," he says, "by the seaside in a calm evening upon a sandy shore, and with an ebbing tide, I have frequently remarked the appearance of a dark cloud, or rather very thick mist, hanging over the edge of the water to the height perhaps of half a yard, and of a breadth of two or three yards, stretching along the coast, as far as the eye could reach, and always retiring with the water; when this cloud came to be examined it proved to be nothing else than so much space filled with young shrimps in the act of bounding into the air, from the shallow margin of the water or from the wet sand. If any motion of a mute animal could express delight it was this; if they had meant to make signs of their happiness they could not have done it more intelligibly; what a sum collectively of gratification and pleasure have we here before our view." So, thought Paley, "It is a happy world after all." But there was another circumstance, which even to such minds as those who took exception to the illustration, affected them like a strong argument and did them real good; it was this: that when Paley was writing this high and cheerful philosophy, he was himself suffering intense pain from an incurable disease, which eventually carried him to the grave. That said more than the shrimps did, and finely illustrated the sense of the Christian philosopher, that "God had made everything beautiful in His time." Indeed an almost infinite margin is demanded for either an accurate or a healthful view of the beautiful and harmonious relations of things.

The universe is full of windows through which a thoughtful mind may look out and see its Author, the Great King, pass by. There are many books on the beauties, harmonies, and sublimities of Nature. It has been thought somewhat difficult to define the term beauty; beauty is the sense of harmony, either in sight or sound, in form or colour; and when that harmony is seen upon an extended and almost infinite scale it becomes sublime. There are sublime objects on the earth, but the eye and mind are more ordinarily arrested by beauty, as Paley says, "My opinion of astronomy has always been that it is not the best medium through which to prove the agency of an intelligent creator, but that being proved it shows beyond all other sciences the magnificence of His operations." But, indeed, associate the idea of God with any, with even the simplest thing, the lowliest flower, and it becomes sublime and produces impressions scarcely less profound than those which passed through the mind of Coleridge as he surveyed the glaciers of Mont Blanc:

"Who sank thy sunless pillars deep in earth?
Who filled thy countenance with rosy light?
Who made thee parent of perpetual streams?
Ye ice-falls! ye that from the mountain's brow
Adown enormous ravines slope amain—
Torrents, methinks, that heard a mighty voice
And stopped at once amid their maddest plunge!
Motionless torrents! silent cataracts!
Who made you glorious as the gates of heaven
Beneath the keen full moon? Who bade the sun
Clothe you with rainbows? Who, with living flowers,
Of loveliest blue, spread garlands at your feet?
God! let the torrents, like a shout of nations,
Answer! and let the ice-plains echo, God!
God! sing ye meadow-streams with gladsome voice!
Ye pine-groves, with your soft and soul-like sounds!
And they too have a voice, yon piles of snow,
And in their perilous fall shall thunder, God!

Ye living flowers that skirt the eternal frost!
Ye wild goats sporting round the eagle's nest!
Ye eagles, playmates of the mountain storm!
Ye lightnings, the dread arrows of the clouds!
Ye signs and wonders of the element,
Utter forth God, and fill the hills with praise!
Thou kingly spirit throned among the hills,
Thou dread ambassador from earth to heaven,
Great Hierarch! tell thou the silent sky,
And tell the stars, and tell yon rising sun,
Earth, with her thousand voices, praises God."

This grand organ-like strain of Coleridge is something like that which we have already heard from David:

"Praise God in His sanctuary!
Praise Him in the firmament of His power!
Praise him for His mighty acts!
Praise Him according to His excellent greatness!
Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord.'

The affluence of the beautiful things of the world is astonishing; especially they are to be noticed in sounds, colours, and motions, and now everywhere there is to be traced a relation between beauty and use. It is a sublime and affecting thought that enjoyment, as a rule, seems to be superadded to all existence. Lord Brougham remarks, in his "Essay on Natural Theology": "The universe might by possibility be so constructed that every contrivance might fail to produce the desired effect, the eye might be chromatic and give indistinct images; the joints might be so unhinged as to impede motion; every smell, as Paley has it, might be a taint, and every touch a sting; indeed, we know that, perfect as the frame of things actually is, a few apparent exceptions to the general beauty of the system have made many disbelieve the perfect power and perfect goodness of God, and to invent the theory of an evil creator to account for the existence of evil." It is the wonderful unity upon which we are able to look out, as we glance through the King's windows, which makes the universe transparent to us, and compels us to bow before the sense and assurance of a high and pure Being shining behind all. Even where the apparent exceptions appear, by their side appear wonderful compensations suggesting the sweetness of benevolent intentions; and it is as we take the largest views that we are filled with a sense of the most Divine benevolence. The ways of nature, while their beauty may be seen in parts and in details, have to be looked at in the great whole. There was a time when David was irritated by trouble: "I am so troubled," he said, "that I cannot sleep." He was affected by the partial views of things, but he gathered himself up and said: "This is my infirmity; I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High," that is, "I will think how long a time God has to work in." And it is thus, that from the beauty of little things we are schooled to rise up to the sublime beauty of larger things.

Thus if the world is in the heart, naturally time with us being only a form of thought, how contracted our view must be. We have read of the astronomer who had spent the long night in watching the stars, and while at breakfast in the morning he was unrolling to his wife, and attempting to explain the scroll of his calculations, and exhibiting on his paper the pathway of the planets. "See here," said he, "what a glorious sight! What a science is this of the numberless host of stars!" And just then his little boy came running in and said, "Father, father!" "Be still, my son," said the father. But the boy did not hear him, but still said, "Father, father!" pointing to the timepiece on the mantel-shelf; "see, I know all the figures on the dial, and now the hand is pointing to eight." And then the philosopher said, "Truly, my boy is my teacher, for the heavens are only the clock of God, but our dial-plates, how narrow they are!" But then man must have eternity in his heart, or he could not rise from the little calculations of the clock on his mantel-piece to the vast timepiece of the heavenly places. We sometimes make infinite things more sublime and apprehensible to us by placing them in contrast with lesser and finite things. We do not know whether Lord Brougham often ventured into verse, but there is one authentic piece of his which sets this in a strong light, and shows how all things are the windows of the King; it is his piece called the "Hymn of Nature":

"There is a God, all nature cries,
A million tongues proclaim
An Arm almighty, Mind all wise,
They bid each voice and tribute rise
To magnify His name.

Thy name! great nature's Sire Divine,
Assiduous we adore,
Forsaking godheads at whose shrine
Benighted nations' blood and wine
In vain libations pour.

Yon countless worlds through boundless space,
Millions of miles each hour,
Their mighty orbs as curious trace,
As the blue circle studs the face
Of this enamelled flower.

But Thou too mad'st the flower of day
To glitter in the dawn;
The hand that fired the lamps of day,
And blazing comets launched away,
Painted this velvet lawn.

As falls a sparrow to the ground
Obedient to Thy will,
By the same law those globes wheel round,
Each drawing each, yet all still found
In one eternal system bound;
One order to fulfil."

The same thought is expressed also in the beautiful words of Samuel Rogers, another old friend of the writer's; in his exquisite lines on a tear:

"That very law which moulds a tear,
And bids it trickle from its source;
That law preserves the earth a sphere,
And guides the planets in their course."

But probably neither Brougham nor Rogers remembered that the same great thought had been expressed in the tender words of David, in the comfortable revelation which says: "The Lord healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up all their wounds: He telleth the number of the stars; He calleth them all by their name." Thus, as we have said, the least and largest things are linked together in one great sphere of sublime and beautiful unity.

But we have been speaking of tears, and that reminds us that some may be disposed to say, "A beautiful world after all! everything beautiful in His time! is it so?" Man goes to nature very often in quite a different mood to that of Paley; to him nature is rather a torturing mystery than a beauty. "I have seen," he says, "the fields lying beneath the water; I have seen Famine stalking through the land with his brother Pestilence: I have seen mothers die and infants live; I have seen the blood-dust of the battle shower; I have seen everywhere how sin attempts to strangle life; and the ways of nature seem often in hostility to me, the winds, and hails, and rains, pierce me, the lightnings strike me, the very benevolences terrify me and overwhelm me."

And then it is to be remembered that everything is beautiful in God's time and as it keeps the time of God. Nature replies to the discontented man: "What meanest thou, pouring thy selfishness across my benevolence, thy despair across my cheerfulness, thy gloom across my grandeur? I exist in, and by, and for God; all things are beautiful in me as I am from God, and thy discontent is only that other law of sin and death which thou hast brought to thwart and oppose mine." Everything is beautiful in its time and its season, but you need to take the right point of view, an infinite standpoint to see it. The world is in the heart. Consider the nature of man; man is not a mere organ as the eye, and without annihilating the material world as Berkeley is said to have done, it is true that all the choir of heaven, and all the furniture of earth, and all those mighty bodies which compose the frame of the universe, have no subsistence without a mind, a mind to know, to perceive and to love; it is true that—

> "We receive but what we give,
> And in our life alone doth nature live;"

and hence it is

> "The owlet Atheism
> Sailing on obscene wings athwart the noon,
> Drops his blue-fringèd lids, and holds them close,
> And hooting at the glorious sun in heaven,
> Cries out, 'Where is it?'"

And hence as we need to draw the blinds and clean the windows in order that we may look out upon the glorious furniture of the gardens and the fields, so the mind of man needs to be cleared from the power of his evil feelings and sensuous impressions, in order that it may clearly apprehend the beauty of God's works and ways. Oh that world in the unrested heart! Have we not it in moments when all things appear to shake off the dust of their feet as they quit the portals of our spirits, and seem to take up their testimony against us? And are there not times when there falls a veil over the heart, so that we cannot look to the end of that which is to be abolished? It is only Faith can see that end. And if we see only our own grief, it is as when Despair—that sad Woman—sits down by the fireside, draws the blinds, and pulls close the shutters to keep out the light of the bright sun and the gladness of the green earth and the blue sky. In the great tragedy when Medea was asked, "What remains? your husband is gone, your countrymen, your wealth, what remains?" She replied, "I remain! Medea remains!" And even Marie Antoinette, in the extremest moment of her trouble, was able to say, "I count upon my own courage rather than on the course of events." And the illustrious lady and royal martyr did not count in vain. So, indeed, every Christian who is able by the Holy Spirit to lift the evil from the heart, looks out to the end. "He hath made everything beautiful in His time."

> "Take all, in a word, the truth in God's breast,
> Lies trace for trace upon ours impressed:
> Though He is so bright and we are so dim,
> We are made in His image to witness Him."

It is because man in his fallen state is out of harmony with the Divine ideal that he sees not the glory of creation. When the heart is redeemed and renewed it can see Paradise restored, and it is reached in the degree in which to the beautiful order of God's works we > "Learn to conform the order of our lives."

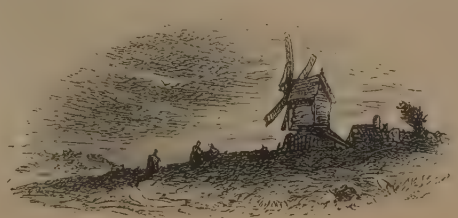
And every scene which we speak of as beautiful reminds us of this. Even the poet whose life seemed least in harmony with such things felt this, and indeed expresses it, when he says:

> "'Tis sweet to hear the watch-dog's honest bark,
> Bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home;
> 'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
> Our coming, and look brighter when we come;
> 'Tis sweet to be awaken'd by the lark,
> Or lulled by falling waters; sweet the hum
> Of bees, the voice of girls, the song of birds,
> The lisp of children, and their earliest words."

And although in all these the sentiment is born of nature and of time, yet they too reveal to us how the sweetness of external things depends upon the harmony of inward affections, how the knowledge of God depends less on acquisition and attainment than on a certain preparedness of the mind and heart within. What we call beauties are often gross deformities, rustling silks and blazing jewels concealing a form more beautiful than themselves, or set upon a forehead which in its native purity would outshine the cataract of diamonds suspended there. God's beauty is happiness in holiness, like that He himself enjoys, while He sheds for us the lustres of beauty on the way, but bids us never to rest merely in the sensuous thing. And thus, as we look out upon the works of God, learning to regard them as windows through which we see Him, we shall be more and more disposed to pray, "Thou, O God, hast made everything beautiful in Thy time; teach me to wait Thy time when I shall enter into the full presence of Thy beauty."



A VISIT TO MONTE CASSINO.

BY THE LATE PROFESSOR LORIMER, D.D.

THE monastery of San Germano, at Monte Cassino is the head and principal, or as we may say the mother institution, of all the numerous and powerful monasteries of the Benedictine Order.

To visit it, a long journey is necessary. We must cross the Channel, traverse the whole breath of fair France, penetrate the barrier of the mighty Alps by means of the Mont Cenis Tunnel, that wonderful triumph of engineering skill, and descend into Italy; then, still journeying southwards, we shall pass Turin, Parma, Modena, Bologna, and Florence, with its treasures of art; and leaving even Rome itself behind, proceed farther on towards Naples. Stopping at the Monte Cassino station, we find ourselves at the foot of a steep and lofty mountain, on whose summit sits perched the world-famed monastery of San Germano.

Cassino is a place of great antiquity, often mentioned in Roman history. In the evening after my arrival there I went out with a guide to see the remains of the ancient theatre and amphitheatre; also a very old Etruscan tomb, built in the form of a circular temple, with stones of immense size and of an age prior even to that of Rome.

Next morning I was up early, and breakfasted in time to set off at seven o'clock on my way to the top of the mountain. The Apennines at this point are all remarkably bare, rugged, and barren; and St. Benedict must have chosen this site for his first monastery as being the best for ascetic purposes, rather than for any attractions of a more mundane nature. The ascent is both long and laborious, and can only be made on foot, or by the aid of a horse, mule, or donkey; the last named quadruped was the first to present itself, but it was not without misgivings as to its competency for the work before it that I accepted its services. It was not a large animal, and the caparisons were of a sorry sort, the saddle being much the worse for wear, and the bridle a mere piece of rope; however, it proved equal to the occasion, and, proceeding at a brisk pace we reached the monastery in a little more than an hour. To this day no wheeled vehicle can approach the summit of the mountain, and everything has to be carried up on the backs of horses, mules or asses.

I found my arrival had occurred very opportunely, for the fathers were at matins in the choir of the church, which is remarkable, even in Italy, for the great beauty and highly ornamental character of its marbles and frescoes. Having made bold to enter the choir, I presently fell under the observation of one of the brethren, who, when the service was over, advanced kindly towards me, and asked if I were not an Englishman. I was happy to tell him that such was the case, and then learnt that he was English himself, at least in the same qualified sense —he being an Irishman, and I a Scotchman! We were friendly and at ease with each other directly, and he devoted to me, immediately and persistently, a great deal of polite attention which secured for me a thorough inspection of everything worth seeing.

He conducted me first to the celebrated library, with which I was much pleased, and then to the still more important collection of archives, or ancient papers and documents. Here I was asked to enter my name in the visitors' book, in which were pointed out to me the names of several renowned English visitors; including Dr. Newman, Dean Stanley, Dean Alford, and Mr. Gladstone. I saw also the signature of the famous Frenchman, Renan, placed there, however, before he renounced the faith. The celebration of high mass being now about to commence, my friend conducted me to a seat in the choir, and in a few minutes the whole fraternity assembled, accompanied by nearly one hundred young men and boys, belonging to the monastic seminary. They were all ecclesiastically costumed (just as I had seen once before at the Benedictine Monastery of Einsiedlen in Switzerland), and made up a thoroughly effective picture, set in the magnificent frame of the supremely beautiful church.

Then the service of high mass began, and I was somewhat surprised to see my good fellow-countryman reappear as the ministrant priest of the celebration, clothed in splendid sacerdotal robes of yellow, with two young attendant priests holding up the skirts of his chasuble. They dispensed holy water all around, of which I nearly came in for a share, for I was separated from the monks only by a single vacant seat in the choir.

I never heard mass so impressively rendered; owing, probably, to there being no artistic professional singing, for all the vocal music was performed very devoutly and effectively by the brethren in the choir, whose deep strong voices were led and sustained by one of the finest organs in Italy. The effect realised all that is best in the musical service of the Romish Church.

There was no sermon, but there was a solemn procession of the whole society through the church and the adjoining cloisters of the monastery, very devoutly conducted; it was headed by the officiating priest, bearing the monstrance with the consecrated wafer, closed by the abbot of the monastery, and accompanied all the time by the same loud deep Gregorian chant.

I followed the procession at a distance (having been told by my friendly priest that I might do so), a Capuchin friar and myself being the only persons there not belonging to the monastery. When the procession returned to the church, I resumed my place in the choir, and the remainder of the service, being the most solemn part, was gone through with the same outward form of devoutness. The impression produced upon me was more solemn than I had ever before felt under the Romish ritual, a feeling due to the very devotional bearing of the conventual worshippers, no doubt sincere, according to their light and their training.

After the service was concluded, my friend again came to seek me in the church, and conducted me to the finest points of view for seeing the surrounding country, from the walls of the monastery. He then invited me to take luncheon with him in the refectory; a few of the brethren were there before us, and we were received with much distinction on advancing to the upper table. We lunched on rice, soup, kid's flesh boiled, cheese, and oranges, with an accompaniment of the light wine of the country.

He then crowned all by conducting me to his own cell, to converse with me concerning some points of Hebrew learning in which he was interested, and upon which I was able to give him some information. On our exchanging cards I found his name was a very common English one, and I promised to write to him after my return to London, on some questions about Hebrew grammar.

He seemed to feel quite as much at home with me as I felt with him; and I was greatly pleased with the liberality of his sentiments, and the religious earnestness of his Christian feeling. Thus pleasantly ended my visit to Monte Cassino.

SHORT MODEL PRAYERS.

I.

"Lord, teach us to pray."—Luke xi. 1.

THE disciples of our Lord were one day with Him when He was praying to God.

We are not told whether on this occasion He prayed aloud, but it seems probable that He did. At all events they could see, if they could not hear, that their Master was praying.

We can well believe that any who heard or witnessed such prayers were deeply impressed. One feeling especially seems to have been raised in the minds of these disciples: their own inability to pray as their Master prayed. They wait in silent reverence till He has ceased to pray, and then they come to Him with this petition: "Lord, teach us to pray."

Reader, have you ever offered up for yourself this short prayer: "Lord, teach me to pray"? You cannot at any time begin to pray with better words. Only be sure you say it from your heart, as well as with your lips. Prayer, in order to be real, must be an exercise of the Spirit. No effort is needed to read or say over a form of prayer without much attention to the meaning of the words. There may be even a certain kind of attention, a following the meaning with the mind, and yet no real prayer, none of the "sincere desire," of the soul which describes true prayer in that well-known hymn.

You may follow a form of prayer with a certain amount of attention and interest. For instance, you may think of the Queen as you pray for her, or your thoughts may turn to a sick friend, a fatherless family, or a widow when such are mentioned in a litany; and yet you may go through the whole service without one earnest sincere desire for the blessings you are asking. We should watch very much against the habit of praying in this sort of half-hearted way. In no way can we better seek to be kept from it than by always beginning with this short petition, uttered from the heart: "Lord, teach me to pray."

Say it, when you first kneel down in the privacy of your own room. Say it when you kneel to pray with the family. Say it when you go to the house of God. If this prayer is answered then all that follow will be real, whether you are using a form, or trusting to the Holy Spirit for the very words as well as for the power to feel them.

Let us turn for a few moments to the chapter from which this "model prayer" is taken. How did our Lord answer the petition? He answered it, first, by giving a form of words to be used—a "pattern prayer." Next, by a short story, to show that we should continue to pray till our prayer is answered. Again, in subsequent verses, we have the most plain directions and promises concerning prayer. Lastly, we have once more a simple parable, or figure to prove to us how absolutely certain our Heavenly Father is to give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him.

Perhaps no portion of Scripture could be found to afford more instruction in the important duty of prayer to God than we find here. And remember that all this was the immediate answer to the petition, "Lord, teach us to pray."

Reader, how is it with you? I know too well how it is with myself, and with many a fellow-believer. Too often do we find that in prayer more than in any other duty, "we cannot do the things that we would." Let us, however not forget that while we are expressly told that we do not know how to pray without help from above, yet this humbling assurance is followed by the comforting and gracious words, "The Spirit itself maketh intercession for us" (Romans viii. 26).

Let us, then, in spite of all our infirmities, "come boldly" in the name of our never-failing Advocate and Mediator, and begin by saying to Him, "Lord, teach me to pray."

The Throne of Grace.

IS there a sorrow unrevealed?
A wound refusing to be healed?
A rankling shaft within the heart?
An aching grief that will not part?

Or are there brooding cares that lie
Upon thy breast too heavily?
Sad thoughts, fond hopes ungratified?
Fear lest some unknown ill betide?

Is there a sudden, bitter woe;
Such agony as mourners know
When o'er their cherished flower the blight
Of death has passed and quenched their light?

Or are there doubts, and chilling fear
Beclouding all that else were clear?
And trembling faith that dares not claim
The bliss it owns in Jesus' name?

Oh, bear no more such griefs alone;
But bring them to the Saviour's throne,
The gracious throne of Him who bore
Thy sin, and thy weak nature wore.

For He can soothe: where earth's best love
Hath striven in vain the load to move,
One touch of His can set thee free,
Or grace bestow its need to see.

Thy deepest woe thy Lord can feel,
And only wounds that He may heal.
Do thou but lean on Him, until
His perfect peace thy spirit fill.

And, lo! He "waits to bless;" the door
Of mercy ever stands ajar
Till, resting on the golden floor,
No tears thy song of praise shall mar.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

JANUARY 30.

SIMEON AND THE CHILD JESUS. LUKE II. 25–38.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 32.—'A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel.'

CONNECTION.—The Child Jesus was circumcised after seven days, and received His Name. Three-and-thirty days more must pass before His presentation in the Temple, and the purification of His mother. No doubt these forty days were passed at Bethlehem, in some more commodious lodging than the first. After the forty days, Joseph and Mary took their Infant to Jerusalem, according to the Law, and bore with them to the Temple the offering of the poor, but not of the very poorest. See Lev. xii. 6–8; and comp. v. 11. Mary was 'not able to bring a lamb;' she 'brought something better, even the true Lamb of God, into the Temple.'

It should be observed here once for all, that the New Testament in the original has two words for the Temple, one for the sanctuary, into which the priests alone might enter, as Luke i. 9, 21, 22; the other including the courts whither the people had free access, as here and xviii. 10, etc.

I. THE AGED SAINT.—Read vers. 25–27. A man whose name was Simeon. Aged, as we gather from the tone of the narrative, though this is not expressly stated. The name was a common one (Simon, Simeon, Symeon, different forms of the same). It is tolerably certain that he could not have been the Rabbi Simeon, son of Hillel and father of Gamaliel; as instead of 'departing,' that Simeon became president of the Sanhedrin, seventeen years afterwards, A.D. 13. Simeon's character was like that of Zacharias and Elisabeth, just towards men, devout towards God. Like all pious Jews, he cherished their national hope. How described? From what great prophetic passage is the description taken? (Isa. xl.) But he is distinguished even from other devout men by a special gift and a promised joy. What was the gift? A new age of inspiration was dawning, and this was among its first-fruits. 'According to the Jews, the Spirit had departed from Israel since the days of Malachi.' And what was the promised joy? To see—not as Abraham saw (John viii. 56)—afar off—but in living reality! How long through weary years he had waited for this we cannot tell; nor whether he had now heard of the revelation to the shepherds. The Spirit, by inner prompting, led him to the Temple: perhaps he knew not why; it may have been a daily custom of his; but now there was a secret impulse mightier than ever; and it was all explained when he saw in the Temple Court the two humble villagers of Nazareth side by side, with the Infant in His mother's arms, and the same voice within said, It is the Lord's Christ!

After the custom of the Law. This, in the case of a firstborn son, was twofold, first the offering of the pigeon on the altar after the morning sacrifice, and next the ransom by the payment of a money offering. See interesting details in Geikie's Life of Christ, ch. x.

II. SIMEON'S SONG.—Read vers. 28–33. This is the third of the great Christian Hymns given by St. Luke, and (by a name taken, like the others, from its commencement in Latin) is called the NUNC DIMITTIS. Its first words are those of thankful acknowledgment, The time is come, for the signal is given! The words are often understood and quoted as a prayer—So may it be, but they are rather an assertion—So it is! Thy servant—literally, Thy slave. The image is that of a slave set by his master to watch for the dawn through a long and dreary night; patient but weary on his watch-tower until the appearance of the first streaks of light shall release him. According to Thy word; the prediction before made to him. Thy salvation—the Babe in his arms! Simeon's eyes beheld only the infant form, his faith discerned what that infant form would bring to men. All the people, literally, all the peoples. Simeon's view thus passes beyond the limit of the nation, and is world-wide. There is thus a larger hope in the word of the dying saint even than in the angel's message, ver. 10; or in the prophecy of Zacharias, ch. i. 68. Simeon saw more than the very apostles up to the time of Christ's resurrection, or (may we not say?) than Peter himself until the vision in Joppa. The following words (the Golden Text, from Isa. xlix. 6), a light to lighten the Gentiles, are of the widest prophetic meaning (quoted again by the apostle Paul at Antioch in Pisidia, Acts xiii. 47), and look forward to a yet future day, when Jews and Gentiles shall be one in Christ. For the gift which is light to the one is glory to the other; to Israel—that was to reject the Saviour, to despise, to crucify Him! Simeon shows afterwards that he foresaw this sin and shame; and the day would come when out of all would come joy and blessing to the Jews (Rom. xi. 26). Joseph and His mother marvelled—had they not already seen and felt enough to make them wonder? What new thing could surprise them after the angels' visits and the shepherds' joy? The wonder was that this venerable stranger should know all—should be filled with such delight—should utter thus in the Temple the old prophetic strain, should speak such things of Him, the Babe!

III. SIMEON'S WARNING.—Read vers. 34, 35. He blessed them, yet his words were very solemn. Jesus came to save—but those who rejected Him would sink all the lower in guilt. With the rising of some would be the fall of others. Some both fell and rose, as Peter; some fell to rise no more, as Judas. This also would show what people really were. In the Light, the evil as well as the good of men would be clearly discerned. The very thoughts of men were made plain by the way in which they treated Jesus. It was a test of character. So He became a sign, a revelation of God's truth, owned with joy by many, spoken against by others. See Isa. viii. 13–18, which prophetic passage (repeatedly quoted in the New Testament) may have been in the mind of Simeon. He speaks also of Mary's personal part in all this. That her Son should be despised and rejected, would be a sword to pierce through her own heart—her mother's heart, now so full of joy; but again and again to be filled with sorrow. 'We may find fulfilments of the prediction when the men of Nazareth sought to throw Him from the brow of their hill (Luke iv. 29); when she came, as in anxious fear, to check His teaching as the Pharisees charged Him with casting out devils through Beelzebub (Matt. xii. 46); when she stood by the cross, and heard the blasphemings and revilings of the priests and people, John xix. 25.'—Plumptre.

IV. ANNA THE PROPHETESS.—Read vers. 36–38. Another proof that the prophetic spirit was reviving. 'A prophetess, before as yet there was a recognised prophet!' She bore the name of Hannah (the same word), the renowned mother of the prophet Samuel. Her tribe and lineage are mentioned as well known; though of Phanuel nothing else is recorded. The tribe of Aser, or Asher, was one of the ten tribes carried into Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 6), which as a whole people had never returned; but scattered portions had from time to time found their way back to Palestine, becoming incorporated with the Jews. A widow of about fourscore and four years, i.e. not 84 years old, but 84 years a widow. She must therefore have been nearly 110 years old. Departed not from the Temple; possibly having rooms assigned her in the building, in consideration of her age, holiness, and prophetic gift. Night and day. There was a nightly worship in the Temple by Levites, though not by the people generally. See Psa. cxxxiv. 1, 2. Her words concerning the Infant Jesus, added to those of Simeon, would be doubly impressive. Spake of Him, not only then, but continuously, as the form of the word implies; no doubt so long as she lived. It was the language of farewell and of hope. Long had the faithful looked for redemption; now, on the part of the long-waiting church, Simeon and Anna declare that redemption has come!

QUESTIONS.

1. The 'Consolation of Israel'; the 'Redemption of Jerusalem.'* What Old Testament prophecies are recalled by these descriptions of the Messianic era?

2. What was the original ground of the Temple-dedication of the firstborn to God?

3. Where in the prophets is the revelation of God's mercy to the Gentiles foreshown?

4. Show by instances in our Lord's ministry that He was set for the 'fall' as well as for the 'rising' of many.

5. What light does the mention of Anna throw upon the history of the Ten Tribes after their exile? Quote illustrative passages.

"IN LOVE FORBEARING ONE ANOTHER."

BY CRONA TEMPLE.

I.

THE waves were beating angrily on the north-western headlands of Ireland; the winter was over, and the spring had come—so the almanacs said, but nobody would say it was much like spring who had been sitting in Patrick Elliot's cottage one May evening.

"A coarse night," remarked Patrick to his wife, Katrine; "there'll be a plentiness of leagh in the morning, if this wind holds on."

"Leagh" is the Irish word for the drift-weed thrown upon the shore by a storm; and it is a very precious prize to the people of those wild regions. They use it as manure for their crops, and when the weather is dry they make from it a substance called "kelp."

This kelp is used in the manufacture of soap, and many other things; from it the drug iodine is extracted; it is what is called an "alkali." At the time of which I write it used to command a ready sale at a good price. It is made from sea-weed dried crisp in the sun, and then burned in kilns upon the shore; the slaty-blue ashes are collected and beaten into large blocks, and then shipped off for sale at Glasgow.

"What a pity that our new harness hasn't come home yet from 'Derry," remarked Brian, the eldest son; "we shan't be able to get up half our share of the leagh without the cart."

"Ask Micky Quigley to lend us his traces," said one of the younger boys; "he can't have use for them now that he's sold his horse."

But Patrick shook his head, and Brian said scornfully: "He wouldn't lend us an inch of leather to save the lives of the whole of us, so he wouldn't? The nasty, mean——"

"Brian," said his father, "calling of names is neither civil nor useful."

"Civil! For what would we be civil to the likes of Micky? I can't think, father, how you have patience with him, when you know he never sets eyes on you nor yours but to miscall us."

Patrick smiled. "Getting beyond patience won't cure him, my lad."

Brian rose and walked to the door, which he opened to look out at the storm. He muttered some words which the violent wind carried away, and they were not exactly complimentary to Micky Quigley. His hot Irish blood found it very hard to put up with injury or slight.

Michael Quigley was a near neighbour of the Elliots', a man who was friendly with scarcely anyone. Naturally surly and taciturn, he lived all alone, for his young wife had died years and years ago, and he had never asked any other person to share his home. Of all his neighbours he disliked the Elliots most heartily.

He thought Patrick a "canting sneak." He never forgot that he had caught the boys—Brian at their head—prowling round his turf-stacks one evening. 'Twas all very fine to talk about searching for pewits' eggs—he was sure they had come to steal his turf. Then his sheep had broken into Elliot's cabbage-garden, and Katrine Elliot had set her little dog to drive them out; and it did drive them, and hurried them, and worried them, too; which was an offence that Quigley was not any the more likely to forget because the first beginning of the evil rested on the side of his sheep. No; to him the whole race of Elliots were a "bad-born set." They came of an ill race, he said. Generations ago an Elliot had been hanged; and more of the name would come to the same end, he was sure.

So he talked; and young Brian thought it very likely indeed that one fine day he should forget that Micky Quigley was an elderly man, and give him a thorough good thrashing. But Patrick only said, "Have patience, boys."

Although but a poor Irish fisherman, Patrick Elliot had learned the lesson which is so often missed; a lesson which was first taught to poor men, fishers, by the Galilean lake long years ago: "Do good to them that hate you . . . . that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? . . . . But if ye forgive men their trespasses, your Heavenly Father will also forgive you."

II.

The morning dawned, and the storm was dying away in fitful gusts, when Patrick and his sons went down to the shore; huge rolls of the dark brown weed were tossing at the edge of the waves, and they knew that when the tide turned it would be piled two feet thick upon the strand.

Groups of men were loitering about, waiting until the sea had fully reached high-water mark, and the moment had come to "make the divide." Each tenant had his apportioned share, suited to the size of his farm, the landlord had his "royalty," but no man might touch it until the tide had turned, and the allotment had been made.

The Elliots had not long to wait. The "divide" was soon over, and presently everybody was busy stuffing the long wet glossy sea-ribbon into panniers—"creels," as they call them there—or carrying it in their arms high and dry, out of reach of the tide, or forking it into carts; and all the while shouting, and laughing, and working in the frantic fashion that Irish peasantry can work under the influence of excitement.

Women were there, as busy as the men, their bare feet shining amongst the red-brown weed. Plenty of children, too, twitching at the halters of the ponies, skurrying here and there, and adding their shrill little voices to the noise which mixed, not unmusically, with the splash of the waves and the scream of the sea-birds on Ranafarset Head.

And it was glorious fun for them—the harvest of the sea.

Brian Elliot and his sister were struggling up the beach, carrying a basket between them which was full of the trailing weed; as their cart-harness had not "come from 'Derry," they were obliged to use to the full their own bodily powers. They could not manage to walk very straightly, for their load was unsteady, and masses of the precious "leagh" would keep slipping over the sides of the basket.

Suddenly somebody lurched against little Kitty, and the child, to save herself from falling, let go her hold of the basket; but she could not keep her balance, and after staggering on for a pace or two, Kitty, basket, and sea-weed, rolled together on the sand.

Brian turned fiercely, and saw Michael Quigley.

"You should look out where you're going, then!" the man said gruffly, without giving Brian time to speak.

Young Elliot felt the passion rising in his throat as if it would choke him; he tossed the hair from his forehead with his sandy fingers, and then he clenched his fist, and sprang forward.

A strong hand grasped his arm.

"My lad, my lad!" said his father's voice close to his side.

"Come on!" cried Quigley derisively. "Two to one, with the child thrown in —'tis fair play, isn't it?"

The people began to gather round, caught by the sight of Brian's angry face, and by Quigley's contemptuous sneer.

"Hooray! There'll be a fight!" yelled one small urchin, jumping his little red toes up and down on the wet sand in his delight and excitement.

"There won't, neither; so there!" said Patrick good-humouredly, managing to get right in front of Brian as he spoke.

"Misther Quigley has more to do than to fight to amuse youngsters," he went on, "but when the leagh is all boarded up, some of the lads might try a fall or two. Come any who like, to my house the night, and let us see which of you young ones is the best man."

The calm cool words made one or two of the most curious amongst the on-lookers feel a little foolish. Quigley walked off in sulky dignity; and then the work and the fun began again as fast and furious as before.

But Brian stood with the veins on his brow still swelled like knots, and the wrathful light still in his clear grey eyes.

"Father, father, what for did ye stop me?" he muttered. "I'll give that fellow a beating yet, if they send me to gaol for it, I will!"

Patrick was too wise to argue with him then. "Here, lend a hand with the basket," he said. "And you, Kitty lass, run home to your mother, and bid her be hanging on the praties. We'll all be in soon, and as hungry as hawks."

"My lad," Patrick Elliot said to Brian that evening, "you can master and ride the roughest brute of a horse in the country, for sure; but there's one creature that defies ye, and that's yourself."

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME.

CHAPTER III.—SATURDAY AND SUNDAY.

RUTH had been hard at work all day hoeing thistles. Many a time she lifted up her eyes to the green woods where Ishmael and Elsie were at play, and recalled the rare days of holiday like it which she had had when she was young. The thought of the children's pleasure made her own work lighter; and though she was tired enough when she heard the church-clock strike the hour for leaving the field, she walked along briskly under the hedge, to be home the sooner. Elsie and Ishmael would be fine and hungry before she could get tea ready; and Mrs. Chipchase had promised her some buttermilk to make them some buttermilk pikelets for a treat. There was a pleasant stir and agitation in Ruth's mind, yet there was a vague disquiet mingled with the pleasure. Ishmael was about to cease to be a child, and was stepping into the perils and duties of boyhood, that dangerous crisis in which she had seemed to lose all her other children. He was about to escape from under her wing and flutter away; like these little half-fledged hedge-sparrows, which were twittering and hovering all along the thorn-bushes. Her other boys and girls seemed to care no more for their poor home than the nestlings of this year will care for the old nest next spring. But Ishmael was not like the others, who had all taken after their father, and only thought of their mother as a drudge to slave for them. She had not been as good a mother to them, she said to herself, but then she had not believed in God as she did now. How marvellously good He had been to her to give her such a son as Ishmael, when she was a weary, worn-down, grey-haired woman!

Mrs. Chipchase nearly filled Ruth's large brown pitcher with buttermilk; and gave her two or three spoonfuls of tea in a screw of paper. Ruth was a favourite with her, as being a quiet, harmless old woman, and she lingered a moment at the door to speak a word or two to her.

"Mind Ishmael's here in time of a morning," she said, "for the master's very particular."

"I'm sure," answered Ruth falteringly, "as I don't know how to thank you and the master for taking him. It 'll be the makin' of him, I know; and he's a good lad, ma'am, God bless him!"

It was seldom Ruth uttered so many words together, except to Ishmael; but her heart was full. The farmhouse was a homely place, but there was a rude abundance about it, which she seemed to feel for the first time, as if she also had a share in it. She stood at the kitchen door, and could see the big table at which Ishmael would eat, and where a plough-boy was now sitting, deeply absorbed in the contents of a huge basin, which had been filled up from a big iron pot hanging a little way above the fire. The smell of the good broth reached her, and seemed to promise that Ishmael would grow a strong, hale man, when he could always satisfy his hunger. "He hath satisfied the hungry with good things," she murmured to herself, as she took up her brown pitcher, and with a curtsey to the mistress turned to go away.

"Ruth Medway," shouted a loud, rough voice from the far end of the farmyard, "Nutkin the keeper's been and hauled Ishmael to gaol for stealing pheasants' eggs in the wood."

"There's the master come home!" cried Mrs. Chipchase. "Whatever is he shouting, Ruth?"

Ruth was still standing with a smile on her wrinkled face; but it died away as the meaning of the words reached her brain. The sky grew black, and the sunshine fled away; a dizziness seized her which made the solid ground she stood on reel beneath her. The loud crashing of her brown pitcher, as it slipped from her hand, and broke into a hundred fragments on the stone causeway, brought her back to her senses.

"What's the matter?" asked Mrs. Chipchase, running to the door, which her husband had now reached.

"Matter enough!" he answered. "Here's our new waggoners' lad, that was to come on Monday morning, taken off to gaol for poaching. Nutkin caught Ishmael and Elsie roasting eggs in the wood; pheasants' eggs, stolen from the nest! There's no chance of him getting off; for the squire's mad after game; and Nutkin swears he'll lock him up out of harm's way. I'm sorry for you, Ruth, to have such a husband and family. I did think Ishmael was going to be a comfort to you in your old age. But the lad knew better; and he's no excuse."

"It was naught but a lad's trick," said Mrs. Chipchase, "such as anyone 'ud do. Ishmael never stole an egg of mine, when I set him to gather them. Our own boys never brought in more than he did. He's as honest as the day, I'm sure."

"Thank you kindly, ma'am," murmured Ruth, turning away and walking slowly down the causeway towards home, with a bowed head, and feeble feet. How heavily her sixty years seemed to weigh upon her all at once! How rough the road was, which she had trodden so many hundreds of times in all kinds of weather, to earn her own bread and Ishmael's! Was she half-blind that everything looked so dim? And where had all the merry sounds of the summer evening gone to? There was a sort of numbness and stupor over her mind, until she found herself trying to fit the old key into the lock of her poor hut, the home Ishmael had never yet left for a single night. He was not coming home to night!

She sank down on the door-sill, and swayed herself to and fro in mute despair. No tears came to her eyes; for she was old and her tears were exhausted; but she sobbed heavily again and again, and yet again. There was no hope in her heart. She thought of Nutkin's enmity, and her husband's bad character. The Rector's family had gone away to foreign parts for six months, and a stranger, who knew nothing of Ishmael, was taking the duty of the parish. The squire could not be reached, for Nutkin's influence was all-powerful with him. No, there was no chance for Ishmael.

To be in prison! Home was poor enough; she felt all at once what a dark, miserable, empty hovel it was. But if Ishmael could only be within, it would be a true home to both of them. She sat down on the desolate hearth, and tried to think of God; but she could think of no one but Ishmael yet. Her soul was in the deepest depths. All night long she lay awake. The little bed on the floor beside her was empty for the first time; and her ear listened in vain for Ishmael's quiet breathing. Her husband had come home so drunk that she had not dared to get him up the ladder, and he was lying in a dead sleep on the floor below. Over and over again she counted her nine children on her fingers, some dead and some living, and a heavy sob broke from her lips as she whispered "Ishmael." She had mourned over her dead, and grieved over her living children who had forsaken her; but no sorrow had been like this sorrow. None of them had ever been in prison, and now it was her youngest and dearest, yes, and her best, who was fallen into deep disgrace. When the morning came her heart turned sick at the thought of going to church, though Humphrey told her surlily she might go. Ishmael would not be in the singing-gallery; and how could she sing "Glory be to the Father" while he was in prison?

All the morning Humphrey, sitting by the wood-fire, was cursing Ishmael as a disgrace; but Ruth did not answer a word. She had kept silence so long that she hardly knew how to talk, except to Ishmael.

It was a relief to her when her husband took himself off in the afternoon, and left her in solitude as well as silence. She was sitting alone, with her wrinkled face hidden in her hands, deaf, blind, and mute to everything but her trouble, when she felt the warm pressure of loving arms round her neck. For a moment she thought it was Ishmael, but looking up she saw the face of Elsie. Her mother was standing near, and when Ruth rose to drop a curtsey to the school-mistress, she took her hard cramped hand between both of her own, and bending forwards, kissed the old woman's brown cheek. Ruth's face flushed a little, and a strange feeling of surprise and pleasure flashed across the darkness of her grief.

"I want you to get a cup of tea for me," said Mrs. Clift.

It was something for Ruth to do, and as she busied herself in kindling her swift-burning fire, and filling her small tin kettle from the well, for a few fleeting moments she forgot Ishmael. But she could eat nothing when the tea was ready, though Elsie had brought some dainty tea-cakes in order to tempt her appetite.

"I have been up to the Hall, and seen Mr. Lansdowne," said Mrs. Clift, as they sat together at the rough little table. "Elsie has to go before the magistrates to-morrow at Uptown; and I went to speak for poor Ishmael. But there's not much hope, Ruth. Mr. Lansdowne tells me Nutkin says Ishmael has infested the woods since his very babyhood, and all the village thinks him to be in league with poachers. That's not the truth, I know."

Ruth shook her head in sorrowful denial.

"I told the squire so," said the school-mistress, softly; "and he answered, women never could be made to believe that poaching was a crime. I did say I couldn't call taking a few eggs from a wild bird's nest any great sin—not bad enough for a young lad to be sent to gaol for. He said it was not only that, but all the Medways were a plague and a pest in the parish; and it would be a kindness to check Ishmael at the outset. Ruth, I'm more grieved than I can tell you."

Again Ruth shook her grey head in silence.

"I've been thinking how lonely you are, and how you have to bear the sins of your husband and sons," said Mrs. Clift; "and it seems to me that to think of our Lord's life here is the only thing to comfort you. Do you remember the words, 'He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were, our faces from Him; He was despised, and we esteemed Him not'?"

The quiet voice speaking so gently to her ceased for a few minutes; and Ruth covered her troubled face again with her hands. It was the Lord Jesus who had been despised and rejected of men, as she was by her neighbours. He had been "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," more deeply than she was. Did her old companions in the village hide, as it were, their faces from her? Nay, all the world had hid their faces from Him who died to save them. Even on the cross those that passed by reviled Him, wagging their heads; and the chief priests and elders, and the thieves crucified with Him, had mocked and jeered at Him.

"'Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows,'" resumed the quiet, gentle voice. "'He was wounded for our transgressions: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed.'"

She was not bearing her griefs alone then, as she had fancied during the long dark night. The Lord Himself had carried her sorrows. He had been wounded for her transgressions, and for Ishmael's. A healing sense of His love and compassion and fellow-feeling was stealing over her aching heart.

"'All we like sheep have gone astray,'" went on the soothing voice; "'we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed, and He was afflicted, yet He opened not His mouth: He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth.'"

Dumb, and opening not His mouth! Was not that again like herself? She could not cry aloud, and speak many words, and make her grief known to every ear. It was true. Jesus Christ had lived her life of sorrows, and grief, and scorn, and silence. Her head was bowed down still, but her heart was lifted up. The suffering Son of God made it easier for her to bear her own suffering.

It was growing dusk now, and the school-mistress bade her good-night; but Ruth would go a little way on the road with her. When she returned to her lonely home, she lingered for a minute, trembling and reluctant to re-enter its dark solitude. It had always been her custom, since Ishmael was a baby in her arms to sing, "Glory to Thee, my God, this night," as the last thing before he went to bed, except when Humphrey happened to be at home, which was very seldom. She had not thought of it last night, the first time that Ishmael had been away from her. But the thought crossed her mind and could not be driven away from it, that, maybe, this Sunday evening he was singing it alone in his cell at Uptown. The tears, which had not come last night, stood in her dim eyes, as, sitting down in her old chair by the dark hearth, she sang the hymn right through, in a low and faltering voice, which could hardly have been heard beyond the threshold.

CHAPTER IV.—THE MAGISTRATES' MEETING.

Uptown was not worthy of the name of town; it could hardly be called a large village. But it was the centre of a wide agricultural district, and a small market was held in it once a week, chiefly for the sale of butter and eggs, as the farmers carried their corn to a more important market farther away, in the county-town. A magistrates' meeting was held at Uptown at stated intervals; and there was a police-station just outside the village, provided with two cells but seldom occupied, in one of which Ishmael had been safely kept since noon-day on Saturday.

Heavy-hearted still, though with a fund of secret courage bearing her up, Ruth entered Uptown on the Monday morning. There was more stir than usual about the single street, as there always was on the days when the magistrates came to hear the trivial cases which awaited their judgment. Round the inn where the justices' room was, there were several groups of somewhat discreditable folks hanging about in readiness. Nutkin was within the inn-yard, eagerly talking to one of the magistrates who had arrived before the others, and had just dismounted from his horse. Ruth saw him, but it was as if she did not see him, so absorbed was her whole soul in watching for Ishmael to come along the road between the town and the police-station. She was half unconscious of the increasing crowd and stir, as the magistrates rode in one after another; and the magistrates' clerk bustled down from his house with his blue bag full of papers. Mrs. Clift had arrived too with Elsie; and Squire Lansdowne was gone into the large room of the inn; but she only half knew it. At last Ishmael appeared, walking beside a policeman, who kept his hand lightly on his collar as if to remind him it was of no use to try to escape. But could this sullen, scowling lad, with rough uncombed hair, and tear-stained face be Ishmael? He was close beside her, yet he never raised his eyes; and he would have passed her by, if she had not cried out in a very lamentable voice, "Oh, Ishmael, Ishmael!"

"It's my mother," he said, as the policeman tightened his grasp of his collar. "Don't you come inside, mother dear. It 'ud do no good, and it 'ud make me cry. You go home again now you've seen me to say good-bye. You'll loose me to kiss my mother," he added, looking at the policeman.

"Aye, if you're sharp about it," he answered.

For a minute the young boy, scarcely more than a child, and the bent, grey-haired woman stood with their arms fondly clinging about each other. Ruth felt as if she could not let him go; it seemed but a few days since he was but a baby in her bosom; and now he was a prisoner charged with an offence against the laws of his country. But Ishmael loosened his hands, and let himself be led away inside the magistrates' room. Then she sat down on the lowest step of a horse-block below its open window, through which she could hear the hum of voices coming indistinctly to her ear. How long it was she did not know, but a gaily-dressed, flaunting young woman came to her at length, and spoke in a pitying tone.

"Don't you take on, Mrs. Medway," she said; "you're a good woman, I know, but luck's agen you. Nutkin was very hard on him; and they've give him three months in the county-gaol."

"Is it my Ishmael?" she asked, looking up with a wandering and vacant expression in her eyes.

"To be sure," answered the young woman, "'Ishmael Medway, thirteen years of age; three months for stealing pheasants' eggs.'"

Ruth heard no more, saw nothing more. But bending forward, as if to lift herself upon her feet, she fell heavily on the pavement, in a deep swoon. There was a crowd clustering about her when Ishmael was marched out of the inn by the policeman; he looked round in vain for a last glance at his mother's face.

"It were best for her to go away," he said to himself, with a sob, "but I should ha' liked to ha' seen her again."

He felt as if he was going to die in the prison to which they were sending him; and as if he should never see his mother's face again. His young soul was in a bewilderment of grief and amazement. He had heard himself described as an incorrigble thief and poacher. Everything had gone against him: the notorious character of his father and elder brothers; his own admission of having haunted the woods until he knew every spot in them; even his tearful confession that he knew he had no right to the eggs, and did not know why he should take them then for the first time. All had been against him. He was going away to gaol, a shame and disgrace to his poor mother. To-day too; the very day he was to have begun to earn his own living, and relieve her from the burden he had been upon her. He would be a worse trouble to her than any of the others had been, even than his father, who came home every night either drunk or angry. What could he ever do to make it up to her now? He could do nothing better than to die.

It was late before Ruth reached home in the evening, and she found her husband awaiting her return, sober and sullen; a hard, tyrannical old man, who looked upon her as a silent and spiritless drudge.

"So," he exclaimed, as she stepped feebly and wearedly over the threshold, "this is what it's come to: thy fine lad's got hisself into gaol. This comes o' book-learnin' and psalm-singin', eh? He brings shame on all on us. Ne'er a one on us was iver up afore the justices till now; and they say at the 'Labour in Vain' as he's got three months. And serve him right, I say. I takes sides with Nutkin, and th' squire, and the justices, as are ivery one on 'em gentlemen. If I'd a bit o' land, I'd hang ivery poacher as set foot on it. And a young, little lad o' his age! What'll he be when he's a man? I'd ha' sent him to Botany Bay, I would. I'm on the side o' justice. And if iver Ishmael crosses o'er that door-sill agen, I'll thresh him to within an inch o' his life. I'll break ivery bone in his body. And thine, too," he shouted, with growing fury, "if thee don't open that cursed mouth o' thine, and say somethink!"

"I'm ill, Humphrey," she answered meekly; "I swoonded away dead, when they told me on it."

"Swounded!" he repeated, sneeringly; "don't tell me. It's only born ladies as can do that, not a workin' woman like thee. But swound or no swound, just hearken to my words. Ishmael niver sets his foot over yon door-sill. I'll harbour no poachers or gaol-birds under my roof."

Very quietly Ruth went on lighting the fire, and boiling the kettle. It was a relief to her to be at home again, out of the stir and buzz of the little town, and out of sight of inquisitive eyes. Even her husband's threats and jeers could not altogether spoil the sense of having found rest at her own fireside. And when he was gone, the unbroken silence of the dark hut suited her. Her harassed soul could re-collect itself now. Even in dense darkness our eyes by eager gazing begin to see a little, and so in the deepest trouble the soul by its earnest yearning towards God, begins to discern light. As Ruth sat alone in the dark hut, there came back to her memory the old story in the Bible, from which she had taken a name for her youngest boy. She thought of Hagar in the wilderness, a runaway slave, fleeing from her mistress, and how God heard her affliction; and how once more she was driven into the wilderness, wandering up and down homeless, until her son Ishmael was dying of thirst, and his mother cast him under a shrub to die, and went away out of sight—a good way off—lest she should see the death of her child; and how God heard the voice of the lad, and once again sent his angel to succour Hagar. Ruth shut her aching and swollen eyelids with a feeling of comfort and awe, as she whispered, "'Thou, God, seest me.'"

Yes, God saw; God knew. There was unspeakable consolation in that. She felt no bitterness of heart, even against Nutkin. She had nothing to say against the law that had sent Ishmael to prison. She did not try to justify her boy; he had done wrong, though in lightheartedness and thoughtlessness, not in malice. None of these things occupied her simple mind. God had seen all; and He knew all about it. It was in that thought she was to find consolation and strength. She must endure, as seeing Him who is invisible.

TEXTS MISUNDERSTOOD OR MISAPPLIED.

THERE are many familiar passages of Scripture which we frequently hear used in such a way that it is obvious they are not rightly understood.

In a few instances the blundering arises from ignorance of the original languages, so that the English translation is quoted in a sense quite different from the true meaning.

For example; in a celebrated controversy about "universal salvation," this text was adduced (Heb. x. 10): "Through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." The unlearned arguer no doubt thought this quotation conclusive; not knowing that the original had no reference to all as an adjective of number, but was an adverb (ἅπαξ) signifying time, once only, or once and no more. The sacrifice of Christ on the cross was not often repeated, like the sacrifices of the ancient ritual, which were types and emblems of the one great oblation on the cross, nor like those of modern ritualists, who pretend to offer the sacrifice of the mass, for "by one offering (one sacrifice for sin for ever), He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

By a similar ignorance of the original word, the statement that "Charity (ἀγάπη) shall cover a multitude of sins" (1 Pet. iv. 8) is turned to error both in doctrine and practice. Many people think that by charity is here meant liberal giving of alms to the poor, or other gifts to benevolent, and especially to religious objects. This they suppose atones for many personal faults, and makes amends for moral or religious shortcoming. It is the same principle that leads the ignorant and superstitious, whether among Romanists or Protestants, to reckon charitable gifts and bequests as reparations for wrong and helps to salvation. And this, although it is expressly said by St. Paul (1 Cor. xiii. 3), "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and have not charity, it profiteth nothing." The sentence in St. Peter is a quotation from Proverbs x. 12: "Love covereth all sins," that is, charity or love covereth or throweth a veil over the faults of others or the sins of others as committed against ourselves. So in the epistle of St. James (v. 20): "He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins;" not his own sins, but those of the converted sinner.

These are examples of texts misapplied through misconception of the translated words.

But supposing Scriptural words, or phrases rightly translated, and easily understood in literal sense, they may be still wrongly applied. For instance, that verse of Ecclesiastes (xi. 1): "Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days," is often used to encourage people in doing good in apparently unfavourable or even hopeless circumstances, when it would seem as if they were throwing away or wasting what is valuable. If the verse has this effect, it may encourage zeal, which is often needed as well as wisdom and prudence. But the real meaning of the passage is that we should deal with our talents and opportunities as a merchant does with his capital, expecting a return or profit, not at once, but after a time, it may be in the remote future. Some say that the reference is to the sowing of seed when the surface of the soil is covered with water, which will spring up after the inundation abates. But if this really was the origin of the phrase, it has become proverbial, and can now be understood by readers of Ecclesiastes on upland plains, or in crowded cities as well as on the banks of the Nile.

MATT. v. 48.—"Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." This verse gives no countenance to the doctrine of personal perfection or freedom from sin, a condition unattainable by mortal man. Freedom from guilt there may be, and a peaceful or joyful consciousness of being in a saved state. But freedom from indwelling sin is a very different matter. He that thinks himself perfect in that sense may be full of spiritual pride and other sins of the spirit, though he may by grace have subdued all sins of the flesh. "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (1 John i. 8). Yet a man may be perfect in a Scriptural sense. Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations; and Job was perfect and upright; that is, they were true in their religious professions.

JOHN XIII. 7.—"What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." This was said to Peter, and simply implies that when the Master had finished what He was then doing He would explain its meaning. Peter would know presently, as he did (verses 12–17). There is no reference in "hereafter" to the world to come or the future state, though the phrase is often thus applied.

This leads us to remark that some texts are very commonly taken as themes for preaching, "used as pegs for a discourse," as the saying is, apart from their original meaning and connection. For instance, "What think ye of Christ?" has been the text or motto for many a sermon, in which the appeal to the hearers is as to their opinion and feeling about the Lord Jesus. As good John Newton has it in one of the Olney hymns:

> "What think ye of Christ is the test
> To try both your state and your scheme,
> You cannot be right in the rest,
> Unless you think rightly of Him.
> As Jesus appears in your view,
> As He is beloved or not—
> So faith is found formal or true,
> To live or be dead is your lot."

But the question as put in the gospel (Matt.

xxii. 42) is "What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is He?" What is your opinion as to the Christ, the Messiah, as to his earthly descent and origin, etc. The pulpit use of the text may be very useful and popular, only let it be remembered that it is not the use of the words in their original context.

So of many texts popularly used, and profitably used. For example, "He must needs go through Samaria" (John iv. 4). The words in the gospel do not refer to a moral or spiritual necessity, though the lessons from this view of the passage are touching and true; but the words simply express the fact that, in leaving Judæa to return to Galilee, Jesus must needs cross the region of Samaria.

But we must not enlarge on such "accommodations" of the written record. Enough has been said to illustrate the misunderstanding and misapplication of texts, whether through ignorance, or from design with good motive. Many examples will occur to every intelligent student of Scripture. The following may be of use towards the careful consideration and exact knowledge of some passages.

1 Cor. iv. 4.—"I know nothing by myself": not, "I am of myself ignorant," but "I am not conscious of any evil practice as a minister of Christ and steward of the mysteries of God."

Rom. xiii. 11.—"And that, knowing the time," etc. "And that (do), knowing the time," etc. That is a demonstrative pronoun. The words are too often read, "And, that knowing the time," etc.

Acts xxi. 16.—"One Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple"—an early disciple—a disciple of long standing.

Acts ii. 10.—"Strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes." Jews and proselytes were two classes of "strangers of Rome," that is, Roman citizens resident for a time in Jerusalem. It should be rendered, both "Jews and proselytes."

Isa. iv. 5.—"Upon all the glory (shall be) a defence." Not "a defence shall be upon all the glory," but "upon all (the dwelling-places and assemblies of Mount Zion) the glory (as of the pillar of cloud and fire) shall be (also) a defence."

Isa. xlvi. 13.—"I will place salvation in Zion for Israel my glory." Not "salvation for Israel" (who is) my glory, but, "salvation in Zion, my glory for Israel."

Matt. xxiii. 24.—"Who strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel." Should be, "who strain out the gnat," i.e. from any liquor which you are about to drink.

Mark xii. 32.—"Well, Master, Thou hast said the truth." Not "well" interjectionally, but adverbially, qualifying said, "Thou hast well said the truth." Compare vii. 9: "Full well ye reject the commandment of God," etc.

Luke xix. 8.—"The half of my goods I give to the poor . . . . I restore him fourfold." Not to be understood as stating a previous habit or practice, but as a promise now made of almsgiving and restitution.

Luke xxii. 38.—"They said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And He said unto them, It is enough." Not "two are enough." "It is enough" means, "That will do, say no more," intimating that they did not understand Him.

Luke xxiv. 26.—"Ought not Christ to have suffered these things?" "Was it not necessary, according to the Old Testament Scriptures, and for the fulfilment of prophecy, that Christ (the Christ, the Messiah) should suffer?"

Luke xxii. 31.—"Satan hath desired to have you (all the Apostles) that he may sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for thee (Peter), that thy faith fail not," etc.

John i. 21.—"Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not. Art thou that prophet?" Not to be read as if the question "Art thou Elias?" was repeated, but with no emphasis on Art, and a strong emphasis on that, i.e., the prophet foretold by Moses.

John xi. 16.—Thomas said, "Let us also go, that we may die with Him." Not with Lazarus, but with Jesus, who risked his life by going into Judæa again.

John xii. 27.—"What shall I say? Father, save Me from this hour." The latter sentence is sometimes read as with an interrogation: "Shall I say, Father save Me?" etc., whereas it is to be read as a distinct prayer, like Luke xxii. 42: "Father, remove this cup from Me."

John xvi. 29.—"Lo, now speakest Thou plainly." The word "now" should be emphasised. It is an allusion to our Lord's just previous saying, "The time cometh when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall show you plainly of the Father."

John xix. 22.—"What I have written, I have written." The emphasis should not be on the word "have," but "written." "Written is written, and shall stand."

Acts ii. 42.—"They continued stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread," etc. It is not "the doctrine and fellowship of the apostles," but "in the doctrine of the apostles, and fellowship, and in," etc.

Acts v. 20.—"Speak to the people all the words of this life," i.e., the life to come—the life and immortality brought to life by the Gospel, which the Sadducees denied.

Acts xviii. 17.—"Gallio cared for none of these things," i.e., Gallio took no notice of their proceedings. It does not mean "Gallio was indifferent to the subject of religion."

Acts xix. 2.—"We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." This should be translated, like the parallel passage in John vii. 39 with the explanatory word "given:" there it is, "The Holy Ghost was not yet (given)." Here it should be "We have not heard whether the Holy Ghost be (given)."

Acts xix. 23.—"There arose no small stir about that way"; about the way of life, about the way of the Gospel, as taught by St. Paul.

We must not conclude without expressing a wish that the pulpit were more used for the exposition and explanation of the meaning of Scripture. Eloquent and stirring sermons have their influence, but without sound knowledge the movement of the feelings is apt to be transient, and sometimes fanatical. It is often amazing to find the ignorance of Divine truth among people who are otherwise well educated, and who have had Bibles in their hands, or within reach all their lives. The following anecdote we know to be true. A devout layman volunteered to accompany a well-known evangelist, or "missioner," on a preaching tour. He admired the preaching, and loved the preacher, with whom he doubtless felt warm and living sympathy. A friend asking how he got on with Mr. A——, he said he held with him in everything except that he was rather given to fasting occasionally. "And you know, sir, that cannot be right, for did not the Lord say to Peter more than once, 'Feed My sheep!'" This is true, however strange it may appear; yet not half so strange is it as many wild interpretations and absurd quotations of Holy Writ, especially in discussing prophetical and other disputed subjects outside the few and simple truths that are necessary to salvation. Even as to these there is some risk of error, as the diversities of creed, and the frequent perversions from the faith of the gospel too sadly prove. Now that a new century of Sunday-school work has commenced, let attention be more than ever be given to the study and the explanation of the Bible.

THE GREEK CHURCH IN RUSSIA AND SIBERIA.

BY THE REV. HENRY LANSDELL, F.R.G.S.

I.

OUR knowledge of the Russian Church comes to us chiefly through two channels: the pens of ecclesiastical authors, and the writings of modern travellers. From the latter it is not too much to say that the Russians and their religion often receive scant justice, not to add, misrepresentation; for when an Englishman looks upon the gorgeous and elaborate ritual of the Eastern church, sees the picture-worship of the people, their kissing of relics and invocation of saints, he is reminded of like things in the churches of Spain and Italy, and he not unfrequently condemns both East and West as superstitious and corrupt alike. Such a charge, however, is too sweeping, and betrays a lack of knowledge of many points which, if more generally known, would bring us nearer, at least in sympathy, to members of the Church in Russia. On the other hand, the writings of ecclesiastical authors are usually so condensed as necessarily to fail in bringing before us what the traveller sees as the every-day religious life of the people.

These papers relate to three tours in the Russian Empire. The first in 1874, was through St. Petersburg and Moscow, returning by Warsaw; the next in 1878, through Moscow and Jaroslaf to Archangel;* whilst the third journey, undertaken the following year, extended across Russia in Europe, and through Siberia, from the Urals to the Pacific. I thus had an opportunity of seeing something of the mission work of the Greek church amongst the various Asiatic tribes, especially those beyond Lake Baikal and on the Amur, such as the Buriats and Gilyaks, as well as the condition of things in Russia proper.

A few words, first, on the history of the Russian Church, which is one of the youngest in Europe. Here I thankfully avail myself of Dean Stanley's historical divisions, namely, the foundation, consolidation, transition, and reformation periods of the Russian Church.

The foundation period extends from the end of the tenth century to the beginning of the fourteenth. In the year A.D. 957, a Russian princess named Olga visited Constantinople, was baptized, and returned with the Christian name of Helena. About thirty years afterwards there came to her grandson Vladimir envoys from the different religious communities of the known world—from the Mussulmans, the Pope, the Jews, the Greeks—inviting him to adopt their respective creeds. To these he replied by sending elders and nobles to examine their various religions; and shortly afterwards, in 988, he was baptized into the Greek Church. Vladimir then brought about a wholesale baptism of his submissive and docile subjects at Kieff. A church was built there, and the work of conversion advanced easily and rapidly. The Holy Scriptures, it must be remembered, had been translated into Sclavonic a century before for the nations on the Danube, so that the Greek priests, on going to Russia, had this powerful lever ready to hand, and in the language of the people. In 1010 was founded the Pechersky monastery at Kieff, and in 1045 the cathedral church of St. Sophia at Novgorod the Great. The year 1017 gives us the name of Jaroslaff, who introduced into Russia the Byzantine system of canon law, and the first beginnings of Christian education; whilst a hundred years later, in 1113, we are introduced to the almost saintly Vladimir Monomachus, who displayed the greatest interest in the welfare of the Church, and who took to wife Gytha, the daughter of our Saxon Harold.

The period of the consolidation of the Russian Church dates from the beginning of the fourteenth century to the middle of the seventeenth, during which time the local centre of church history is transferred from Kieff to Moscow; and three great powers come prominently forward in the Tsars, the Metropolitans, and the Monks. The Tsar, in his ecclesiastical position, represented the laity of the Church, and received the unbounded veneration of the people; and the Metropolitans, second only to the Tsar, almost without exception supported the authority of the sovereign. In the middle of the fifteenth century, the Metropolitans became independent of the See of Constantinople; and in 1589, Job, the Metropolitan of Moscow, was elevated to the dignity of a Patriarch. Meanwhile the hermits and monks acquired an immense influence. In 1338 was founded the famous Troitza monastery—a university, palace, cathedral, church, and fortress all in one—the monks and clergy of which have more than once showed themselves the deliverers of their country: first from the Tatars, by encouraging and accompanying the Grand Prince Demetrius to the famous battle of the Don in 1380; secondly, from 30,000 Poles, who in 1608 besieged the monastery for sixteen months. The holy warriors turned the fortunes of the war, and the Poles were expelled from the country.

The transition period of the Russian Church extends from the middle of the seventeenth to the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, during which time lived Nikon, the famous Patriarch of Moscow. He has been called a Russian Chrysostom, a Russian Luther, a Russian Wolsey. Ivan the Terrible, in his own savage way, had done something towards rectifying the abuses of the Church. The Patriarch did more. He took in hand the Russian hierarchy, whom he found idle and drunken. He set them a good example on one hand by founding hospitals, feeding the hungry, visiting prisoners, and above all, after the silence of many centuries, by preaching sermons; but, on the other hand, he administered clerical discipline with uncommon severity. He was perpetually sending his officers round the city, with orders that if they found a priest or monk in a state of intoxication, they were to imprison him, strip him, and scourge him: and numbers of dissolute clergy he banished to Siberia. His name, however, is chiefly remembered by reason of his innovations. He was a great stickler for the jots and tittles of the Greek ritual. Finding that copyists' errors had crept into the service-books, which were in manuscript, he sent deputations to Mount Athos, and throughout the Eastern churches, for correct copies, put the printing press to work to circulate new rubrics, and set on foot a work of revision, which met with frantic opposition on the part of the ignorant among the people, and was ultimately made the ground for the secession of a large part of the Russian raskolniks or nonconformists.

The fourth, which has been called the reformation period of the Russian Church, extends from the time of Peter the Great to our own day. The patriarchate had attained to a position of great power, and the Great Peter was not the man to brook such a rival as Nikon had been to his father Alexis. Accordingly, on the death of the patriarch Adrian, in 1700, his chair was allowed to remain vacant for twenty years, at the end of which time Peter abolished the patriarchate, and appointed a synod. He also carried out many reforms and improvements which he had the good sense to see were sorely needed. He established schools for the children of the clergy, abolished anchorites, reformed the monasteries, and issued regulations enjoining bishops to read the Scriptures carefully, and not to be absent from their dioceses without permission of the Synod. Many of his changes, however, excited great dissatisfaction. The measures of Nikon had sadly perturbed the orthodox Russians; those of Peter drove them to desperation and to further schism. Among the charges brought against the Tsar were such as these, that he had introduced into the churches pictures by western artists; which was held to be a mortal sin. The former Tsars and Patriarchs had forbidden the use of tobacco; but Peter tried to force it on the people, of whom he inquired whether it was more wicked to smoke tobacco than to drink brandy? Yes, they replied, because it is not "that which goeth into a man, but that which cometh out of a man, that defileth him." Moreover, at the opening of the eighteenth century, Peter changed the calendar; gave his people the 1st of January for their New Year's Day, and began to compute their chronology from the birth of Christ instead of the creation of the world. This, among other like things, was regarded as the very sign of Antichrist, inasmuch as he was "to change times and laws;" and Peter the Great is still designated Antichrist by the majority of Russian raskolniks. Since the time of the great reformer the Russian Church has gone on very much as he left it, the few minor reforms introduced by the Emperors Alexander the First and Second being in the right direction. There have not been wanting, moreover, men of note and learning who have filled the chairs of the Metropolitans, to some of whom we shall have occasion to allude hereafter.

We now turn to the rites and ceremonies of the Russian Church, introducing the subject by a few words upon its church buildings, which are modelled, almost without exception, on the Byzantine style of architecture. Dr. Neale defines a Byzantine church as "a gabled Greek cross, with central dome, inscribed in a square, or quasi-square." On the exterior, besides the central, there is sometimes a western dome; often there is one at each angle of the square, occasionally one at each end of the cross. Instead of spires, therefore, the eye of a traveller in Russia becomes accustomed to cross-crowned domes, which, as they are brightly painted, and sometimes even covered with gold, and furnished with bells, affect both eye and ear not unpleasingly. In bells the Russian Church is the richest in Europe. The largest we have in England, that of Christ Church, Oxford, weighing seven tons, is but a baby compared with many in Russia. The largest in St. Petersburg weighs twenty-three tons; "Great John," in the older capital, weighs ninety-six tons, whilst the old "Tsar Kolokol," or the king of bells, in Moscow, weighed originally nearly two hundred tons, or 432,000 lb. Reckoning eighteen silver roubles,* or thirty shillings per pood of thirty-six English pounds, we get a price for our Oxford bell of 700*l.*, and for that of the largest one of Moscow, of 18,000*l.* This monster bell is twenty-six feet high and sixty-seven feet round, and would provide room inside for several cells for monks, such as those I visited underground at Troitza. The church bells are rung by an ecclesiastic in minor orders, and, according to definite rules. Entering a church from the west, the internal arrangement is seen to be fourfold: first, the narthex, or porch, anciently for catechumens and penitents; next, the nave, or body of the church; then a narrow platform, raised by steps, answering to the choir; and beyond that the sanctuary. The sanctuary is divided into three chambers: the central one being called "the altar," in which stands the communion-table, and behind it the bishop's throne; the southern chamber forming the sacristy, whilst that on the north is for preparing the sacramental elements. The sanctuary is parted off from the choir by a high panelled screen, called the iconastasis, pierced by three doors, the centre opening being called the "royal gates," on the north side of which hangs an icona, or sacred picture of the Virgin; and on the south side a picture of our Saviour, and also the patron saint of the church. The remaining parts of the screen are covered with other pictures, upon the frames and coverings of which an almost fabulous amount is sometimes lavished. The precious stones on the picture of Our Lady of Kazan in St. Petersburg are valued at 15,000*l.*, whilst at Moscow one emerald on the picture of the Holy Virgin of Vladimir is valued at 10,000*l.*; the whole of those on the icon being estimated at 45,000*l.*

Picture-worship is an almost universal attendant of Russian devotion, more so even than in Roman countries; and the Russian Church has found it bought at the church entrance. In one church in St. Petersburg, and that not the largest, I was told that money is taken yearly for candles up to ten thousand roubles (say 1,250*l.*). The vestments of the priests and bishops are gorgeous in the extreme. A Metropolitan's sakkos is shown at Moscow, which is said to weigh fifty pounds, by reason of the pearls and gems with which it is embroidered. At the Troitza monastery are fifteen dresses for the Archimandrite, one of which, for the mere making, cost the necessary to issue many warnings against the perils of idolatry. She draws a nice distinction between the unlawfulness of using in worship an image proper, and the lawfulness of using the same image if carved on a flat surface; but the ordinary observer who beholds people in an Eastern church bowing down before graven images and likenesses of things that are in heaven and in earth, must find it exceedingly difficult to determine where reverence ends and idolatry begins. A prominent feature of Eastern worship is the plentiful use of lighted candles, Empress Elizabeth 800*l.*, the robe itself being valued at 14,000*l.* This monastery, according to Dr. King, is said to possess among its treasure two bushels of pearls, and from what I have twice seen there, I am inclined to add an estimated pint of diamonds, to say nothing of emeralds, rubies, and sapphires innumerable!

The church services are of a monastic character, long and tedious, read in Slavonic, "which is to the modern Russian," says Dr. Neale, "about what the language of Chaucer is to us." For my own part

I hope it is no worse; but when, in Kasan Cathedral, I asked my interpreter, born in Russia, what the priest was saying, he could not tell me. From time to time in the services commemorations are made of the Virgin and saints, and prayers are offered to them, blessings are asked of God through their intercessions, and the response, Gospodi Pomilui, "Lord, have mercy," is uttered thirty, forty, fifty times, or more, almost at a breath.

There are also many minor and curious services, as, for the consecration of a church, for an icon or picture, washing the feet on Thursday in Holy Week, prayers on laying the first stone of a house, and for seed-time: longer offices to be used in drought, earthquake, plague, incursion of barbarians, for children when they commence their education, and many more; but I think that on this head I have said enough.

II.

It would appear from Dr. Neale's "History of the Eastern Church," that the Russian dioceses are subdivided into rural deaneries, each consisting of a circle of from ten to thirty parishes, some of which, in Siberia, must be very extensive, though not necessarily populous. A priest near Tobolsk, however, told me that he had 5,000 parishioners; another at Kansk, near Irkutsk, had 2,000, widely scattered; whilst on the Siberian coast of the Pacific, Nikolaefsk and Vladivostock, towns of three and five thousand inhabitants respectively, form only one parish each. Every selo, or town of a certain grade, has a church, and in some of the derevnia, or villages, churches, and small chapels, or oratories, are built, in which latter, services other than the liturgy may be performed. The churches are kept in repair and furnished by parochial committees, of not less than five persons, elected annually, who on retiring from office are called "church elders." They visit every house in the parish, and determine what proportion of the expenses shall be paid by each householder. There would seem to be no difficulty in raising the necessary funds, and I must add that I was agreeably surprised in Siberia to see how well and how clean the churches were kept, even those in the remotest and most out-of-the-way places.

Concerning the clergy, they are of two orders, the parochial and the monastic, or, as sometimes called, the white and the black, the secular and the regular clergy. Dr. Neale, thirty years ago, gave the number of priests in Russia at 34,000, and deacons 16,000; whilst a recent report from the Holy Synod says that the church services are carried on by 37,718 priests and 11,857 deacons: and that there are also other church officers numbering 65,951. Such was the plethora of clergy in the time of Peter the Great, that they had to restrict the number of ordinations, and of those who should serve. Now, however, there is no superabundance of clergy, but, speaking generally, every parish church is under the control of a pricht, or corporation, consisting of the priest, deacon, and two dechoks, or bell-ringer and reader, and also a widow woman to prepare the sacramental bread.

The parish priest may rise to be a protopope, that is, head priest of an episcopal church, or one having other priests under him, but so long as his wife is living he can go no higher. Should he become a widower, and take the monk's habit, he is then eligible to be made a bishop. In former times there prevailed in Russia a pernicious custom, that every clergyman's son was obliged to follow the profession of his father. This is no longer compulsory, and the sons of the clergy, finding themselves free, choose other callings to such an extent that there is now a lack of candidates for the priesthood. Candidates, however, are still drawn for the most part from the homes of the clergy, and sometimes from the lower class of merchants; but hardly ever, I am informed, from the upper classes.

Peter the Great found his clergy exceedingly ignorant, and wisely established seminaries for their children, enjoining the bishops to support them with a twentieth part of the income from the monasteries. These seminaries, and others which have been added, still exist, and in them are educated the rank and file of the clergy. In Siberia I happened to fall in with a number of students on the steamer, returning to a seminary after their holidays, and from them and their teacher I got much information. Priests' sons are provided with education, food, and clothing free; other scholars have to pay for food and clothing. They are at the seminary ten months and a half during the year, and have the remaining six weeks for a holiday. They have six classes, and stay two years in each, with four lectures daily, and read from eight till two. At the seminary at Blagovestchensk they had last year fifty students and nine professors, namely, of Latin, mathematics, Greek (no Hebrew), theology, philosophy, the Bible, Russian, Manchu, physics, music, etc.

The students, I was told, on leaving, usually know a little Latin and Greek, and may learn modern languages, but this is not compulsory. I did not once meet with a priest who could speak French, German, or English. Perhaps they throw their strength into patristic and ecclesiastical learning, since the parochial clergy are usually said to be very ignorant in secular studies. Two instances were given me, one by a friend, who said she had from time to time endeavoured to instruct the priest of her country parish in geography, but that he persisted in maintaining that London was in the middle of France. The other instance was given me by an Englishman who travelled in Siberia with a Russian archbishop. One day the archbishop asked the Englishman which had the greater population, London or San Francisco. Whereupon my wicked friend said, "Well, you see, London has a population of two hundred thousand, and San Francisco four millions." "Ah!" said the archbishop with satisfaction, "I thought so: I thought San Francisco was the larger!" Those students who wish to attain to the higher degrees of learning, on leaving the seminary, proceed to one of the ecclesiastical academies, which correspond to our universities, and it is now required that all who are to be consecrated bishops shall have passed through the academy.

The pay of the priests is small; but it must not be inferred that their duties are light. They have every day, morning, noon and evening services, and every priest has to keep a clerical journal of his official acts, what he and his fellows do daily. This is for the bishop's assistant; and should the journal be suddenly found not written up to date, the priest is liable to be punished. "How would you be punished?" said I to the protopope. "With a good talking to, perhaps, for the first offence, and for the second a fine, or perhaps have the delinquency inscribed on one's character paper;" in other words, carry a blot on one's escutcheon for life! Verily, ecclesiastical discipline, whether in great things or small, is not a dead letter in Russia. Perhaps it is not altogether uncalled for. By it priests are forbidden to find their amusements at the theatre, or in cards, buffoonery, or dancing; and though among so many thousands of clergy, denied of so many advantages, one would expect to find a certain proportion of evil-doers, and even of criminals, yet I was hardly prepared for a statement made to me by a released political exile, that in one of the Siberian mines in which he worked, there were a hundred convicts who had formerly occupied a priestly position. This, of course, is a sad picture, though we shall not have far to seek for a principal cause, and shall recognise in it an old foe too well known in England. It is drink! I would not make this allusion upon mere hearsay, which is ever ready to blacken a clergyman's name; but I was obliged in Russia to know and see things in men of my own cloth that made me hate drink more than ever. This is a painful and humiliating subject, though the more respectable amongst the Russians regard the matter in various lights. Some, of course, condemn such priests unmercifully. One man told me he had not communicated for several years; "for," said he, "how can I in the morning receive the sacrament from the hands of my country priest, when I know that before night he may probably be inebriated?" On the other hand, a religious general said to me, "If my priest supplies me properly with the ordinances of the Church, I am not concerned with his private life; that lies between God and his own soul," whilst, again, others made allowance for their great temptations. On five festivals in the year, at least, the priest is supposed to go the round of his parish, and say a prayer in every house; and on these festive occasions, refreshment stands on the sideboard, and vodka, or spirits, is proffered as drink, the evil results of which, among clergy and laity, on one of the festivals, I myself was compelled to see.

OLD MR. QUILCH.

"OLD Mr. Quilch is very ill," said our good doctor to me as we met on our parish rounds. "I wish you would go to see him, but you had better not let him know that I have spoken to you. He is so peculiar."

I went at once, of course.

The old gentleman (he was not very old after all; but we had got into the habit of thinking and calling him so) was a parishioner of mine, a man of secluded and self-contained life, and reputed to be wealthy. He came occasionally to church, not often. He never appeared at the Lord's Table. He was shrewd and intelligent, somewhat testy in temper, lived in a good house, and had his notions; and I, though I was his pastor, was almost as much a stranger to him as everybody else. He was one of those people who will not let you become acquainted with them.

My interview was not a very agreeable one. Whether the old man considered a clergyman's visit in sickness an unwelcome reminder of death, or whether he suspected that I intended to catechise him severely as to his spiritual state, I do not know, but his manner was most ungracious, and he took especial pains to make me understand that he had neither sent for me, nor desired that I should come. "Well," I said, "Mr. Quilch, I am here, as you see, and if you will kindly permit me, I will remain with you a few minutes; I promise not to weary you."

He gave a gruff assent, and I sat down.

Thereupon, perhaps by way of anticipating me, he opened the conversation by telling me that he did not believe in a death-bed repentance. "Nor, in your sense, do I," was my rejoinder. "That it is possible to repent and be converted even when the sands of life are running low I do not question for a moment; the story of the penitent thief is conclusive on that point; but still, it is a terrible thing for a man to postpone to the last repentance and turning to the Lord, and neither you nor I could, I am sure, wish any one dear to us, nor, indeed, any one at all, to act so."

"Quite true," said he. "Quite true; 'as the tree falls so it must lie.' Now, as to myself, I know that my end is not very far off; this disease is a fatal one, and will kill me a few months hence. But I am satisfied as to my condition; I have no reason to be afraid, for I have always modelled my life upon the Ten Commandments."

I was not a little startled when I heard these last words: "I have modelled my life upon the Ten Commandments!" "Why," I thought, "I have been these many years past preaching Christ as a necessity to every human soul; and here is one of my flock, who deliberately puts Christ aside, and professes his ability to get to heaven without any heavenly assistance whatever. No Saviour required, no Spirit, no atonement, no new birth, no spiritual life! The whole scheme which Divine wisdom has devised, and Divine self-sacrifice effected, and Divine love is now carrying out, completely ignored, and the work accomplished by man himself!" And I must confess that my first thought—it ought not to have been my first I know, but it was—was one of humiliation at the thought of the inefficiency of my ministry, and of my inability to instruct an intelligent hearer in the very rudiments of the Christian faith.

After a moment's awkward and embarrassing pause, it occurred to me to remark that I remembered the story of a young man who was mentioned in the gospels, and who also claimed to have "modelled his life on the Ten Commandments." I had no doubt, I said, that the young man's statement was true, taking the words in the meaning which he himself affixed to them; for no one would dare to look into the eyes of Jesus of Nazareth and tell Him a falsehood; the young ruler had doubtless lived an exceptionally pure and correct life—but for all that, I said, he turned his back upon Christ and left Him, and probably never came into His presence again.

I spoke quietly, and with no special emphasis. The idea had presented itself to me, and I uttered it without much definite purpose; it was just a sort of simple and natural reflection that flowed from me; but the word proved to be like a fiery dart flung into the heart of my hearer. He was obviously deeply irritated; he became at once very restless; and then throwing off the mask, flinging down and trampling, as it were, underfoot his plea of obedience to the Ten Commandments, he exclaimed, with the air of one driven to bay, but determined to face it out to the last, "Well, well, I have lived like other men; and now I suppose I must take my chance."

Simple words these, but when we look into them, what a depth of mournful meaning they convey! The man knew that he was about to enter upon that long journey from which no traveller ever returns. He comforted himself with thinking that he was like other men. If he was ignorant of what should befall him, so were they. Should the worst come to the worst, he was only one of a very large company; and God would not have the heart to shut such a vast multitude out of the kingdom of Christ. It seems very strange, does it not? that men, when they are intending to emigrate to a foreign country, should be most anxious about making preparation and providing means, and doing everything in their power to secure for themselves a kindly reception and welcome in the place to which they are bound, and yet that they should think so little about their migration to the eternal world.

How different the hope of those who know the Lord Jesus Christ. He has been revealed to them, and they have a personal acquaintance with Him; and they feel that they cannot be strangers in the place in which He deigns most especially to manifest Himself. A true disciple, unless his mind be overclouded by physical depression, need be in no doubt about his reception in the unseen world. He is sufficiently informed what he shall have to meet with when he departs. He will not say, like poor Mr. Quilch, "I must take my chance." He will rather say, "I know where I am going, and, therefore, I know to what I am going. I am going home."

FEBRUARY 6.

THE BOYHOOD OF JESUS. LUKE II. 39–50.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 40.—'And the Child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon Him.'

I. THE CHILD JESUS IN NAZARETH.—Read vers. 39, 40. They returned into Galilee. But not immediately after the Presentation in the Temple (see last Lesson). First returning to Bethlehem, they were visited by the Magi from the East (Matt. ii.). Then followed the flight into Egypt, the massacre of the children, the death of Herod; and the Holy Family were in fact on their way back to Bethlehem, presumably intending to settle there as in the royal city, when they were divinely directed to turn aside to Nazareth.

> Needless difficulties have been made with respect to this order of events. Luke omits what Matthew records, but the accounts, combined as above, are perfectly harmonious. Note that the 'star in the East' appeared at the time of Christ's birth, and from Persia or Chaldæa the journey would take some weeks, which would bring the date to the time immediately succeeding the Presentation. The tradition which places the 'wise men's' visit on the twelfth day after the Nativity is plainly incorrect.

Nazareth; for descriptions, see Biblical Dictionaries or Gazetteers. It was remarkable for its secluded situation, on the brow of a hill, with open plains surrounding. None of the main lines of traffic passed near it.

What was Nathanael's question about the place? John i. 46 (implying obscurity rather than ill-fame). Here, in quiet home life, apart from the world, the Child Jesus grew. Apparently the angels' visit to Bethlehem, the words of Simeon and Anna, the visit of the Magi, were forgotten by most—yet, who still treasured them in her heart? The Golden Text gives the picture of a perfect childhood. Growth, strength (the words in spirit are not found in the best authorities), wisdom and grace, a fourfold description, in every feature most beautiful! Note: this is spoken of Christ's human nature; the Deity within giving purity and perfection to all, but leaving Him still a Child.

II. THE VISIT TO JERUSALEM.—Read vers. 41–45. 'The stages of Jewish childhood were marked as follows: At three the boy was weaned, and wore for the first time the fringed or tasselled garment prescribed by Num. xv. 38–41, and Deut. xxii. 12. His education began at first under his mother's care. At five, he was to learn the Law, at first by extracts of the more important passages written on scrolls, the Shemà or Creed of Deut. vi. 4, the Hallel or Festival Psalms (Psa. cxiv., cxviii., cxxxvi.), and by catechetical teaching in school. At twelve he became more directly responsible for his obedience to the Law.'* Accordingly, now for the first time Jesus accompanied His parents to Jerusalem (as was still held binding, according to Deut. xvi. 16) to keep the Feast. Women were not compelled, but were permitted, to accompany their husbands; so Hannah (1 Sam. i. 7). The ancient word was fulfilled: Mal. iii. 1. 'Suddenly;' unknown! Who could look for His coming thus—a village child! The days, how many? At their close He tarried behind. How was this? A farewell visit to the Temple would be paid at the time of the morning sacrifice before the party from Nazareth started homewards. The company would be large, and a child (who might be trusted anywhere and with anybody) might not be missed until each little group or family was preparing for nightly rest. Then came anxious inquiry for Him, in vain! — and after a broken night of sorrow, the second day was spent in returning to the city.

III. JESUS IN THE TEMPLE.—Read vers. 46–50. How do you reckon the three days before they found Him? Some time at least they must have lost before inquiring at the right place. At last where was He? Who were the doctors? 'A chamber of the Temple was set apart as a kind of open free-school. The "doctors," or teachers—famous "doctors of the law" (Acts v. 34) "sat in Moses' seat"; the older students on a low bench, the younger on the ground, literally, at the feet of their instructor.'—Plumptre. Among the great 'doctors' living then, were the Rabbis Hillel, Simeon, and Gamaliel, father, son, and grandson. It is not too much to suppose that these great lights of Judaism may have been there, listening to the Holy Child? [Would not Gamaliel remember? Acts v. 34.] And how did He approach them? Like a child, no doubt, sitting on the lowest seat, showing his desire to learn in two ways—hearing and asking questions. [The learner who is not encouraged to ask questions loses half the value of a lesson. Such questions teach and help the teacher.] But never had such a disciple entered those Temple courts before! We cannot tell the particular subjects of conversation: but they must have related to the fulfilment of the Law, the hopes of Israel, the coming kingdom. An understanding such as no child had ever shown before prompted those questions, and those answers had a depth of meaning that astonished all, as by a new revelation! Happy for them, had they thus been prepared in after days to know Him who is the Way, and the Truth and the Life! Surely He himself must now have been filled with the consciousness of His own relation to God, and to His truth!

At length the earthly parents of Jesus found Him here, and thus engaged. What are Mary's first words? A question, rather than a rebuke. They can trust Him still, as having done rightly, but they long to know why. Look at the answer of Jesus, 'No need to have sought Me, had you but known!' There was a Divine necessity in His course. I must be. The very law of His life is thus disclosed, not in this act alone, but always. About My Father's business. Note the direct reply to Mary's Thy Father. The Divine Son asserts His higher relationship. My true Father is on high! Mary herself would understand this well. Observe again, that the word business is not in Christ's own saying, which may be literally rendered, In the things that are my Father's, i.e., in His work, in His house, in all that belongs to Him. This would remind Joseph and Mary that the Father's house, the Temple, was the place in which to have sought the Son; but it means much more. The Child Jesus takes this now as the motto of His life; and these first recorded words of His declare the principle to which He was ever true, until at last He lifted up His eyes to heaven, and said, 'I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do!' There was something in this too great for Joseph and Mary to understand. Yet surely they might have understood! Had they forgotten Bethlehem? But that they understood not only proves to us how truly Jesus had been a child, their child, through those twelve years. No marvels or mysteries, but just a quiet, loving obedient, household life—a pattern to children everywhere.

IV. The Return to Nazareth.—Read vers. 51, 52. Jesus had declared that God was His Father; would He now not choose to stay in His Father's house—like many a consecrated child of old? (1 Sam. i. 28.) Mary must have tremblingly wondered what His next words, His next act would be! We know what it was. No doubt, no hesitation. He rose at once and went down with them, and came to Nazareth. Is not this the most wonderful part of the story? He had found His true home in the Temple, and willingly now He turns from the Temple to the home. The Son of God becomes again as a son to Joseph, and takes up again the thread of His lowly working life at the Galilean village, where, for eighteen silent years, He abides until His hour has come. Two lessons let us all learn. 'Our Father's business' lies in the right discharge of daily duty; and faithfulness to present obligations is the best preparation for what future days may bring. The highest example teaches us all 'to labour and to wait.'

His mother kept all these sayings in her heart—just as she had done twelve years before (see ver. 19). What a storehouse of holy remembrances must her mind have been, as thus she quietly pondered the history of the Divine Son! And this leads to a suggestion of no small interest. The two chapters from which these first six lessons have been selected form a record that stands alone in the Gospels. It might itself be called 'The Gospel of Christ's Infancy.' Now Luke had knowledge of all things 'from the very beginning,' and had his information from 'eye-witnesses.' Must not this part of the record have come to him from Mary herself, containing much that only she could have known, and throughout relating that which she, more than any one, had stored in heart?

Thus the years went on, and to the notice of the growth of Jesus in vers. 40, it is now added that He had favour with man, as well as with God. Every one loved him—so unselfish, upright, loving, pure. The time had not yet come for His rejection by the very people of his own Nazareth. See Lesson for February 20.

Questions.

1. Show the harmony of the accounts of Matthew and Luke, down to the time of the residence of the Holy Family in Nazareth. How long was this, probably, after the birth of Christ?

2. At what feasts were the male inhabitants of the land bound to appear in the Temple at Jerusalem? Cite any passages from the Old Testament bearing on the instruction of children in connection with these solemnities.

3. By what other appellations were the 'doctors' known, and what may we gather from the New Testament as to the character of their teachings?

4. Quote the chief sayings of Jesus in His after life that correspond with His earliest recorded words.

5. 'It was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene,' Matt. ii. 23. Explain the reference.

"IN LOVE FORBEARING ONE ANOTHER."

III.

THE long days had come, and the ocean-weed was carefully spread all over the sand-banks that it might get dry and fit to be burned. The Elliots had collected an unusually large quantity this year, and Patrick had already reckoned up the number of shillings which he should get for the kelp.

The crisp stuff was piled in cocks, just as farmers pile up hay, and when it was as dry as wind and sun could make it, the kiln was built upon the beach above high-water mark. Brian and his father arranged the great stones of which the kiln was made, and flattened it at the bottom, and smoothed it at the sides until it looked very much like a shallow open grave. But directly it was finished Katrine came and lit a bright turf fire in it, and then the important operation of making kelp began.

Small quantities of the dry seaweed were placed on the fire, and wherever little tongues of flames showed themselves, more seaweed was flung—daintily at first, so as not to overpower the fire, then in larger quantities as the mass below glowed fierce and hot.

Volumes of smoke rolled off into the air, smoke so dense that Patrick could not see his children, although they were standing within five feet of him on the other side of the milky cloud. It appeared as though tons of cotton wool were pouring up from the kiln, rolling off slowly along the ground, clinging together without scattering, and keeping one unbroken line for a mile or two before the fresh air from off the Atlantic succeeded in dispersing it.

The Elliots stood in the clear atmosphere "to windward" of this pungent suffocating smoke, piling on the leagh with cautious hands. The kiln could not be left for a moment, for if the fire once forced its way through and leaped into a blaze, the kelp would be spoiled.

It was quite late in the day before the heaps of seaweed were exhausted; then the work was over—the kelp was burned.

Not that it was quite finished yet. Patrick, Brian, and some of the neighbours gathered round and pounded away at the red-hot ashes with iron rods. It had to be beaten in this manner all the time it was cooling to make it stick together; when it was nearly cold they formed it into blocks of about two feet square.

Then they piled it up proudly, and Katrine came to look at it, and Kitty patted its rough blue surface with her little hands, and wondered "how many pound notes it was worth."

Three or four days afterwards a ship's boat came to the pier to take it on board the vessel which was to carry it to Glasgow; and the captain, who was also the kelp merchant, stood settling with Patrick about the price.

Like many buyers this man was offering far less money than it was worth. Patrick remonstrated.

"The kelp's good," he said, "and it's full weight, if it is not over the mark."

"Ay," said another voice, significantly, "stones are bound to weigh well."

It was Quigley who spoke. He was lounging on the quay and had drawn close to the captain.

"Are there any stones in it?" demanded the captain, sharply; "if so, I'll not have it at any price."

"No, no!" cried Patrick, "indeed 'tis as innocent kelp as ever was made; not a stone the size of a nut in the whole of it."

But the merchant shook his head doubtfully.

"Break it, and see," said Patrick.

"All very well when you know I can't sell it myself when it is all smashed about," was the reply.

For a long time the dispute went on, and at last poor Patrick was obliged to take a very low price indeed for his kelp, all because of Quigley's unkind and untrue hint about the stones.

He did not say a word about it at home; "What would be the good of telling it?" he said to himself. "Telling won't mend matters; and Brian would be fairly wild with Micky, so he would! It's sorry enough Micky will be one day, or I'm much mistaken."

IV.

Michael Quigley's leagh was still lying spread out upon the sand-banks; he had not so many pairs of hands at his command as some of his neighbours had.

The stuff was ready at last, and he hired a man to help him with the business of the kiln the very next day.

Suddenly the wind changed, and a great mass of cloud with ragged edges came rising from behind the sea.

"There'll be a sight of rain soon," said Patrick.

"Ay," responded his son, "and there's a whole lot of seaweed lying out on the far bank yet; come along, lads, and let's be helping to get it into stacks."

"It's Micky Quigley that owns it," remarked one of the boys.

"Oh," said Brian, his manner changing at once, "it belongs to Quigley, does it? Then it may lie there and rot, for all I care!"

Patrick took hold of the lad's shoulder as he used to do when Brian was a little boy in petticoats. "No, it mayn't lie here, and it shan't rot," said he. "Come along, Brian, and help me, if ye won't help Quigley. I'm after going this very minute, and if you don't come there'll but be the more for myself to do."

So Brian followed his father to the shore, sulkily enough; and Michael Quigley could scarcely believe his eyes when he saw the whole Elliot family labouring hard to save his leagh from the coming rain.

A sharp twinge of shame came over him when he thought of all he had said against them; why, it was but a week since he had spoiled the sale of his poor neighbour's kelp!

Micky and his stubborn, churlish heart had a sore battle between them that night.

The rain was splashing down, when somebody tapped at Elliot's door. Kitty opened it, and saw Michael standing there.

"Come in," said the child, true to her Irish instinct of hospitality.

"Not the night, thank ye," was the answer. "Give that to your mother, will ye," and he disappeared into the darkness.

Kitty brought a parcel to the fire, which, when unrolled, proved to contain a large shawl, seemingly quite new. The party round the hearth gazed in utter surprise.

"I believe it belonged to his poor wife that's gone," said Katrine softly.

Brian was for sending it back at once.

"I think it is sheer impudence giving things to mother after how he's behaved himself," the young man said hotly.

But Patrick interposed.

"'Tis kindly meant," he said, "and kindly we'll take it. 'Tisn't much Bible learning that I have, anyway, but I do know that Christians should be forbearing and forgiving one to another. And I believe that a civil tongue and a heart that bears no malice, are better weapons to conquer an enemy with than the toughest stick and the strongest arm that any of you boys can show."

"D'ye think to conquer Quigley, then, father?"

"Well," answered Patrick, "anyway I mean to go this minute and thank him for the shawl."

And off he marched out into the rain and the night.

None knew what passed between those two men; but from that day forward the neighbours heard no more words against the Elliots from Quigley's lips. In time even Brian grew civil to his old antagonist; and as for Kitty, the child is always "up at Micky's," whenever her mother can spare her. She housekeeps for him, and chatters to him, and brings many a gleam of happiness to his solitary home, and many a smile to his withered old lips.

It may be that after the winter-time of bitterness the sunshine of peace may arise in his heart, and he too may learn the Saviour's lesson of love. Perhaps all his crossings and ill-will may be forgiven for that blessed Saviour's sake.

"Ay, but there's not many in this world like Patrick Elliot," Michael has been heard to say.

Perhaps he is right. More's the pity.

BIBLE CLOCK.

We resume our series of Bible Clocks with the word Sing. The number of answers we have received in past years, for which we have been unable to find a place, shows the interest awakened by these exercises. They have come from foreign lands, from servants and cottagers, from "mothers' meetings," as well as from many a school and family circle. As before explained, the object is to find a word or subject about which twelve texts or portions of Scripture can be given in the form of a diagram representing the face of a clock. In the index space of II., a verse, or portion of a verse, consisting of two words, is to be written; at III., a sentence of three words, and so on. The sentences must have the exact number of words required, and must be a clear statement, whether formed of one verse, or part of a verse, or portions of more than one verse.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE outlook of 1881, viewed from a religious standpoint, has its serious aspects in more than one foreign country, as well as in our own land. Our nearest neighbour, France, in the minds of many experienced observers, excites not a little anxiety for the stability of her institutions, inasmuch as, from one cause or other, the outburst of a spirit of anarchy seems ever and anon to threaten the national well-being. That spirit finds allies at one time in the ranks of a fierce fanaticism, engendered by superstition; at another among men whose avowed irreligion and gross materialism are only equalled by their contempt for true morality. On the other hand, the antagonism between these conflicting forces seems at times to afford a freer field for the proclamation of the Gospel. The Secretary of the Evangelical Continental Society, in appealing for aid on behalf of that institution, remarks that the closing of the monasteries, or, more strictly speaking, the dissolution of the unauthorised congregations, appears, at first sight, a strange proceeding on the part of the Government. "But," he goes on to say, "it should be borne in mind that the measures are part of a great and much-needed policy directed towards the emancipation of nearly half the schools throughout the land, both primary and secondary, from the hands of the Ultramontane party, by whom they are used as a means of instilling into the youthful mind doctrines utterly subversive of all modern liberties. The mortal conflict between the State and the dominant Church must deepen the conviction already strong in many minds that Rome is the sworn foe of independent political life, and that consequently it is the duty of all true patriots to abjure its pretensions and seek for another religion. It is certainly a fact that, while monasteries are being closed, and bishops and priests are uttering their anathemas and sentences of excommunication, the multitude are ready to listen to the claims of the Gospel. I have letters and papers before me showing how widespread is the change that has come over men's minds. In the Basses Alpes and the Vendée, in the centre of the country where Protestantism is perfectly unknown—in Burgundy and in the Northern Departments—in every direction, indeed, men seem to be waiting for the preacher of the Gospel. No part of the heathen world can offer a more splendid field for the Christian missionary." And while the present attitude of the French people in regard to the Gospel is unparalleled in the history of their country, and, perhaps, of the world, other European lands also offer, we are told, unusual facilities and openings for evangelistic enterprise. Belgium is at war with Rome in regard to education, and its Walloon, if not its Flemish, populations are rapidly being alienated from the Church of which, not long since, they were such devout adherents. In Spain, although the outlook is not a very cheering one, new fields are opening up. In Italy, where perfect liberty prevails, and the most intense misery is endured by an overtaxed people, whole regions neglected by the English and American Protestant agencies which have all congregated in a few of the larger cities, need to be visited by bold and determined evangelists. In other regions, such as Bohemia, and the various Sclav provinces of Austria, also, large opportunities for usefulness are presented.

SOMETHING like a crusade against the Jews is being carried on in Berlin and other parts of Prussia. The leaders in the movement, it is alleged, blame the Jews for getting money and position, for influencing public opinion, and for causing German notions of honour, religion, and morality, to be superseded by cosmopolitan ones. Instead of trying to vanquish the Judaism they hate by the strength of their own superior morality and religion, and endeavouring to convert the Jews to the true faith, they are represented as wishing to institute a system of persecution against them, and to deprive them of all influence in the State. The consequence of this agitation has been that several Jews have been insulted in the streets at Berlin, and even acts of violence have been committed. The movement has no sympathy among the upper classes, nor indeed among the majority of the people; and a petition has been sent to the Emperor, signed by many influential persons, asking that the Jews may be protected in their rights. The Crown Prince and Princess, too, have discountenanced the agitation, and, to show it has not their sympathy, have attended Jewish festivals and concerts.

SEVERAL important religious assemblies were held during the latter part of the past year in the United States. The Presbyterian Council, which met in Philadelphia, was one of the most important ecclesiastical conferences ever held in that country. It consisted of delegates from the different Presbyterian churches, not only of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, but of England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Holland, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, India, China, Austria and Africa. The Council had no executive or judicial control over the bodies represented in it. The principal part of the business consisted in the reading of papers on different topics followed by discussion. An address to the churches, to be read in Presbyterian places of worship, in all the countries represented in the Council, was adopted. A New York journal remarks that "as the Evangelical Alliance, in 1873, exalted the Gospel in the eyes of the country, and of the world, so the testimony of this great council will confirm the faith, strengthen the heart, and increase the joy of the churches it has so intelligently and nobly represented."

THE Triennial General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States met in the city of New York, and continued in session two or three weeks. The indications of sentiment in the Convention were in the highest degree gratifying to the friends of evangelical religion and of the onward progress of the Gospel. It was evident in the deliberations and in the resolutions that ritualistic tendencies had received a decided check, and that, without any abatement of true Churchmanship, there was a revival of that earnest faith in the spirit and power of a pure Gospel which rejects all dependence on vestments and postures and mere forms. The order of Sisterhoods received no encouragement, but the contrary, at the hands of this Convention; the divorce question was wisely handled; and the Indian question had an intelligent Christian discussion, action being taken tending to influence Congressional legislation in the interests of justice and humanity.

THE seventy-first annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was held in the city of Lowell, and occupied four days. In his annual survey of the work of the Board, presented by the Rev. Dr. Clark, the Foreign Secretary, he thus summed up the labours of the year: "The marked events of the year are the great revival at Marash; the religious interest continued so healthfully in the Shantung Province of North China, in the Madura and Micronesian Missions; the enlargement in North China, Micronesia, and among the Dakotas; the organisation of new missions in Africa; the demand for higher education in Japan, India, and the Turkish Empire; and remarkable openings for woman's work in nearly all the mission fields, requiring a large increase of missionaries and expenditure to meet the opportunity. The statistics show an increase at almost every point save in the working force of missionaries; a hundred more places in which the Gospel is preached; eleven more churches organised; nearly twenty-five hundred more on the roll of Church membership; four hundred more youth in higher institutions of learning; a thousand more in common schools; hundreds, perhaps thousands, more of women reached by Christian influences in their homes; a Christian literature scattering its leaves more and more widely in advance of all other agencies; and as expressive of the appreciation of the people for the Gospel and its results, larger sums than ever before raised and expended on our mission fields, amounting in the aggregate during the year to not far from 50,000 dollars. The review of the year may well lead us to ascriptions of praise and thanksgiving to the Head of the Church, and inspire us with new hope and generous anticipations for the future."

A CONVENTION has been held in the State of New Jersey to celebrate the five-hundredth anniversary of the translation of the Bible into the English language by Wycliff. The convention was composed of delegates from a large number of Bible societies. Meetings were held at which papers and addresses on selected topics appropriate to the occasion were delivered by eminent gentlemen—among others, Presidents McCosh and Campbell, Professors Green, Woodbridge and Strong, ex-Senator Frelinghuysen, and Judge Nixon.

A FOREIGN journal contains a communication, apparently from a well-informed channel, on the condition of Abyssinia. The Negus (or King) Johannes, is said to be the first person for hundreds of years who has succeeded in uniting the divided portions and peoples of Abyssinia, or, as the Government officially term it, Ethiopia. In a letter from a German missionary, who is living in Shoa, to the principal of the well-known Missionary College of Chrischona at Basle, the writer states that early in the present year the king issued a decree requiring the "conversion" of all his Mohammedan subjects to the Christian faith. "Emigrate, or convert yourselves," said the king, and it is alleged that all, without exception, preferred the latter, and have become Christians—of a sort. The Negus has since declared that he will not tolerate any more missionaries in Ethiopia, neither Catholics nor Protestants. The Ethiopians are already Christians, he says, and do not want them.

SEVERAL important cases have come before Lord Penzance. The first of these was that of the Rev. T. Pelham Dale, Rector of St. Vedast, Foster Lane, London. An inhibition had been issued against Mr. Dale for disobedience of the monition of the Arches Court, but this had been disregarded by him; he not only continued to officiate, but persisted in practices which had been judicially declared by Lord Penzance to be illegal. Mr. Dale did not appear, and his lordship now said that the law provided that in such cases the parties offending were in contempt, and on the same being signified to the Court of Chancery a writ of imprisonment would be issued. "With the policy of these proceedings," said the judge, "I have nothing to do. If appeal is made to the law, it is not only within the province, but it is the plain duty of this Court, to see that the law is upheld, and when called upon in a proper case, to enforce its own decree. The respondent can at once regain his liberty by announcing that he is ready to render obedience to the Court's decree. His imprisonment is of his own seeking, and his release will lie within his own reach." Mr. Dale was arrested on the following Saturday night at his residence by an officer of the Court of Chancery, and the Apparitor of the Arches Court, and lodged in the City prison at Holloway.

A series of resolutions justifying Mr. Dale's proceedings, and seeking the interference in his favour of the Archbishop of Canterbury, are said to have been passed at a meeting of the congregation of St. Vedast's. This document having been forwarded to his Grace, elicited a reply, in which the Archbishop said that it would, in his judgment, have been wiser for the churchwardens to have waited for the slow but sure remedy provided by the Public Worship Regulation Act, whereby, if obedience were persistently refused, the living could have become vacant, rather than resort, as they had done, to imprisonment. Referring to the theory of Mr. Dale and his supporters, that "the bishops and her Convocation alone can govern the Church," the Archbishop shows that Mr. Dale is really contravening this principle of clerical obedience to the bishop of each diocese laid down by both these authorities. He adds: "Unless, therefore, Mr. Dale claims to be entirely a law to himself, he ought to have no hesitation in dropping the usages which his bishop has condemned." He will then be free. A similar application to that which resulted as stated above was made on the same occasion, in the Arches Court, in the case of the Rev. R. W. Enraght, incumbent of Bordesley near Birmingham. As in the case of Mr. Dale, a previous monition to abstain from Ritualistic practices had been disobeyed. Lord Penzance deferred giving judgment in order to afford time for the respondent to consider his course; but the day to which the proceedings were adjourned having been reached without any alteration in his proceedings, his lordship pronounced Mr. Enraght contumacious and in contempt, and directed the matter to be signified to her Majesty in Chancery, in order that a writ for imprisonment might issue. In a third case, Lord Penzance sat as Official Principal of the Chancery of the Province of York. As in the Bordesley case, and for the same reason, judgment was deferred on the first occasion. When the Court again met, the Rev. S. J. Green, Vicar of St. John's, Miles Platting, the respondent, whose Ritualistic practices had been continued in defiance of its monitions, was the subject of a similar application to that in each of the cases stated above. The learned judge said that, this case being precisely similar, the order must be the same. A writ for imprisonment issued, therefore, in this case also.

PROFESSOR ROBERTSON SMITH has, on account of articles published in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," throwing doubt on the inspiration of certain books of the Bible, again been suspended from teaching his classes in Aberdeen Free Church College. The Free Church Commission came to that decision after a long and sometimes excited discussion. Professor Smith made a lengthy speech in defence, but the commission, by 270 to 202, adopted a motion instructing Professor Smith to abstain from teaching his classes during the ensuing session, and leaving the whole question as to his status and position in the Free Church to the determination of the ensuing assembly.

THE Bishop of Liverpool, on a recent Sunday, occupied the University pulpit at Oxford. Preaching to crowded congregations, he said that the world nowadays was well-nigh drunk with self-conceit about our so-called progress in arts and sciences. They had fallen on a sceptical and unbelieving age, and met on every side with doubts and questionings about the truth and value of revelation. There were districts in the great metropolis, in Liverpool, in Manchester, in Birmingham, in the Black Country, where Christianity seemed practically unknown. The Bishop of Long Island, America, was the select preacher before the University of Cambridge on a recent Sunday afternoon, when there was a large congregation. Dr. Littlejohn based his discourse upon the 8th Psalm, in which he dwelt upon the individualism of modern times as it affects character, morality, and religion. Agnostic materialism and socialism were also treated of by the bishop in the course of his powerful sermon.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS, Q.C., M.P., presided at a recent conference of Sunday-school teachers and others, who met at the offices of the Sunday-school Union to consider "the best means of training the young in a reverent regard for the Sabbath." Sir Thomas Chambers said that he had always felt the question of Sunday observance to be one of the greatest importance. They could not travel abroad without seeing with intense pain that the ordinary occupations of life were carried on in a manner unknown in London. The very dulness of London was a great comfort to a Christian man. Here the shops were closed, all the external indications of Sabbath observance were satisfactory, but they would still have to fight for it if they wanted it maintained.

MR. HUGH MASON, M.P., speaking at a recent meeting held in Ashton-under-Lyne, on behalf of the Religious Tract Society, remarked that he was very much impressed with the fact that at the present day there was a grand and mighty movement for the instruction of the young. He hoped that in a very short time it might be the boast of our country that every child throughout the length and breadth of the land, of the age of ten years at the least, would be able to read; but when we had accomplished that result we had done, he thought, a very small portion of our duty. It was a comparatively small thing for us to make the children of the country able to read, but it was a greater thing to put in the hands of every child in the country pure literature. The printing presses of this country poured forth, he was sorry to say, trash, and worse than trash—literature which was not simply trashy, but was wicked, and as fast as the circulation of pure literature was increased it did seem that it had to run a race with that other class of literature to which he had alluded. One of the best things in connection with the society was that the management always had been and was up to the present in the hands of a committee consisting of six Churchmen and six Dissenters—half Churchmen and half Dissenters. If it was only from its constitution and management, the society commended itself to the approbation of Christians of every denomination, who might learn from it the lesson that Churchmen and Dissenters could agree to work together in the circulation of pure literature for the benefit of mankind.

THE Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, has been delivering lectures in Glasgow and elsewhere, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. The titles of two lectures give some indication of the nature of the subjects discussed in them, "Does Death end All?" and "The Certainties of Religion."

AMONG the deaths which occurred during the latter part of the past year may be mentioned those sustained by the Wesleyan Methodist body in the removal, at the age of seventy-seven, of Sir Francis Lycett, a former Sheriff of London, and a munificent promoter of chapel building; and of the Rev. Samuel Coley, a popular preacher and theological tutor, aged fifty-five. Continental Protestantism sustains a great loss in the decease of the Rev. Dr. Henri De La Harpe, the successor of Dr. Merle d'Aubigné as President of the Theological Seminary of Geneva. American religious journals record the decease of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hanson Cox, one of the most brilliant intellects of the American pulpit, in his eighty-eighth year; the Rev. Dr. William A. Hallock, one of the founders of the American Tract Society, for forty-five years its secretary, and for ten more its honorary secretary, in his eighty-seventh year; and of the Rev. Dr. Plumer, until recently Professor of Theology in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Columbia, South Carolina, who was approaching the eightieth year of his age.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

A LONELY SPOT.

CHAPTER V.—TURNED ADRIFT.

THE hay-harvest and the corn-harvest, with their long hours of labour in the hot sunshine, passed by; and Ruth was one of the busiest of the women working on Chipchase's farm. No one saw much change in her, for she had always been a silent, inoffensive woman, minding her own business, and leaving other folks alone. But when harvest was ended, and the shooting season begun, the term of Ishmael's imprisonment was nearly over. Nutkin and his assistant-keepers were very busy about the woods, watching them all night, whilst all day long the crash of guns could be heard far and near. It was not a good time for Ishmael to be coming home; there was too much to put her husband in mind of his threats, and to keep his anger hot against his son. But surely he could not be so hard as to turn Ishmael out of doors when the law let him go free!

"Ishmael's time's up to-morrow," she said, in a tremulous voice one evening, with a deep anxiety she was striving to conceal.

"Aye," answered Humphrey, slowly, "that's what Nutkin says. So I up to the Hall this mornin' early, and I says to th' squire, 'Squire, I've been a honest man all my life; and I've worked on your hedges many a year; and I'm not a-goin' to harbour no poacher in my home. There's that lad o' mine, that's been a disgrace to me, a-comin' out o' the county gaol to-morrow. He'll niver set his foot o'er my door-sill, I promise you.' The squire says, 'As you choose, Humphrey. Go into the kitchen, and get a draught o' ale.' And good ale it was; a sight better nor that at the 'Labour in Vain.' I'm not the man to drink the squire's good ale, and go agen him in any way."

"Thou'lt never turn the lad adrift on the world?" cried Ruth.

"Adrift! He's big enough to shift for himself," said Humphrey, doggedly. "The squire could get us turned out o' here neck-and-crop, if he chosen; and what 'ud become of me, if we had to go to the workhouse? The squire won't have no poacher harboured close to his woods; and who's to save me from goin' into the House in my old age, eh? Me, as can't live without my drop o' good ale, often and regular. I tasted the beer in the workhouse once. No; Ishmael niver sets his foot o'er that door-sill agen! And now thou knows it, and can make the best on it."

Ruth had a sleepless night again, as if the first bitterness of her sorrow had come back upon her with ten-fold power. Early as the dawn came the next morning she was up before it, making a bundle of all Ishmael's coarse clothing, the scanty outfit she had scraped together for him three months ago, when he was going out to earn his own living. Mrs. Chipchase was taking her butter to market in the county town, and had offered to carry Ruth with her in the gig, that she might meet Ishmael at the gate of the county-gaol. She saw little enough of the dusty high road along which they drove, or of the bustling streets thronged with a concourse of market people. It was only when she came within sight of the gaol that she seemed to wake up from a brown study, and get her wits about her again. It stood outside the town, amid green fields; a large square ugly building, surrounded by strong and black stone walls. Small round windows, closely barred and grated, looked out like hoodwinked eyes, over the lonely fields. Ruth felt herself shivering, though the September sun was shining in an unclouded sky, as she looked up, and wondered which one of those gloomy windows had lighted Ishmael's cell. But before she could reach the heavy gate, she saw sauntering down the path from the gaol, creeping with sluggish footsteps, and a bowed-down head, her boy, Ishmael himself.

"Mother," he cried, "mother!"

He threw himself into her arms, laughing and crying at the same moment. Ruth could not weep; but she held him fast in her arms, until he lifted up his head to look into her dear face. There was no one near to see them; they were as much alone as in their own quiet woods; only that grim and ugly building looked down upon their meeting with its hollow eyes. She drew him away to a lonely spot under its walls; and they sat down together on the grass, whilst, with her trembling hands, she untied the little packet of home-made bread, baked in their own oven, which she had brought for them to eat together, before they had to part again.

"I never meant any harm, mother," he said, when their meal was over. "I never thought of anything save little Elsie wishing for 'em. But I know it was poaching; and oh, mother it 'ill turn up against me all my life."

"I'm afeared so, lad," she answered, sighing. "But hast thee asked God's forgiveness, Ishmael?"

"Often and often," he replied, eagerly. "Mother, I never forgot to sing 'Glory to Thee, my God, this night;' only I sang it low, in a whisper, like I used to do when father was at home. I thought you'd be singing it as well, mother."

"Ay," she said softly; "thank God, I could sing it after the first evenin', Ishmael."

"When I get home," he went on, "I'll go up to the hall and ask the squire to forgive me; I'll beg and pray of him; and if he will maybe I can go to work with Mr. Chipchase, like I was to go before I came here."

"He's got another waggoners' boy," answered his mother, "and thee'rt not to go home with me, but do thy best away from home. Father won't hear of it; and maybe the squire 'ud get us turned out altogether if thee comes home. But if God has forgiven thee——"

"Not go home with you, mother?" he cried.

"No," she said, half sobbing, "no! But God sees; God knows. Jesus Christ had not where to lay His head; and had to wander about without a home. Ishmael, I want thee to believe that God sees us always; and He loves us, in spite of it seeming as if He didn't take any notice of us. Oh, if I thought God didn't know and didn't care, my heart 'ud break. I'd go down to the river, yonder, and just drown myself. But some day He'll find us a home again, thee and me."

She had never spoken so passionately before, even to him; and he was startled, gazing into her agitated face with wondering eyes. Then he looked back at the dreary gaol, his last dwelling-place. There seemed to be no place for him in the whole world now he had been in there.

"Where can we find a home again, mother?" he asked at last; "there's no place like home."

"Up there!" she said, lifting her dim eyes to the great sky above them; "if God gives us no other home here in this world, He's got one ready there for thee and me. 'Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you.' That's what Jesus said. He's preparing a place for us, Ishmael; and we must not trouble our hearts too much. Only we must go on believing in Him."

"I'll try, mother," he said, putting his hand in hers; and they sat there, not speaking much, but with hands closely clasped, till the chiming of the church clocks in the town behind them reminded Ruth there was still something to be done. A place must be found for Ishmael to sleep in that night; and if possible to stay at till he could get work to do.

It was hard work leaving him, so far away from her, to loiter about the streets and pick up any stray job that might fall in the way of a boy with a doubtful character. Her mother's heart told her but too plainly how precarious such a life must be. Only a few months ago he was still a child; even yet in happier homes he would be reckoned among the children, to be punished indeed for his faults, but not to be thrust into want and temptation. But Ishmael was to fight in the thickest of the battle, bereft of his good name, and removed from all good companionship. Yet Ruth had hope and faith. She worked harder than ever, never taking a day's rest, that she might save a few pence every week to send to his help. She knew he was almost always hungry; often pinched with cold; ragged and nearly barefoot at all times; scarcely able to pay for a shelter night after night. He roamed about the country from farmstead to farmstead, doing any odd work the farmers would trust him with, and sleeping in any outhouse or broken shed he could find open. But he failed in getting a settled place; there were too many boys of good character who wanted to set their foot on the first step of the ladder.

There was one thing he could not make up his mind to do. He could not put such a distance between himself and his mother as would prevent him seeing her every Sunday. He never failed to steal homewards at the close of the week, lurking about the lime-kiln or the woods, in hiding from his father, until he could make his presence known to his mother. It was the great solace and enjoyment of her life. She could still wash and mend his clothes for him, and get him a sufficient meal or two, and listen to all that had happened to him during the week. He never crossed the threshold of his old home; but on summer evenings Ruth and he sat together within the tangle of green brushwood behind it, and on winter nights they sheltered themselves under the walls of the old kiln, or, if they needed a roof over their heads, they met in the limestone cave, which most often of all was Ishmael's sleeping-place.

CHAPTER VI.—FIVE YEARS.

So five years went on, and still Ishmael was not a man. There was little hope now of his even making a strong, hardy, capable man. The privations he was compelled to undergo had told upon his undersized, thin, and feeble frame. But still more had the anxieties and the mortifications he had to endure borne down his spirit. No one but his mother cared for him. Suspicion dogged him, and the doubtful companions necessity forced upon him strengthened suspicion. He was losing heart, and growing hopeless. His mother had called him Ishmael, because the Lord had heard her affliction; but she might have called him Ishmael, because every man's hand was against him. Would the day come, dreaded by his mother, when his hand would be against every man?

The last few years had weighed more heavily upon Ruth than ten might have done if Ishmael had been at home. She could no longer help her old husband up the ladder, when he came home drunk; and many a night he had lain on the damp floor, groaning with rheumatic pains, for want of a strong young arm such as Ishmael's would have been. Still every Sunday brought her a gleam of gladness. As yet Ishmael had not gone astray amid his manifold temptations; and she was comforted for her own sorrow and his. But what would become of him when she was no longer there?

It was a hard trial to her, when she heard Ishmael's call, plaintive and low, sounding round and round the hut through the stillness of a winter's night, and she could not answer it. It came nearer and nearer, until it seemed as if it was under the very eaves; but if her husband was crouching over the fire, she dared not even open the door to look out. In the black darkness outside the little casement she could see for a moment the dim outline of her boy's white face gazing through the lattice panes; and then the long, low, plaintive cry grew fainter, and died away in the woods behind.

"I must tell Nutkin o' that owl," said old Humphrey, peevishly.

At last Ruth could go out no more to her hard work, but lay still and almost helpless in her close loft, scarcely able to creep down the ladder to the hearth below. Old Humphrey could not understand that she was no longer the willing drudge she had been so long. That she should get free from him by death never once crossed his dull brain, soddened by drink. Many a moan he made over his wife's idleness in the sanded kitchen of the "Labour in Vain," where he sat now on a corner of a bench farthest from the fire, having only a few pence to spend; he who in better days had been welcome to the best seat, and been most lavish with his money.

But whenever Sunday came new life seemed to visit Ruth. Whence the strength arose she could not tell; but it never failed her when she rose up from her bed, and crept downstairs, and out into the spring sunshine to meet Ishmael. Everybody knew now, except Humphrey, that Ishmael haunted the old home where his mother was dying; but they took no notice except by carrying food, as they said, for old Ruth, though they knew well she could not eat it. Some of the women offered to do any washing they could for her, and made no remark when Ishmael's clothing was among it. For when we are going down visibly into the dark valley of the shadow of death, those around us look upon us with other eyes, and press upon us some of the kindliness and tenderness which would have made all the pilgrimage of life only a happy journey. Ruth, so long a solitary and sorrowful woman, wondered at the friendliness which gathered about her in her last days.

"It makes home seem sweeter," she said to Ishmael, "to have plenty o' friends, and plenty o' everything else. But if it had always been so I might never ha' thought as dyin' was like goin' home. I always think as if heaven were home now, Ishmael," she added, a faint smile lighting up her wrinkled face.

She was sitting beside him on the old door-sill for the last time, though that they did not know. For when death is drawing near to any one of us we do not always know that the last time is come for the old familiar duties and habits of everyday life. It had been a long sunny day in May, but now the twilight was coming on, and every minute made her beloved face more thin and shadowy.

"It feels a'most," she went on falteringly, "like when I was a little girl, and 'ud hear father callin' me in from my play. I'm partly afeared to say it, Ishmael; but it's sometimes as if I could hear the blessed Lord callin', callin', 'Ruth, come to Me, and ye shall find rest.' And last night I answered Him out loud, 'Lord, I can't rest because of my lad Ishmael.' And it seemed to me as if there came a low quiet voice whispering to me, 'Leave Ishmael to Me. He is My son.' And I said to myself, 'The Lord has heard my affliction again.'"

Ishmael sat silent, with his eyes fastened on the pale yellow light in the sky behind the tops of the trees, across which a bat was flitting to and fro; but he did not see the sunset light, or the flight of the bat.

"Ay!" she said, almost joyously, "and to-day I knew He'd heard; for Mrs. Clift and Miss Elsie came to see me; and Ishmael, my lad, they brought grand news for thee. They're going away across the seas to that country where folks go for a better chance than they've got here; and they've promised to take thee with them; for Mrs. Clift said, 'It was all along of Elsie that Ishmael got into trouble and disgrace; and folks won't think badly of him there; and I'll be like a mother to him,' said Mrs. Clift. And I knew then that God had heard my affliction again."

"Oh mother!" cried Ishmael, "I couldn't leave thee, never; not if the Queen of England sent for me to go."

"But oh, my lad," she answered, "if the Lord doesn't take me home afore the time comes for thee to go, thee must leave me. Ay, and I should die happier, knowin' thee were safe away, and havin' a chance to be a good man, than leavin' thee here to be tempted and drove into sin. Ishmael, promise me thee'll go, whether I'm alive or dead, when the time comes. Oh, my dear, dear lad, promise to obey me."

"I cannot, mother, I cannot," he sobbed; "I'll go gladly if thee art dead; but so long as thee can speak to me, and I can look at thee, I cannot go."

"They're not goin' afore hay-harvest," she said softly, "and, please God, I may be dead by then."

But as she lay awake at night, thinking of Ishmael, who was sleeping soundly in his old shelter, the cave in the limestone rock, she wondered what would become of him if she could not prevail upon him to leave her for ever, whilst she was still living. There would be no one who loved her to close her dying eyes, and hold her dying hand, and whisper last words of love into her dying ear, if Ishmael were gone. But oh, how gladly would she rather die in utter loneliness if she knew that he was safe, and would have a new start in life.

The days passed slowly away; and the grass grew in the fields around, and blossomed, and ripened for the scythe; but still life seemed to cling to Ruth, weary as she was to die and set Ishmael free. She could no longer come down the ladder which led to the loft where she lay in darkness, but whenever Humphrey was away, Ishmael was beside her in the darkness, within reach of her hand, as in the old time when he was a child. There was no stint of food for him now, for Mrs. Clift came every day with Elsie, and Mrs. Chipchase sent from the farm, or called in to see Ruth herself, and neither of them came empty-handed. It was only when the time came each day for him to escape out of the way of his father that he felt himself still an exile from his home.

"I'll not leave thee to-night," he said, one evening when she seemed worse than he had ever seen her before; "I can't leave thee to-night. Maybe thou'rt dyin'."

"Nay," she answered with a long, low, sad sigh, "nay, Ishmael, there mustn't be a fight 'twixt thy father and thee over my dyin' bed."

"He'll come home drunk," he said almost fiercely; "and I can't leave thee alone with him."

"I'm not afeard to be left alone with thy father," she replied. "He was a good husband to me once, and he'll not be hard with me when I'm dyin'. I wasn't always as good a wife as I might ha' been; and I've a many things to say to him. Hark! they're runnin' to tell thee he's comin' up the lane. Go, Ishmael; kiss me, and go quickly."

"I cannot go," he cried, clinging to her; "p'r'aps I shall never see thy face again, never! Oh, mother, I cannot go!"

But as he still held her in his arms, and she pushed him feebly away, Elsie's clear young voice was heard in the kitchen below, calling hurriedly.

"Ishmael," she cried, "little Willie Nutkin is lost in the old quarry behind the cave, and we want you. Nutkin, and the squire, and everybody; we all want you."

JOHN MASON.

A FORGOTTEN HYMN-WRITER OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

FEW studies in the by-ways of literature reward the quiet mind better than the old hymn-writers. Here we wander in a comparatively untrodden field, where the grass is most sweetly green, and where the flowers grow in untouched beauty. The few who have been before us have for the most part been gently-stepping pilgrims, who have passed over it with unsandalled feet, because to them it was holy ground. Rougher wayfarers have turned to stronger, if not richer, pastures.

George Herbert is almost the only specially sacred poet popularly known as belonging to the time of Charles I.; a few have a kind word to say of Henry Vaughan; whilst, perhaps, the only well-known hymn-writer of the latter part of the seventeenth century is Bishop Ken. And yet there were others whom we should know, men less gifted than they, but men of holy life and high attainment, men of keen poetic feeling and of deep spiritual insight. The very quaintness of their writings, moreover, gives a piquancy to some of them; and to this we have occasionally to add the quaintness of their lives. Among these men, John Mason may be singled out as one whose life and works are worthy of study.

The date of John Mason's birth does not seem to be known; but we know enough to be able to fix the date somewhere about the beginning of the reign of Charles I., the same period which gave birth to the finer genius of Henry Vaughan. His youth was spent amid rural and quiet scenes, and his first school was in the village of Strixton, in Northamptonshire. Northampton one thinks of as a pretty county, yet there is not much in its scenery to draw out a poet's mind; there is little of that nobility of landscape which helped to form Vaughan's mind amid the fastnesses of Wales. Rather, we may think of Mason as brought up where Nature wears her every-day garb, and of his home as among homely men and things. And I think we can trace this in his writings; in them we have little of Nature in her grander moods, little of the rush of torrents, little of the "munitions of rocks;" his similes for the most part, when not Scriptural, are of quaint and common things. And hence among his "Songs of Praise," we do not find one "for the beauty of the earth," and even in those which are general ascriptions of praise to Almighty God, the grandeur of nature finds but little mention; we almost feel that he himself owned his lack of such imagination in such lines as these:

> "Thy wisdom, which both makes and mends,
> We ever much admire:
> Creation all our wit transcends;
> Redemption rises higher."

From Strixton, Mason passed to Cambridge, where he entered as a student at Clare Hall. Here he took his master's degree, but no incident occurred to make his college career in any way memorable. After leaving college, he was for some time curate at Isham, in his native county, and so again he dwelt amid the old familiar scenes, the beginnings of his work, like the beginning of his days, passing amid quiet, restful surroundings. In the year 1668—for now at last we are rejoiced to come to a date—he was presented to the living of Stantonbury, and a little more than five years afterwards, he became vicar of Water-Stratford, in Buckinghamshire, the place with which his name is identified to those who know anything about him. The little village of Water-Stratford, or Stratford-Water, is now, as we suppose it was then, a mere hamlet, with little in it to interest us save its venerable old church. Here John Mason lived and died; here his remarkable ministry was exercised; here he wrote his "Songs of Praise." Here, too, he was quietly penning those proverbs and other sayings, which his better-known grandson, the author of "Self-knowledge," gathered together and published after his death, proverbs and sayings which sometimes, by their holy wisdom, make one think of Thomas à Kempis. He died here in 1694, just a year before Vaughan.

By the help of those who knew him we learn what manner of man he was. One who did not by any means sympathise with him in many of his views says of him, "He was a person of as great devotion as ever I met with . . . . He was very affable in his carriage, and meek in his converse; never over-carnest but—where he thought he could not exceed—for God." Says another who knew him well: "The frame of his spirit was so heavenly, his deportment so humble and obliging, his discourse of spiritual things (and little else could we hear from him) so weighty, with such apt words, and delightful air, that it charmed all that had any spiritual relish, and was not so burdensome to others, as discourses of that nature have been from other ministers." Richard Baxter, we are told, spoke of him as "the glory of the Church of England." His grandson tells us that he prayed six times each day: twice alone, twice with his wife, and twice with his family. Here, then, we have the picture of a man who maintained a life of quiet contemplation and deep devotion amid uncongenial times. For his time was that of Laud and Strafford, of Charles I. and Cromwell, of Charles II. and James II. and of William III.; it was the brief generation which witnessed a Commonwealth, a Restoration, and a Revolution. A time it was now of anarchy and of bloodshed, now for a little while of peace, then again of licence and debauchery, to which even royalty gave its sanction. But he was not moved by these things; and he seems to have taken little cognisance of them, save in one strange time of his life to which we shall immediately refer. Amid noise and tumult he is "in the stillness"; amid times of setting down kings, and putting up kings, he is dwelling in the shadow of the everlasting throne, and quietly doing the will of Him whose Kingdom cannot be moved; his ears hear of vice installed in the palaces of nobles, and enthroned in the courts of kings, but his soul is resting in that Presence under the light of which impurity cannot dwell.

> "There are, in this loud, stunning tide
> Of human care and crime,
> With whom the melodies abide
> Of the everlasting chime."

Might not Keble's words be used with fitness of this "man of God"?

I have spoken of his life as a whole; but just at the close came a strange episode, that to which I have referred, the only thing that, as curiosity-hunters would say, redeems the life from commonplace. Indeed, so striking is this part of the life that one or two who have cared nothing about the man, have referred to this as indicative of his whole character. It is the episode identified with the preaching of a sermon on the Ten Virgins, entitled, "The Midnight Cry," a sermon proclaiming the close approach of the Second Advent. His thoughts had grown full of his Saviour's re-appearing; his daily communings with Jesus had made him long to see his face; and longing had grown into hoping, and hoping, as with many more good men, into something like realisation. And so, one night, about a month before his death, as he lay awake, he turned himself about in bed, and there in the midst of his room (so he said) he saw Jesus sitting. He could not keep the vision to himself, and inquiries and requests for fuller details poured in from every side; but he had little to add. "Had the vision spoken?" "No: there was no need to speak, for it was enough in itself." "What was the Saviour like?" "He wore on his head a glorious crown, and upon his face there was a look of unutterable majesty." This was all. A dream of the night, it may have been; or one of those which come with the dawn, daylight dreams which carry with them a sense of reality to the very end of life. But to John Mason this vision was a premonition of the Advent, and he was sure that the Lord would speedily appear. Accordingly, and with his concurrence, the report was spread abroad that the end of all things was at hand, and that the Lord would speedily be seen at Water-Stratford. The people gathered from all the villages around, some for curiosity, many in order to witness and to share in the Advent. Furniture and provisions were brought in, and for weeks the crowd remained, filling up every available corner in the vicarage and elsewhere; not a few poor people were among them—some, we may suppose, hoping to have a share of the provisions, since all things were in common. The most extraordinary scenes were enacted; there was singing, and leaping, and dancing, and the place rang again with the songs and shouts of the people. One humorous gentleman, who gives a not unfriendly account of the scene, says that on one occasion he perceived that much noise was made by a man with a wooden leg. He asked this man what all this tumult meant, and received the answer, "Do you not know that it is the coming of the Lord?" "Nay," said the other, "He will not come till the restitution of all things." "But this is the time of restitution," said the vigorous dancer. "I think not," said the other; "else you had got your good leg back."

It was the old story: the hope slowly died out, and the crowds dispersed. First the poor were sent off for lack of provision; others followed, and the dream of the Advent had vanished. It is easy for us now to smile at vain hopes such as those of John Mason, but there is little room for derision. It was a time of religious as well as political excitement. And as to the vision which good John Mason saw, or thought that he saw, and the vain hopes which it inspired, let us remember the power of enthusiasm, and that it is often the mark of men full of a poetical faith thus to dream themselves into a belief in the nearness of a golden age.

One thing in the story amuses us. Water-Stratford was to be Zion, and those only were to share in the Advent who were in it at the time. This was to be the end of all the prophecies about countless multitudes surrounding the Saviour in his glory. A little nook in Buckinghamshire was to circumscribe the Coming One! A thing this worthy to be pondered by fondlers of shibboleths and heralds of sects, by all who love narrow spiritual enclosures and know of no grace outside their Zion. This is what it comes to: a regenerated world's acclaim shrinks into the "murmur of a little bourg."

The last words of Mason form the climax of his life, as they are the germ of his immortality: "I am full of the lovingkindness of the Lord." This, although his fond hope has gone. The dream has vanished, but the reality remains; he finds that his little parish is not Zion, and he is caught away into that love whose heart has room in it not for our little parishes and coteries and councils, but for universal man.

So much about the man; now a little about his songs, for his other works must be left out meanwhile. The spirit of his book of "Songs of Praise to Almighty God," may be gathered from these words in the preface: "Our blessed Saviour, immediately before He went out to suffer, sang an hymn, and His disciples sang with Him. After His ascension into heaven, the apostles sang the praises of God, and taught others to do so. After them the primitive Christians sang, and so must the Christians of this time. For if these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out. Should we be silent even the heathen might shame us, one of whom said formerly to his friends: 'If I was a nightingale I would sing like a nightingale; but now I am a man, I will sing the praises of God as long as I live, and I would have you sing with me.'"

Thus he began to sing, and his songs are worth our hearing. They are not smooth or even in their flow. They remind us, not of the silver lake, but of the brawling brook with its rough bed. At least, there is no artificiality, if there be little art; and with so many smooth versifiers, sometimes as weak as smooth, we are thankful for a little homespun. Of this homespunness, here is a specimen. Speaking of man's nothingness apart from God, he says:

"For as that liquor's scent remains
Which first the cask did fill;
So feeble creatures hold the scent
Of their first nothing still."

This is quaint enough, almost coarse to sensitive ears, but there is a beauty lurking even in these lines, which unfolds itself in later verses, until we grow thankful for a homeliness which can sing of our creature-dependence upon God in such strains as these:

"In Thee I live, and move, and am;
Thou deal'st me out my days:
As Thou renew'st my being, Lord
Let me renew Thy praise:

From Thee I am, through Thee I am,
And for Thee I must be;
'Tis better for me not to live
Than not to live to Thee.

My God Thou art, my Glorious Sun,
By whose bright beams I shine.
As Thou, Lord, ever art with me,
Let me be ever Thine."

It would only weary the reader to enumerate the various themes of praise which Mason selects for his forty songs. We may say, generally, that in them we have thanks for "creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life; but above all, for the inestimable love of God in the redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ; for the means of grace, and for the hope of glory." I wish I could quote one of his general songs as a specimen of what a hymn or sacred song essentially is—adoration rather than meditation. What could be more true to this ideal than the following lines?

"How great a being, Lord, is Thine,
Which doth all beings keep;
Thy knowledge is the only line
To sound so vast a deep.

Thou art a Sea without a shore,
A Sun without a sphere;
Thy time is now and evermore,
Thy place is everywhere."

So, again, in his hymn of praise for creation. His genius, as I have said, does not serve to describe the beauties of nature, but very lowliness of adoration supplies the lack:

"Thou wast, O God, and Thou wast blest
Before the world begun;
Of Thine eternity possest
Before Time's glass did run.

Thou needest none Thy praise to sing,
As if Thy joy could fade;
Couldst Thou have needed anything,
Thou couldst have nothing made."

He gives thanks for common mercies—for health, for instance, which he designates "a jewel dropt from heaven." His evening hymn is singularly beautiful; and with beauty there is in it the quaintness always characteristic of Mason and his contemporaries. In it occurs the somewhat well-known verse:

"Man's life's a book of history:
The leaves thereof are days;
The letters mercies closely joined;
The title is Thy praise."

These few lines, in his hymn on "the Lord's Day" remind one of the oft-quoted ones of George Herbert, with which they may almost claim comparison:

"O Day of Wonder! Mercies' Pawn,
The weary soul's recruit,
The Christian's Goshen, Heaven's Dawn,
The bud of endless fruit."

His "Song of Praise for Joy in the Holy Ghost" has been put into modern dress in the hymn to be found in "Hymns Ancient and Modern," and beginning there with the line, "A living stream, as crystal clear;" but his version is not disfigured by the extraordinary mixture of metaphors which we find in the new rendering:

"Faith sees and hears; but oh, for wings
To touch, and taste, and feel."

Mason is thinking of the quickening of his Godward aspirations; he has learned to "leap" towards God. But this new-gotten power only makes him sigh for wings that he may fly to Him and be at rest.

"My soul doth leap; but oh, for wings,
The wings of Noah's dove."

It is remarkable that Mason sings of sin after singing of Divine glory and of the gifts of Divine grace, showing us how "the goodness of God leadeth to repentance." With him, as with Job, the beatific vision leads to self-humiliation; and so we come upon the story of the sinner's fears and trembling cries almost last of all. It may be as well to observe here that Mason was not, as some have supposed, the author of that "Lamentation of a Humble Sinner," which is given at the end of many copies of the Prayer Book, that having been written by one Mardley. No doubt the mistake arose from the fact that some lines from this hymn are incorporated in a hymn which, along with a few others, is supposed on good grounds to have been written by Mason. These hymns appeared in a book called "Penitential Cries, by the Rev. Thomas Shepherd, M.A." But, although we cannot claim for our author the credit of that exquisitely tender hymn, "O Lord, turn not Thy face from me," we could quote lines of his which prove that he might have written it. Some will recognise a likeness to it in the lines in which the penitent owns his sin:

"I have been Satan's willing slave,
And his most easy prey;
He was not readier to command
Than I was to obey;
Or if at times he left my soul,
Yet still his work went on:
I was a tempter to myself!
Ah, Lord, what have I done?"

The gradual uprising of hope and faith is beautifully traced, until that mercy which begins with a "perhaps" grows into a happy certainty.

"The door is shut, but is not barred;
And He that is within
Does bid me ask, and seek, and knock,
And strive to enter in."

At last the miserere ends, and all heaven and earth seem to join in hallelujahs to Him who sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb.

John Mason was a man worth knowing, and his hymns are worth knowing too. Their virtue lay in that they were strong utterances of strong faith, strong emotion, strong vision; whilst their weakness lay in the lack of those finer elements which we look for in the hymns of to-day. Mason's hymns are "rough diamonds," but diamonds still; you may call them gold-dust, but the dust is precious. They have lines which show that he held, perhaps, less firmly than we do to what may be called the centrality of Divine love in Christian theology. But these are features which mark not him only, but the devout Puritans of his time. These men lived in sterner times, and their faith was in form severe; but in them, as in us, there was an intense realisation of that love, which only superficial readers and thinkers can miss; and so we might with safety write over Mason's hymns, as a motto, those golden words which were indeed the sum of his life, "I am full of the lovingkindness of the Lord."

NAMES OF SHIPS.

I NEVER did read, nor can learn from any, that ever Queen Elizabeth had any ship-royal, which in the name thereof carried the memorial of any particular conquest she got either by land or by water. Yet was she as victorious as any prince in her age, and (which is mainly material) her conquests were mostly achieved against foreign enemies.

The ships of her navy had only honest and wholesome names, the "Endeavour," the "Bonaventure," the "Return," the "Unity," etc.

Some of our modern ships carry a very great burthen in their names; I mean the memorial of some fatal fights in the civil wars in our own nation (or wars with other nations now friendly), and the conquerors ought not to take much joy, as the conquered must take grief in the remembrance thereof.

I am utterly against the re-baptising of Christians, but I am for the re-dipping of ships, that not only some inoffensive, but ingratiating names may be put upon them; the "Unity," the "Reconciliation," the "Agreement," the "Concord," and healing titles (I speak more like a bookman than a seaman), and others to that purpose.—Thomas Fuller.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD.

BY GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., CANON OF CANTERBURY.

RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT GREEKS.

THAT "in general the Greek religion may be correctly described as a worship of Nature; and that most of its deities corresponded either to certain parts of the sensible world, or to certain classes of objects comprehended under abstract notions," is a remark of Bishop Thirlwall's[1] in which most critics at the present day will acquiesce with readiness. Placed in a region of marked beauty and variety, and sympathising strongly with the material world around him, the lively Greek saw in the objects with which he was brought into contact, no inert mass of dull and lifeless matter, but a crowd of mighty agencies, full of a wonderful energy. The teeming earth, the quickening sun, the restless sea, the irresistible storm, every display of superhuman might which he beheld, nay, all motion and growth, impressed him with the sense of something living and working. He did not, however, like his Indian brother, deify (as a general rule) the objects themselves; or, at any rate, if he had ever done so, it was in a remote past, of which language alone retained the trace;[2] he did not, in the times in which he is really known to us, worship the storm, or the sun, or the earth, or the ocean, or the winds, or the rivers, but, by the power of his imagination, he invested all these things with personality. Everywhere around him, in all the different localities, and departments, and divisions, and subdivisions of the physical world, he recognised agencies of unseen beings endued with life, volition, and design. Nature was peopled for him with a countless multitude of such invisible powers, some inhabiting the earth, some the heaven, some the sea, some the dark and dreadful region beneath the earth, into which the sun's rays could not penetrate. "Of such beings," as Mr. Grote observes,[3] "there were numerous varieties, and many gradations both in power and attributes; there were differences of age, sex, and local residence, relations, both conjugal and filial, between them, and tendencies sympathetic as well as repugnant. The gods formed a sort of political community of their own, which had its hierarchy, its distributions of ranks and duties, its contentions for power, and occasional revolutions, its public meetings in the agora of Olympus, and its multitudinous banquets or festivals. The great Olympic gods were, in fact, only the most exalted amongst an aggregate of quasi-human or ultra-human personages — dæmons, heroes, nymphs, eponymous genii, identified with each river, mountain, cape, town, village, or known circumscription of territory, besides horses, bulls, and dogs, of immortal breed and peculiar attributes, monsters of strange lineaments and combinations—"Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimæras dire"—and besides "gentile and ancestral deities," and "peculiar beings whose business it was to co-operate or impede in the various stages of each trade or business." Numerous additions might be made to this list. Not only had each mountain-chain and mountain-top a separate presiding god or goddess, but troops of Oreads inhabited the mountain regions, and disported themselves among them; not only was there a river-god to each river, a Simoïs and a Scamander, an Enipeus and an Acheloüs, but every nameless stream and brooklet had its water-nymph, every spring and fountain its naiad; wood-nymphs peopled the glades and dells of the forest regions; air-gods moved in the zephyrs and the breezes; each individual oak had its dryad. To the gods proper were added the heroes, gods of a lower grade, and these are spoken of as "thirty thousand in number, guardian dæmons, spirits of departed heroes, who are continually walking over the earth, veiled in darkness, watching the deeds of men, and dispensing weal or woe."[1]

It is this multiplicity of the objects of worship, together with their lively active personality, which forms the first striking feature of the ancient Greek religion, and naturally attracts the attention of observers in the first instance. Nowhere have we such a multitudinous pantheon. Not only was the multiplicity of external nature reflected in the spiritual world as in a mirror, but every phase, and act, and circumstance of human life, every quality of the mind, every attribute of the body, might be, generally was, personified, and became a divine being. Sleep and Death, Old Age and Pain, Strength, Force, Strife, Victory, Battle, Murder, Hunger, Dreaming, Memory, Forgetfulness, Lawlessness, Law, Forethought, Afterthought, Grief, Ridicule, Retribution, Recklessness, Deceit, Wisdom, Affection, Grace, were gods or goddesses, were presented to the mind as persons, and had their place in the recognised Theogonies,[2] or systematic arrangements of the chief deities according to supposed relationship and descent. Similarly, facts of Nature, as distinct from her parts, were personified and worshipped, Chaos, Day, Night, Time, the Hours, Dawn, Darkness, Lightning, Thunder, Echo, the Rainbow, were persons—"persons, just as much as Zeus and Apollo"[3]—though not, perhaps, so uniformly regarded in this light.

THE PARTHENON.

Another leading feature in the system is the existence of marked gradations of rank and power among the gods, who fall into at least five definite classes,[1] clearly marked out the one from the other. First and foremost come the Olympic deities, twelve in number, six male and six female, but not as a rule connected together in pairs—Zeus, Poseidon, Apollo, Ares, Hephæstus, Hermes, Hera, Athené, Artemis, Aphrodité, Hestia, and Demeter. Next in order come the great bulk of the gods and goddesses, Hades, Dionysus, Cronus, Uranus, Hyperion, Helios, Nereus, Proteus, Æolus, Leto, Dioné, Persephoné, Hecaté, Selené, Themis, Harmonia, the Graces, the Muses, the Fates, the Furies, the Eileithyiæ, the Oceanids, the Nereids, the Nymphs, the Naiads, and the like. In the third rank may be placed the deities, who act as attendants on the greater gods, and perform services for them, Iris, the messenger of Jove, Hebé, his cup-bearer, Kratos and Bia, the servants of Hephæstus,[2] Boreas, Notus, etc., subordinates of Æolus, the Hours, handmaids of Aphrodité, etc. Fourthly, we may name the more shadowy gods and goddesses, Night, Day, Ether, Dawn, Darkness, Death, Sleep, Strife, Memory, Fame, Retribution, Recklessness, etc., who do not often appear as deities except in poetry, and are perhaps rather personifications consciously made than real substantive divinities. Finally must be mentioned the monstrous births ascribed to certain divine unions or marriages: e.g. the Cyclôpes and Centimanes, the offspring of Earth and Heaven (Gæa and Uranus); the Harpies, daughters of Thaumas and Electra, one of the Oceanidæ; the Gorgons and Grææ, children of Phorcys and Ceto; Chrysaor and Pegasus, born of the blood of Medusa, when she was slain by Perseus; Geryon and Echidna, sprung from Chrysaor and Callirrhoë; Orthros, the two-headed dog of Geryon, born of Typhaon and Echidna; Cerberus, the dog of Hades, with fifty heads; Scylla and Charybdis; the Lernæan Hydra, the Sphinx of Thebes, the Nemean Lion, the Dragon of the Hesperides, the Centaurs, the Chimæra, etc., etc.

The chief interest naturally attaches to the gods of the First Order, those commonly denominated "Olympic;" and, in a paper like the present, some account must necessarily be given of the twelve deities who constituted the Olympian council.

ZEUS.

At the head of all, occupying a position quite unique and unlike that of any other, stood the great Zeus. Zeus is "the God, or, as he is called in later times, the Father of the gods, and the God of gods. When we ascend to the most distant heights of Greek history, the idea of God, as the Supreme Being, stands before us as a simple fact."[3] "Zeus," said an ancient poet, "is the beginning; Zeus the middle; out of Zeus have all things been made." Zeus is "the lord of the upper regions, who dwelt on the summits of the highest mountains, gathered the clouds about him, shook the air with his thunder, and wielded the lightning as the instrument of his wrath. From elements drawn from these different sources his character, a strange compound of strength and weakness, seems to have been formed by successive poets, who, if they in some degree deserved the censure of the philosophers, seem at least not to have been guilty of any arbitrary fictions; while, on the other hand, by establishing his supremacy they introduced (?) a principle of unity into the Greek polytheism, which was not perhaps without influence on the speculations of the philosophers themselves, though it exerted little on the superstitions of the vulgar. The Olympian deities are assembled round Zeus as his family, in which he maintains the mild dignity of a patriarchal king. He assigns their several provinces, and controls their authority. Their combined efforts cannot give the slightest shock to his power, nor retard the execution of his will; and hence their waywardness, even when it incurs his rebuke, cannot ruffle the inward serenity of his soul. The tremendous nod, wherewith he confirms his decrees, can neither be revoked nor frustrated. As his might is irresistible, so is his wisdom unsearchable. He holds the golden balance in which are poised the destinies of nations and of men; from the two vessels that stand at his threshold he draws the good and evil gifts that alternately sweeten and embitter mortal existence. The eternal order of things, the ground of the immutable succession of events, is his, and therefore he himself submits to it. Human laws derive their sanction from his ordinance; earthly kings receive their sceptre from his hand; he is the guardian of social rights; he watches over the fulfilment of contracts, the observance of oaths; he punishes treachery, arrogance, and cruelty. The stranger and the suppliant are under his peculiar protection; the fence that encloses the family dwelling is in his keeping; he avenges the denial and the abuse of hospitality. Yet even this greatest and most glorious of beings, as he is called, is subject, like the other gods, to passion and frailty. For, though secure from dissolution, though surpassingly beautiful and strong, and warmed with a purer blood than fills the veins of men, their heavenly frames are not insensible to pleasure and pain; they need the refreshment of ambrosial food, and inhale a grateful savour from the sacrifices of their worshippers. Their other affections correspond to the grossness of these animal appetites. Capricious love and hatred, anger and jealousy, often disturb the calm of their bosoms; the peace of the Olympian state might be broken by factions, and even by conspiracies formed against its chief. He himself cannot keep perfectly aloof from their quarrels; he occasionally wavers in his purpose, is overruled by artifice, blinded by desires, and hurried by resentment into unseemly violence. The relation in which he stands to Fate is not uniformly represented in the Homeric poems, and probably the poet had not formed a distinct notion of it. Fate is generally described as emanating from his will, but sometimes he appears to be no more than the minister of a stern necessity, which he wishes in vain to elude."[1]

And Zeus bears to man the relation of "father." Each mortal who has a supplication to make to him, may address him as Ζεῦ πάτερ, "God (our) Father." He bears, as one of his most usual titles, the designation of "Father of gods and men." As St. Paul says,[2] quoting a Greek poet, "we are his offspring."

[1] Thirlwall, "History of Greece," vol. i. pp. 217–19.
[2] Acts xvii. 28.

The entire passage where these words occur is remarkable, and very instructive on the subject of the Grecian idea of Zeus.

"With Zeus begin we—let no mortal voice
Leave Zeus unpraised. Zeus fills the haunts of men,
The streets, the marts—Zeus fills the sea, the shores,
The harbours—everywhere we live in Zeus.
We are his offspring too; friendly to man,
He gives prognostics; sets men to their toil
By need of daily bread; tells when the land
Must be upturned by ploughshare or by spade—
What time to plant the olive or the vine—
What time to fling on earth the golden grain.
For He it was who scattered o'er the sky
The shining stars, and fixed them where they are—Provided constellations through the year,
To mark the seasons in their changeless course.
Wherefore men worship Him—the First—the Last—
Their Father—Wonderful—their Help and Shield."[1]

A pantheistic tinge pervades this description; but still in parts it approaches to some of the most beautiful and sublime expressions of Holy Writ.[2] It presents Zeus to us as omnipresent, beneficent, worthy of perpetual praise, our father, our help and defence, our support and stay. It sets him forth as "wonderful," or rather "a mighty wonder"—μέγα θαῦμα—a being beyond our power to comprehend, whom we must be content to reverence and admire. It recognises him as having hung the stars in the blue vault of heaven, and having set them there "for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years." It calls him "the First" and "the Last"—the Alpha and Omega of being.

Such is the strength of Zeus, according to the Greek idea; but withal there is a weakness about him, which sinks him, not only below the "Almighty" of Scripture, but even below the Ormuzd of the Persians. He has a material frame, albeit of an ethereal and subtle fibre; and requires material sustenance. According to some of the myths, he was born in time; according to all, he was once a god of small power. Heaven had its revolutions, in the Greek system: and as the sovereignty of Olympus had passed from Uranus to Cronus, and from Cronus to Zeus in former times, so in the future it might pass, and, according to some, was doomed to pass, from Zeus to another.[3] Nor was he without moral defect. A rebellious son, a faithless husband, not always a kind father, he presented to the moral consciousness no perfect pattern for man's imitation, but a strange and monstrous combination of wickedness with high qualities, of weakness with strength, of good with evil.[4]

POSEIDON.

Poseidon is reckoned as the second of the Olympic gods, rather as being, in the mythology, the brother of Zeus, than from any superiority of his own over the rest of the Olympians.[1] He is viewed as especially the god of the sea, and is worshipped chiefly by maritime states and in cities situated on or near the coast; but he has also a considerable hold upon the land, and is "earth-shaking" and "earth-possessing," quite as decidedly as sovereign ruler of the seas and ocean. His worship is ancient, and in many places has given way to an introduction of later and more fashionable deities. It has traces of a rudeness and roughness that are archaic, and stands connected with the more grotesque and barbarous element in the religion. "Among his companions are wild Titans and spiteful dæmons;"[2] human sacrifices are offered to him; horses are buried alive in his honour; Polyphemus the Cyclops, whom Ulysses punishes, is his son; and his offspring generally are noted for huge size, and great corporeal strength.[3] It has been maintained that his cult was of foreign origin, having been introduced among the Greeks by the Carians,[4] or by the Libyans;[5] but there are no sufficient grounds for these refinements, or for separating off Poseidon from the bulk of the Olympic deities, admittedly of native growth, and having a general family resemblance. If Poseidon is cast in a ruder and rougher mould than most of the others, we may account for it by the character of his element, and the boisterousness of sailors, who were at all times his principal worshippers. Poseidon's roughness is compensated for by a solidity and strength of character, not too common among the Grecian deities; he is not readily turned from his purpose; blandishments have little effect upon him; failure does not discourage him; he is persistent, and generally, though not always, successful. His hostility to Troy, arising from his treatment by Laomedon, conduced greatly towards that city's destruction; and the offence which he took at the decision of Erechtheus led to the final overthrow of that hero's family. On the other hand, his prosecution of Ulysses, on account of the chastisement which he had inflicted on Polyphemus, does not prevent the final return of that much-enduring wanderer to Ithaca, nor does his opposition succeed in hindering the settlement of Æneas, with his Trojan companions, in Latium. For grandeur and sublimity of character and position Poseidon cannot compare with Zeus, whom, however, he sometimes ventures to beard;[6] in respect of moral conduct he is in no respect Zeus's superior; in respect of intellectual elevation he falls decidedly below him.

APOLLO.

The conception of Apollo as the sun is a late form of Hellenic belief, and must be wholly put aside when we are considering the religion of the ancient Greeks. Apollo seems to have been originally, like Zeus, a representation of the one God, originating probably in some part of Greece where Zeus was unknown,[1] and subsequently adopted into the system prevalent in Homeric times, and in this system subordinated to Zeus as his son and interpreter. Compared with Zeus, he is a spiritualised conception. Zeus is the embodiment of creative energy and almighty power; Apollo of divine prescience, of healing skill, and of musical and poetic production. "In Apollo Hellenic polytheism received its harmonious completion, and the loftiest glorification of which it was capable."[2]

Apollo rises on the vision of one familiar with Greek antiquity as almost a pure conception, almost an angelic divinity. To a form of ideal beauty, combining youthful grace and vigour with the fullest perfection of manly strength, he added unerring wisdom, complete insight into futurity, an unstained life,[3] the magic power of song, ability and will to save and heal, together with the dread prerogative of dealing out at his pleasure destruction and death. Compassionate on occasions as Mercy herself, he shows at times the keen and awful severity of a destroying archangel. Ekebolos, "striking from afar," he speeds his fatal shafts from his unfailing bow, and smites whomsoever he will with a death-stroke which there is no escaping. Never offended without cause, never moved by caprice, he works the will of Zeus in all that he does, dispenses retributive justice, and purifies with wholesome fear the souls of men. Partaker of all the counsels of his father, and permitted to use his discretion in communicating them to the denizens of earth, he delivers his oracular responses from the various spots which he has chosen as his special abodes, and, though sometimes his replies may be of doubtful import, seldom sends away a votary unsatisfied. The answers which he gives, or at any rate is supposed to give, determine the decisions of statesmen,[4] and shape the course of history. War and peace, treaties and alliances, are made and unmade, as the Delphic and other oracles inspired by him advise; and the course of Hellenic colonisation is almost entirely determined by his decrees.[5]

Poet, prophet, physician, harper, god of victory and angel of death in one, Apollo is always on the side of right, always true to Zeus, and not much inferior to him in power. It is, perhaps, a fanciful analogy which has been traced between him and the Second Person of the Christian Trinity;[6] but the very fact that such an analogy can be suggested is indicative of the pure and lofty character of the god, which equals at any rate, if it does not transcend, the highest ideal of divinity that has hitherto been elaborated by unassisted human wisdom.

[6] Friedreich says: This triad of Zeus, Athené, and Apollo bears an unmistakable analogy to the Christian Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: Zeus answering to God the Father, Athené to the Holy Ghost, and Apollo to the Son of God, the Declarer of the will of his Heavenly Father" ("Die Realien in der Iliade und Odyssee," part iii. pp. 635 and 689). Mr. Gladstone came independently to the same conclusion, and says:—"In Apollo are represented the legendary anticipations of a person to come, in whom should be combined all the great offices in which God the Son is now made known to man, as the Light of our paths, the Physician of our diseases, the Judge of our misdeeds, and the Conqueror and Disarmer, but not yet Abolisher, of death" ("Homer and the Homeric Age," vol. ii. p. 132). Professor Max Müller, on the other hand, thinks that "it seems blasphemy to consider the fables of the heathen world as corrupted and misinterpreted fragments of a divine revelation once granted to the whole of mankind" ("Chips from a German Workshop," vol. ii. p. 13).

HOW TO SERVE.

IN the middle of the sixteenth century there lived at Rome a pious prelate named Filippo Neri. He was the founder in 1548 of the celebrated congregation of the Oratory, a religious association of the order of St. Augustine, consecrated to devotional exercises, works of charity and the study of theology, but without requiring any vows. Filippo Neri was, according to his light, a sincere and humble Christian, and nothing was so repugnant to him as any ostentatious display in matters of religion. One day the pope sent for him and said, "They tell me the abbess of the convent of S——, some leagues off, is a saint and works miracles; I wish to know whether this is true." "That will be easily discovered," replied the prelate, and ordering his mule to be saddled he set off to the convent.

The road was most deplorable, and Neri arrived in a very muddy plight. They opened eagerly to welcome a deputy from the pope, and he immediately took a seat. When the abbess appeared he stretched out his feet covered with mud, saying, "I pray you take off your guest's boots and clean them." She drew back indignantly, whereupon Filippo left the room without saying another word, remounted his mule and returned to the pope, saying the abbess was no saint, and could not possibly have worked any miracles.

"But how can you have found this out so quickly?"

"She has no humility, and does not know how to serve," replied Filippo with decision.

The test was a severe one, though not out of harmony with the temper of the age. Great deeds need to be tested by their spirit. There can be no saintliness without humility. To know how to serve is to have learnt one of the lessons of Divine wisdom.

"I WAS once told by the waterman who was rowing me amongst the vessels in the London Docks," said a sailors' missionary whom we met at a seaport on our eastern coast, "that it was no good going to a certain crew, towards whom I directed him; they were too bad for anything; others had tried it."

"'Just you row me there,' I said. On the deck of the vessel in question I hoisted the Bethel flag, and had a crowd of attentive hearers, as I spoke on the words, 'God commendeth his love towards us in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' Many years afterwards a man came to the Sailors' Institute and asked for me; it was to tell me how that text had struck right home to his heart, and led him to his Saviour. 'Not a word you said about it, sir, but just the text,' repeated the sailor."

Among many interesting incidents connected with his work the missionary told us the following.

A sailor whom he had met in the London Docks showed him a tract, saying, "This tract, which someone gave me at Lowestoft, was the means of my salvation; and I couldn't tell you, sir, how I love this tract. I'm going to write a little more to it, and then have it bound, with gilt edges."

That very day the missionary had been called into a group of seamen by the somewhat unceremonious form of invitation, "Come here; we're talking about religion;" and this man had said to his mates, as soon as he saw him passing, "That old fellow will tell you all about it." When, after some earnest conversation, the group dispersed, one lad remained beside Mr. L——, and told him that for three years past he had been longing to serve Christ, but it was "so hard," what with ungodly shipmates, and other trials. The missionary told him how well he knew it all, how he himself had been kept by the power of God through it all. "You believe the ship you're going in to-morrow will take you safely, my lad?"

"Yes, or I shouldn't sail in her."

"Well, trust Jesus just the same way; not only believe there's safety in Him, but sail in Him, so to say. Just put yourself into his keeping, and He'll carry you through every danger, and bring you safe to land." Apparently much cheered and strengthened, the sailor-boy went on his way.

To such mission-work as this, with what literal fitness do the sacred words apply: "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

The Healer.

"And, behold, there came a leper and worshipped Him, saying, Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean."—Matt. viii. 2.

STRICKEN one! what earthly cure
Could suffice to make thee whole?
Who can make the spirit pure
Save the Healer of the soul?

As the kneeling sufferer prayed,
Doubting not Thy power to heal;
So may I, O Lord, be stayed
On Thine arm in woe or weal.

"Lord! Thou canst," his only cry,
"Naught the leper-stain to Thee:"
And "I will," Thy swift reply:
"From defilement thou art free."

Jesus! Thy dear blood alone
Can wash out my bosom's stain;
All my hope Thy cross I own,
All my strength from Thee I gain.

To Thy love and grace I flee,
On Thee only I rely;
Refuge Thou and help for me,
Turn not from my heart's sad cry.

PREACHING OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

(LUKE III. 1-22.)

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 8.—'Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance, and begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, That God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.'

INTRODUCTORY CHRONOLOGICAL NOTE.—Read ver. 1. 'Among the evangelists,' says Godet, 'Luke is the true historian;' connecting his record with the annals, first of the Empire, then of the Jewish state, civil and ecclesiastical. By the help of this verse, we can determine with some certainty the date of our Lord's birth. Tiberius, Emperor of Rome, was associated in the government with Augustus his predecessor, in the year 765 A.U.C.* His fifteenth year would therefore be 780 A.U.C. (or 27 A.D.). Herod the Great had died in the spring of 750. As our Lord, therefore, was now about 30 years of age (ver. 23), and yet was born, as we know, some time before the death of Herod, the Nativity must have been somewhere near the close of 749†; or four years before the common era 753. Pontius Pilate was the fifth in the series of procurators or governors appointed after the fall of Archelaus. He held the office from 778 to 789 A.U.C., or 25–36 A.D., and was therefore in the second year of his administration. Herod Antipas had succeeded to the tetrarchy of Galilee (under Pilate, much as the native princes of India are under the Viceroy) on the death of his father, Herod the Great. Tetrarch means, literally, governor of a fourth part, but is employed of tributary princes generally. Antipas is also called "king." Philip—best of Herod's sons; to be distinguished from Philip the husband of Herodias. Ituræa, at the foot of Mount Hermon. Trachonitis, the 'rough country,' the ancient Argob. See Pictures from Bible Lands, p. 65; Biblical Atlas and Gazetteer, map x. Philip's tetrarchy included also Gaulanitis, Auranitis (the Hauran) and Batanæa (the ancient Bashan). Lysanias of Abilene, 'the meadow country' below Mount Lebanon, is not mentioned in contemporary history; but as there was a Lysanias before this and a Lysanias after,‡ it is natural to suppose that here we have another link in the family succession. Annas and Caiaphas; it is singular that the best MSS. here read not high-priests but high-priest. The office was but one, although its functions and honours might be shared. In fact, Annas had been deposed by the Romans before this time (in A.D. 14), but as the office, according to the Law, was for life, he would be still regarded as the true holder of it; his son-in-law Caiaphas having been appointed A.D. 17.§ As we say, Annas was priest de jure, Caiaphas de facto; and it is plain from John xviii. 13, 24, that

* Tiberius assumed the sole government, on the death of Augustus two years later, 767, A.U.C.

† After the birth of Christ, the forty days of purification, the return to Bethlehem, the visit of the Magi, and the flight into Egypt, preceded Herod's death. Now from the 25th of December 749, to the death of the tyrant, about April 1, 750, there would be a little over three months, which would allow time for all this. The 'two years old and under,' Matt. ii. 16, simply represents Herod's conjecture. He adopts a wide margin, to make sure.

‡ See Josephus, Wars, i. 13 § 1, and Ant. xv. 4 § 1

there was a good understanding between the two. The reference shows St. Luke's minute accuracy.

I. The Baptist's Commission.—Read vers. 2–6. The word of God came: a usual way of describing the prophetic call. Jer. i. 2, etc. In the wilderness, where the Evangelist had left him, ch. i. 80. It was 'the wilderness of Judæa,' Matt. iii. 1, the thinly-peopled, broken district between the hill-country and the Jordan. For the garb and habits of John, see Matt., Mark. Preaching, proclaiming, as a herald. There are two words for preaching in the New Testament; the other, meaning to declare glad tidings, is used ver. 18. The baptism of (or belonging to) repentance, or more fully, the doctrine concerning repentance (reformation), of which baptism was the symbol; for the remission of sins—the object of the whole—of the preaching, the doctrine, the baptism. In particular, as baptism implied the renunciation of sins, it was, to those who sincerely received it, the pledge of Divine forgiveness.

As it is written, Isa. xl. 3–5; the grand opening of the 'second part' of Isaiah's prophecy, the immediate theme of which is the return of the Jews from Babylon. The wilderness there denoted is the mighty desert tract that lay between the desolated land of Israel and the countries of their captivity. In this desert a solitary voice is heard, clear and ringing amid the silence—Prepare ye the way of Jehovah. He himself was about to come, like a king at the head of his people, leading them in their homeward triumphant march. And as, in a great royal progress, the paths were made straight, valleys filled, hills brought low, all obstacles cleared away, so should it be in the march of the Great King to His Zion. [Illustrate from the construction of a railroad, the most familiar modern equivalent to this preparation of the way.] So great and conspicuous would be the restoration, that all flesh—all mankind, should wonderingly see the salvation of God—the deliverance wrought by God for Israel. Now these events prefigured a more glorious restoration, a mightier deliverance. The prophecy was fulfilled in the return from Babylon, it was consummated in the salvation from sin through Christ. Another voice is heard in another wilderness, and its burden is still The King is on His way to redeem His people! Then, the manner of his advance is the same, though in a spiritual sense. The valleys of humiliation and despair are exalted (as with the 'publicans and sinners'); the heights of pride and self-sufficiency are made low (Pharisees and Sadducees); the crooked ways of error and deceit are straightened, and the roughnesses of life are smoothed. So the Christ advances to His kingdom in the soul.

> It is only St. Luke who fully quotes the words of the prophecy, though all the evangelists allude to it: Matt. ii. 3; Mark i. 3; John i. 23. Observe that the summary of John's proclamation, Repent, for the Kingdom of heaven is at hand, is not in Luke.

II. John's Warning to his Hearers.—Read vers. 7–9. To the multitude, or multitudes, 'many of the Pharisees and Sadducees' (Matt.) Generation, literally, broods of vipers—hypocritical and ensnaring. This wilderness might suggest the figure, or add vividness to the illustration. The wrath to come, the woes that according to prophecy should precede the manifestation of the Kingdom, Mal. iii. 2. Perhaps John's first reference is to the destruction of Jerusalem; but he points onward to a more fearful ruin, Rev. vi. 15–17. Worthy of (your) repentance, corresponding to the reformation which you profess—something to show it to be real: and begin not to say—do not venture on the first step of self-excuse—We have Abraham: the boast of the Jews, who fancied thus that they had a hereditary claim to the love and favour of God. Compare John viii. 33, 39. These stones—pointing, no doubt, to the rocks and boulders that lay on the desert-slopes around. God can raise up true children unto Abraham—those who partake his faith, Gal. iii. 9—from the most unlikely material. 'He who made Adam from clay can make a child of Abraham from a stone,' Bengel. The axe is laid, 'is lying' at the root of the trees—ready for use. The husbandman has already been round to mark the fruitless trees, but he has granted a brief respite; he has not yet lifted up the axe to strike; but it is lying there. Time is given, but not for long!

III. Exhortations to different Classes.—Read vers. 10–14. This passage is only in Luke. Note the various replies to people, publicans, and soldiers, and the one principle running through all, that they must show the truth of their reformation by giving up their most besetting sins. Thus the first class, including, no doubt, many of the well-to-do Jews, are exhorted to generosity. Hardness to the poor was a sin against which the prophets were continually protesting; and its prevalence was a mark of evil times.* The tax-gatherers were notorious for extortion, for which the Roman system gave them every opportunity, as they paid a round sum to the government, or the superior official, and made what they could out of the district. (Did these 'publicans' attend to John's lesson? Matt. xxi. 32.) The soldiers were on active service, 'on the march,' as St. Luke's word implies—again illustrating his accuracy, as Herod Antipas† was now at war with Aretas, his father-in-law, and the troops would have to march through this district. Their temptation was to plunder the territory through which they marched by acts of violence, by false accusation against those who resisted their exactions—and all to supplement their scanty wages, pay or rations.

> In all these directions observe that the Baptist bids the enquirers to do their duty in their own sphere. 'They were not to forsake their work that they might serve God more punctually and faithfully; that would be a distrust and denial of Him. They were to serve Him in their work; they were to avoid those things which they knew were inconsistent with fidelity to it; they were to do the acts of simple kindliness and good neighbourhood which belonged to their position, and which came in their way. The preacher in the wilderness, whose raiment was of camel's hair, and whose meat was locusts and wild honey, attached no worth to such costume or such food. They were suitable to him; he recommended them to no one else. Soldiers and tax-gatherers were to be soldiers and tax-gatherers still.'

IV. Announcement of the coming Christ.—Read vers. 15–20. Whether he were the Christ, the promised Messiah, expectation of whom had now taken possession of all. John answered—first, as appears from John i. 19–20, to a deputation of 'priests and Levites' from 'the Jews' (the Sanhedrin) to ask him distinctly who he was—but he so said it, that all might know. Mightier—'The mightier,' emphatic; the latchet of whose shoes—the thong of whose sandals (Latchet; old English, kindred with lace). To unloose—the most servile office. Compare Matt. iii. 11, 'to carry.' Christ's baptism would be with the Holy Ghost and with fire; inspiring, purifying, illuminating human hearts. Of this promise the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost was the great fulfilment; but the work is continuous, the Spirit is the giver of the new Life, and the fire is the light and warmth, and refining power of his grace. See Mal. iii. 2, comp. with iv. 1. For the fire consumes, while it brightens and refines. The flame symbolised in the 'tongues' on the apostles' heads is the same force as that fire unquenchable which will burn the chaff:—the holiness of God, which when it meets our sins will either purify or destroy (Isa. iv. 4, 5). So the other imagery of cleansing. The fan is the wooden shovel from which the farmer flung up the threshed-out grain against the wind that the chaff might be carried away. The great lesson is that the very proclamation of the glad tidings would bring a terrible testing-time to the people. Yet in declaring this, the great prophet spoke in love; the words in ver. 18, preached, exhortation, being among the tenderest employed in setting forth the Gospel.

* See Isa. iii. 15; Amos ii. 6; iv. 1, etc.

† Antipas had divorced his wife to marry Herodias, the wife of Philip, and Aretas had taken up arms against him.

The imprisonment of John is mentioned here in a parenthesis. Observe that Herod's crime was twofold. While his own wife, the daughter of Aretas, was living, he took Herodias, whose husband, Herod's (half-) brother Philip, was also living. For further details see Lesson, March 6.

V. The Baptism of Jesus.—Read vers. 21, 22. Compare the accounts in the other Evangelists, Matt. iii. 13–16; Mark i. 9–11; John i. 32–34 (from the Baptist's own lips). Luke adds several touches and omits others, especially John's reluctance to baptize the Saviour, and Christ's reply. (From this it appears that John knew Him so far as to apprehend His superiority, but knew Him not as the Lamb of God, as he proclaimed Him to be after the heavenly vision). Luke alone says that Christ's baptism was after that of all the people, perhaps when they had retired, leaving John in comparative privacy; also that Christ was praying as He submitted to the rite (so on other great occasions of His life, ch. v. 16; vi. 12; ix. 18, 28, 29, etc.); adding too, that the vision of the descending Spirit was in a bodily shape like a dove—else it might have been supposed that the reference was simply to dove-like motion—descending, wavering. The vision and the voice were for Jesus—('opened unto Him, and He saw,' Matt.) also for John himself ('I saw and bare record,' John) Thou art my beloved Son; in Thee I am well pleased. Christ's solemn designation for his ministry. Isaiah xlii. 1.

Questions.

1. With what Old Testament prophet is John the Baptist compared by our Lord? Specify the points of similarity.
2. The motto of John's earlier ministry was Repent; of his later, Behold the Lamb of God. Supply the connecting links.
3. What is repentance, according to the teaching of Scripture? Confirm your answer by texts.
4. Explain the reply of Jesus to John when the latter held back from baptizing Him.
5. On what other occasions was the Voice from heaven heard, and to what special work did it then designate the Saviour?

SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

No. IV.

Double Acrostic.

1. Find the name of the land where Moses died.
2. The chief town of that land.
3. A name by which Christ was called.
4. The mother of King Jehoiachin.
5. The son of Shem.

The first letters of the answers give the name of the food sent down from heaven. The last give the name of our daily food.

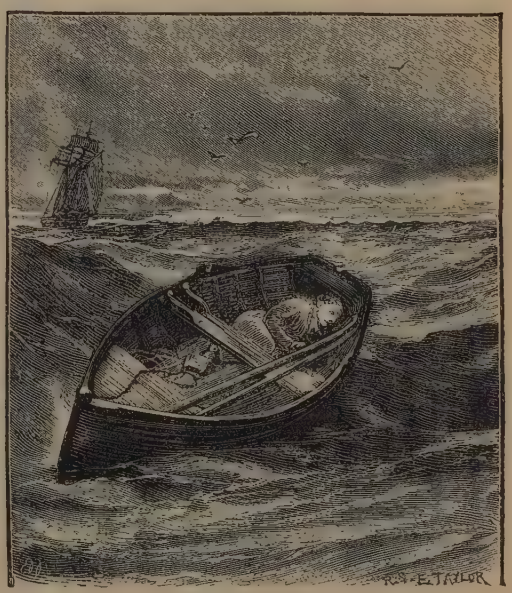
HARRY MARTINDALE'S BROWN BOOK.

BY CRONA TEMPLE.



ALONE AT SEA.

A LAD named Harry Martindale lived in a small seaport town on the east coast of England.

His father and mother were dead; he was quite alone in the world. He earned his bread by working on board a fishing-smack belonging to a bold, bad man, called "Captain Wild," but none knew if Wild were really his name.

Harry's mother had taught him to love and worship the great God, who, although so high in heaven, yet stoops to think of his people upon the earth. And this good mother had made her boy promise that he would read a chapter in his little Testament every day.

Harry promised, and he kept his word.

At first he read merely because he had given that promise but soon he began to see how his little book comforted him, and helped him on the way to heaven—that beautiful home to which his mother had gone.

There were wonderful stories in his Book, and Harry read them, word by word, with keenest interest. Some of the writers of that little brown Book had been fishermen, and St. Paul himself had sailed on many a voyage, and many of the stories were told in just the clear, simple, sailor-like way that sailors enjoy to read. Then there were the stories of what our Saviour did while on earth. His miracles, his parables, his acts of love and mercy, and his holy words to his disciples. And besides the stories there were his letters, the Epistles, full of words which made Harry long to be counted worthy to receive the incorruptible crown, which is for those who are "faithful unto death."

His companions noticed his queer ways, he was so different from what they were, and they hated him for it. They laughed at him and persecuted him, calling him "parson" and "saint."

"I wish I were a saint," said poor Harry.

When he was at sea he could manage to snatch a few quiet minutes to read his beloved little Book, sometimes perched aloft in the rigging, or coiled up in a corner on a heap of rope; but on shore it was a more difficult matter. The house in which he lodged was crowded with people, and there was no such thing as quiet to be found there; so he generally stole down to the shore, and under the quiet sky read the message of his Father in Heaven.

One of his associates, a lad named Tom Allen, would have befriended him if he had dared. In his heart he wished that he were like Harry, for Harry always seemed happy, Harry's eye was always bright, and his words kind and true.

"If you would only give up that stupid reading of yours," said Tom Allen, one day, "nobody would find fault with you; but it riles the fellows to catch you poring over a book instead of joining in a bit of fun."

"'Tisn't stupid reading," returned Harry, "and I can't give it up."

"Why, what's the good of it?"

"It is every good to me; it is my little book that brings me the happiness of my life. And besides," and here Harry's voice sank lower, "I promised my mother that I would read it: and she is dead."

Tom said nothing more, but his face was very grave as he turned away. "After all," he thought, "it is very unfair of the fellows to interfere. Why should they mind his reading?"

Three days after this conversation, a vessel named the "Amazon," was beating up the English Channel. She was Norwegian, homeward bound with a cargo of salt. She was about thirty miles from the English shore, struggling along against awkward winds, when the look-out man called out that he saw something floating on the water a mile or so away. Presently those on the deck could see it, and they found it to be a small drifting boat, apparently empty. The captain of the "Amazon" steered so that it would come close alongside, and then they saw that in the bottom of the boat a lad was lying, fast asleep.

It was strange to find him sleeping there, alone, and helpless upon the wide ocean. The sailors shouted to him, but he did not awaken. Was it indeed sleep? or was it death?

They threw a coil of rope into the boat, and the rattle aroused him. He stirred feebly, and tried to lift himself up. Then he caught sight of the ship, and he stretched out his arms with a low cry, and fainted dead away.

They lifted him on board the schooner, and tended him kindly, drawing his little boat on board after him. In it they found nothing but a pair of oars, and a small brown Testament.

The care and kindness of the Norwegian sailors soon brought back life and warmth to the fainting boy. They asked him how he came to be drifting there. His story was soon told. His name was Harry Martindale, a fisher-lad from the Norfolk coast. He had been reading his Book in an empty boat, moored to the quay, when his comrades, to tease him, had cut the rope, and the boat had drifted a long way before he had discovered that it was drifting at all.

This was all he had to tell, and yet the boy had suffered terrible agonies since the moment that he left the side of the quay, where the ebb-tide was running in quiet swirls and dimples by the grey and green stones.

At first he had thought to be able to row back, but the wind blew freshly, and that ebb-tide was strong. He struggled in vain. The evening came, gloomy and chill; the flat line of the coast sank below the edge of the sea; the night fell, and hungry, cold, and weary he lay down in his boat to sleep.

All the next day he drifted on. White-sailed ships came in sight now and then, and with every sail his hopes rose high. But the ships passed on without seeing him, speck as he was on that waste of tossing water, and as they passed, Harry felt the bitterness of despair.

Floating there in the silence and desolation of the sea, he took out his Book to read. The fourth chapter of St. Peter's first Epistle was where he had left off when the boys had so thoughtlessly cut him adrift. He turned to the place now, and read until he came to these words: "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are made partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when His glory shall be revealed ye may be glad also with exceeding joy . . . . Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to Him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator." He read, and as the beautiful words came home to his heart his despair fled away. What if this were to be his death-hour? Then Christ's glory should the sooner be revealed to him, and he should be glad with exceeding joy!

But life was strong within him, and the pangs of bodily hunger were agonising. He lifted his pale face to Heaven, and prayed that he might have strength to die—that his agony might not force him to doubt the love of God, and the nearness of Jesus, even in this trial of solitude and pain.

Another night passed, and the third day dawned. Pain was gone now. He slept hour after hour. At last he awoke to see kind faces bending over him, and to hear kind pitying tones, although the words were uttered in an unknown tongue. He was saved!

The ship sailed on her voyage, and carried Harry Martindale to the foreign port to which she was bound. It was many days, even weeks, before he came again to the little town on the Norfolk coast, where his old companions were thinking of him with guilty sorrow. They thought that he was drowned, and they knew that it was through their fault.

Tom Allen welcomed him rapturously: the others shrank away, ashamed and afraid. Would he try to punish them, to "serve them out" for what they had done? They need not have feared. Harry Martindale's little brown Book had long ago taught him to forgive his enemies, to be gentle and loving to those who "despitefully used" him. To the village boys he was as he had always been, and they marvelled exceedingly.

Perhaps this conduct of his did more to win them to see the beauty of his religion than mere talking would have ever done. Tom Allen openly came over to his side, and begged that he too might hear the words of the little brown Book. "I can't read much," said poor Tom; "but if ye would speak the words out aloud, now and then, maybe they'd make me a bit the better."

Captain Wild, that bad rough man, had heard the story of the drifting boat; he too was touched. Could it really be that "religion," the thing he had scoffed at all his life, had supported that young weak lad through such a time of trial, and had kept his heart free from anger and the blackness of revenge. "Will you sail with me still?" he asked one day.

"Yes, sir," said Harry; "my time with you was not quite up, that was one reason that I came home."

Captain Wild, who had never spoken softly to any human being since he sailed the Norfolk coast, looked at the lad half curiously, half admiringly.

"You are a brave boy, for all your saintly ways, I do believe," he said. "Come on the smack and read until all is blue if you choose. Let me see the man or boy that will lift a finger to you on board the 'Mary Ann,' that's all!"

And so Harry worked on board the fishing-smack again, just the same as before. And yet there was a difference. The boy's earnest and honest love to God had made itself felt.

For many a year he sailed still on board the "Mary Ann," and he prayed still for God's grace and power to aid him his whole life through, that when death came, indeed, he might be counted a faithful servant. And when out on the black hissing water alone at his night-watch, if he remembered the hours of his trouble and despair, he would thank God for them, and "rejoice!" For was not Tom Allen his dear comrade and brother? and did he not hope that the light of God's love was breaking through the hard, dark heart of his captain too? He was but a lad at the time of our history, simple and ignorant of many things, yet he had learned noblest, truest, holiest lessons from his little Brown Book.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

A MIDNIGHT PROCESSION.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME.

CHAPTER VII.—HER LAST COMMAND.

ISHMAEL loosed his hold of his mother, but he did not rise from the place where he was kneeling beside her. A faint gleam coming up from the room below lit up Ruth's face as she looked earnestly and searchingly into his.

"I can't quit my mother," he answered, speaking in a loud but forced tone; "she's dyin', and if I go maybe I shall never see her again."

"Ishmael," said Ruth, "thee has never forgiven Nutkin yet."

"No," he muttered, "no; it's been too much to forgive. He drove me away from home; and I'd have been a man by now, instead of a wastrel, if he hadn't been hard on me. Thee'd not ha' worked thyself to death, mother, if it hadn't been for him. No; I've not forgiven him. Let him find his little lad for himself."

"You must come, Ishmael," called Elsie. "Willie's been missing five hours or more; and we can hear him crying in the old quarry; and nobody knows it like you do; and the opening's too small for a man to crawl through, and it's no use sending in a boy, if any of them would go alone. Oh, come quickly! Suppose he strayed into one of those pools you told me of, and was drowned. Come down this minute!"

But Ishmael did not move, holding his mother's hand between his own, and gazing mournfully into her beseeching face.

"If I bid thee go," she murmured, "thee would not disobey me now I'm dyin'?"

"Don't send me," he cried; "don't bid me go."

"Nay," she said tenderly. "I'm bound to bid thee, and thee art bound to go. It 'ud be no comfort to see thee nigh me, if I couldn't die happy for thinkin' o' the little lad in the pit. And it's partly because thee hasn't forgiven Nutkin. And if we forgive not men their sins, neither will our heavenly Father forgive ours. That's what the blessed Lord says. And oh, if thee forgives him, the Lord will forgive thee. Go, Ishmael, I shall see thee again—not here, maybe—but in some better place."

"I'll go," he said, looking into her face very sorrowfully; "but, oh, if I never see thee again in this world, it'll seem hard to wait till we get to heaven."

Still Elsie's impatient and entreating voice reached their ears, urging him to make haste, and his mother's sunken eyes were fastened upon him with a look in them as if she was beseeching him to go. It might be the last time he would ever see her face. With a deep and heavy sob Ishmael stooped to kiss her, and as if afraid to trust himself to linger another moment, he sprang down the ladder, and pushing on through bramble and brushwood, quickly reached the entrance of the cave.

It was no longer dark and solitary. Many of the villagers were there, and the glimmer of several lanterns produced a lurid and fitful light. Nutkin knelt at the far end of the cave before the low and narrow inlet, through which, when there was a moment's silence, he fancied he could hear in the black darkness the voice of his child crying.

"The men will be here with pick-axes soon, Nutkin," said the squire, who stood beside him, "and we'll get the little fellow out in a very short time, my man."

"I'm more afeard of the picks bringing the old roof in than aught else, sir," answered Nutkin, in a voice of despair, "there's been a deal o' heavy rain o' late, and there's been two or three hollows given in above ground; and if the roof gave way betwixt us and the little lad he'd die o' fright before we could dig him out. If the hole was but big enough for a man to creep through! But nobody could creep through a hole no bigger than a rabbit-bury; only a teeny creature like little Willie."

A profound silence followed Nutkin's speech, for no man or woman there could risk the life of any of their boys by sending them into the workings of the old quarry. And amid the silence there was heard plainly enough a low stifled voice speaking.

"I can crawl through," it said; "I know every step o' the old pit."

"Ishmael Medway!" shouted half-a-dozen voices, joyously, "he's the lad, if there is one."

He felt himself pushed forward to the far end of the cave, where the light was strongest. The thin, stunted, under-sized lad, in his tattered clothing, and with his mournful face, stood in front of the squire, and of his old enemy, who gazed at him half in shame and half in hope.

"Mother's sent me," he said, touching his old ragged cap to the squire. "She's dyin', and I don't s'pose as I shall ever see her again; but she couldn't die happy with the little lad lost in the pit. And mother says if I forgive him here God 'll forgive me; and take me, some day, somewhere, to the place where she's goin'! I slept here last night, and I heard the ground give way. Don't set any picks at work."

Ishmael did not wait for an answer, but lying down on the ground, crept through the narrow, winding tunnel he had often crawled through as a boy. He called back to them when he had reached the shaft, where he could stand upright, and they saw that he had struck a light; but presently all sound and sign of him was lost, and Nutkin and the squire rose from their knees where they had been watching and listening, and the fitful light of the lanterns shone upon the tears in their eyes.

"I'll make a man of that lad," said the squire, in a broken voice.

"God Almighty bring him and Willie safe back," cried Nutkin, sinking down on his knees again, "and I'll treat him as my own son, I will; as long as ever I live. So help me, God!"

So silent for some time was the crowd of villagers now thronging the cave that they could hear the heavy splashes of water falling from the rain-sodden earth into the little pools collected below in the subterranean alleys of the old pit; and once a low rumbling like distant thunder, telling of the earth giving way in one of the many galleries, made them hold their breath in speechless dread, and look anxiously into one another's faces. But as if Ishmael too had heard it, and wished to reassure them, there came the sound of his voice, calling back to them from the hidden pathways.

"God bless him!" exclaimed the squire, a smile for a moment crossing his anxious and clouded face.

"Ay!" cried Chipchase, "he was as good a lad as ever breathed before he went to gaol for stealing them pheasants' eggs; and old Ruth, his mother, you might trust her in a room full of golden guineas. She's as good an old soul as ever lived. Ishmael said she was a-dying, didn't he, sir?"

"Yes," answered the squire.

"And she'd send him away from her to save Nutkin's little lad!" said Chipchase, "that's what I call being a Christian. Any minute might bring the roof over his head, and bury him alive; and old Ruth knows it. But if any soul in Broadmore believes in God, it's Ruth; and please God, I'll be a better man myself from this day forth."

The farmer's voice trembled as he finished speaking, and he turned his face away from the light, ashamed to let his neighbours see how much he felt.

"Old Ruth's had a hard, bitter life," said Mrs. Chipchase, sobbing; "she was near broken-hearted when Ishmael went to gaol; and she's never been the same woman since. He was like the apple of her eye, Ishmael was; and he'd worse luck than any of her children, thanks to Nutkin, I always said, and always shall say to my dying day. What was a boy's taking a few paltry eggs, I'd like to know?"

"I'll treat him like my own son," muttered Nutkin, not looking up.

"We must make it up to him," added the squire. "If I'd known he was a good lad, he should never have gone to gaol."

"Hush!" cried Elsie, who was standing beside Mrs. Chipchase. Instantly there was a breathless stillness in the cave, and every eye was turned towards the low outer entrance, through which they could hear the dragging of weary footsteps. Bent almost double, and tottering as if every step must be the last, came old Ruth herself.

"Where's Ishmael?" she asked, looking round at her neighbours' faces with eyes dim and glazed.

CHAPTER VIII.—GOING HOME.

When Ishmael had obeyed her, and gone away from her death-bed, Ruth had for a little while lain still in utter solitude. After the echo of Ishmael's and Elsie's footsteps had died away, not a sound had reached her ears. She was accustomed to be alone; but this loneliness seemed terrible in her last hours. An unutterable yearning came upon her to see her boy once more, to know what he was doing, and what was befalling him. He had gone into danger at her bidding; and until she knew what became of him, she felt as if she could not turn her thoughts even to the God in whom she trusted. If only Humphrey would come home, she would prevail upon him to follow Ishmael to the cave, and bring back word, or send some one to tell her what was going on. How could she die in peace whilst her boy was in instant danger? She lifted herself up, and strained her ear to catch some distant sound of voices or footsteps, but there was nothing save utter silence and solitude.

Then a feverish strength, the strength of the dying, came to her. To be somewhere near where Ishmael was, to have faces about her, and hear the voices of her neighbours, seemed absolutely needful to her. With feeble, yet hurried hands, she dressed herself in the poor old clothing she had laid aside for the last time, and with faltering feet she descended the steep ladder. The fresh air of the evening blowing softly in her face revived her, and made her feel as if it had only been because she had been lying in bed, in the hot, dark loft that she had thought herself dying. But as she crept on through the tangle of brushwood, with barely strength enough to part the hazel twigs which beset her path, the numbing hand of death weighed more and more heavily upon her. She heard the voices of her neighbours passing to and fro in the woods, but she could not call loudly enough to make them hear. The thrushes sang in the topmost branches of the trees where they could yet see the lingering sunset light, but below her path was all in darkness, and the power of seeing was fading out of her eyes. Half-blind, stumbling over the roots of the trees, fainting with weariness, yet urged on by her passionate love for her son, Ruth reached the cave at last. She was come to die somewhere near where Ishmael was.

"Didn't he say his mother lay a-dying?" exclaimed some of the crowd, as they fell back to make way for her. But as soon as they caught sight of her face by the light of the lanterns they knew that she was dying. She tottered forward with stumbling feet to the end of the cave, and sank down on the ground breathing fitfully, whilst her sunken eyes gleamed with a bright light. Nutkin shrank away in awe of her; but she smiled faintly, and beckoned with her hand that he should watch and listen still at the post he had held since Ishmael had entered the old quarry. But he stood, pale and panic-stricken, looking down upon her as if she had been one come back from the dead.

"Ruth," cried Mrs. Clift, the schoolmistress, coming forward from among the villagers, "how did you get here?"

She sat down on the ground beside her, and drew the grey old head upon her lap, and Ruth looked up thankfully, and summoned all her failing strength to answer.

"I was afeard," she whispered, "never to see Ishmael again. And God helped me. The poor lad 'ud fret so if he never saw me again; and it 'll be easier to die here than all alone at home yonder."

"Some of us ought to have thought of you," said the schoolmistress.

"It's best here," she whispered again, "near Ishmael. God's been very good to me all my life; and He's very good to me now I'm dying. I'd rather wait here for him to come back than be anywhere else in the world. Only I shall miss seein' Humphrey, and he was a good husband to me once."

"Ruth Medway," said the squire, speaking slowly and distinctly that she might hear him, "don't you be troubled about your son. I will see after him, and make a man of him; I promise you solemnly."

Ruth looked up inquiringly into the squire's face; an unfamiliar face, looking blurred and misty to her failing eyes.

"Who is it?" she asked.

"The squire," said the schoolmistress, gently.

"I thank you humbly, sir," she said, making a great effort, "but it's too late now, I'm afeard. He's goin' away to a country where there's a better chance for him as soon as I'm gone. He won't leave me, sir, not as long as I live, if he starves for it. But he'll go as soon as I'm dead."

"I'll make it worth his while to stay at home," said the squire.

"There won't be no home when I'm gone," murmured Ruth, "he's never had a home these five years; like Him that had no place to lay His head."

She closed her eyelids, and lay still, breathing heavily and fitfully; whilst all around her her old neighbours looked on in mournful silence.

"He's long in coming," she murmured at last, "and it's growing dark, very dark. It's time to sing, 'Glory to Thee;' it'll cheer him, maybe, wherever he is. Only I can't begin."

"She wishes us to sing 'Glory to Thee,'" said Mrs. Clift, looking round at the circle of grave and sorrowful faces surrounding them; "she says it will cheer Ishmael; and it will if he can only catch a distant sound of it. Some of you belong to the choir; please start it, for I cannot."

Her voice was broken and low; and for the first two or three lines the hymn was sung very tremulously by the villagers. But Ruth's eyes brightened, and a smile broke over her grey and withered face, as the familiar strain and the old words reached her dull ear. Her lips moved, and now and then the feeble whispering of a word or two was heard by the schoolmistress. But when the "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow" had been sung in a loud, clear, hearty chorus of every voice, there came, in the silence that followed, a sound as of an echo repeating it in the winding galleries of the old quarry. Ruth lifted up her head, and with sudden strength, raised herself to her feet, and leaned against the opening to listen.

"I can hear him," she said, joyously, "and I shall see him again. I bid him go, for I was afeard he hadn't forgiven Nutkin; but my heart went with him. He's the only one of 'em all as cares for their old mother; it's the way of young folks," she added, as if to excuse them herself; "but Ishmael was loth to leave me, for fear I should die afore he got back. But I'm here, Ishmael, my lad; I'm close beside thee. Thee and me 'ull see each other again."

She sank back, slowly back, to the ground; and the neighbours gathered round her again. She was only a poor, old, toiling woman, for years well known to them all, and little thought of; but there was not one of them who did not grieve for her, or say to themselves how they could have made her hard life a little easier for her. Nutkin knelt down beside her, and his red, sunburnt face looked more full of life and health than ever beside her thin, pinched pallid features.

"Ruth, forgive me," he said. "I'd rather have had my right hand shot off, if I'd ha' known it before. It were my wicked hatred as did it. I'd ha' winked at any other lad robbing a pheasant's nest; but I hated the very name o' Medway."

"I never thought myself as there were anything to forgive," she answered. "It's the law, I know; and the justices are wise men. But Ishmael couldn't forgive it, not till now."

But before any one could speak again, there came a shout through the narrow opening, and the sound of a child's voice calling "Father." Ruth lifted up her head again, and turned her smiling face to the opening.

"He's coming," she said. "God is very good to us."

Yet a few minutes passed away, long slow minutes, before they could hear Ishmael's footsteps, and his voice speaking gently to the child, who was chattering back again, as if he felt no fear of him, or of the strange place they were in. Very soon the child's tear-stained face was seen crawling back through the archway; yet no one stirred or spoke but Nutkin, who caught his boy in his arms, and hushed him into silence. Ishmael was coming back; and his old mother was leaning forward with her eager, dying face, waiting to see him once more. The lad crept out slowly and reluctantly, unwilling to face so many of his old neighbours, and anxious to get away out of sight. His dazzled eyes saw nothing but a cluster of faces about him; and he did not perceive his mother until her feeble voice broke the utter silence which astonished and affrighted him.

"Ishmael!" she called.

"Mother!" he cried, in a loud, shrill tone of surprise and gladness, as he flung himself upon the earth beside her, and put his arm about her, drawing her head down upon his breast.

"I couldn't keep away," she murmured, "and God helped me to come. Be good, Ishmael. God sees us, every one, always. I shall watch for thee on the door-sill—to come into the Father's House—boldly—where He's gone to prepare a place—and then we'll be at home again—with Him."

The words dropped slowly, one by one, from the failing lips which were growing stiff with death; and the bright light in the sunken eyes flickered and died out. But there was still a faint, patient smile on the wrinkled face, and as Ishmael called to her for the last time, in a voice of bitter grief and loneliness, she tried to raise her head, and look again into her boy's face. "Ishmael," she whispered, "because the Lord has heard thy afflictions."

CHAPTER IX.—A NEW HOME.

It was a solemn and almost speechless procession that marched through the midnight woods, waking up the sleeping birds in their nests, and frightening timid rabbits in their burrows. The moon shone down from the cloudless sky, filling the open spaces with a white light, but deepening the shadows where the high hazel bushes grew thickest. Elsie walked beside Ishmael with her hand in his; remembering, oh! how keenly, that day five years ago, which had laid the foundation-stone of all his sorrow. But beyond the present sadness there shone a bright hope in the future, though he could not at this moment catch its light. Only a few days and she and her mother were going to sail for America; and now, when Ishmael had seen his mother's feeble worn-out body laid in the old churchyard, he would be free to go with them, and begin his new life in a new country.

They found old Humphrey lying in a drunken sleep on the damp floor of the hut, at the foot of the ladder, which he had not been able to climb up, and they had to drag him on one side to carry their burden to its resting-place in the loft overhead. He was an old man, with a brain softened and soddened with drink, and he could not be made to understand what had happened, or be persuaded to let Ishmael remain even for a few hours in his old home. It was only now and then when his father was away during the few days that intervened before the funeral, that he could steal in to look at his mother's calm and placid face, from which the wrinkles, graved sharply on it by many troubles, seemed almost smoothed away. But every house in the parish was open to him, the castaway who had been driven from his home, and thrown upon the world. He followed his mother to the grave; and stood for the last time amid his father and brothers. There was a whole crowd of villagers and neighbours gathered about the grave; and Nutkin was there, with the little boy whom Ishmael had sought and found in the windings of the old quarry.

"I'd like to shake hands with all the Medways," said Nutkin, as the crowd began to melt away, "and let bygones be bygones. And, Ishmael, the squire bid me say, is there nothing as he can do for you; nothing as 'ud make it worth your while to stay at home, 'stead o' going to America?"

"Nothin'," answered Ishmael; "there's no home for me now mother's gone. It was her as made home sweet, and I shall never have another."

But ten years after when Ishmael came back to England, not to stay but only to visit the old place, he had made a home for himself, with Elsie in it for his wife. He owned a farm of his own, and was prospering in every way. He found the old hut fallen into ruins, for his father had died in the workhouse the year after he had left England; and no one had lived in the desolate hovel since. The old door-sill was there yet, though the thatched roof had long ago mouldered away; and he could almost fancy he could see his mother sitting there, and looking out for him. The trees behind the ruins tossed their green branches in the wind, and the blue sky, flecked with clouds, shone above them, as in the bygone days. There were the old pleasant sounds, the song of the birds, and the hum of insects, and the rustling of myriads of leaves; but still it was no more home. His mother, who had made this poor hut a home for him, was no longer there.

"I remember," said Elsie, softly, with her hand in his, "how she said, 'I shall watch for thee on the door-sill, to come into the Father's house, boldly, where He's gone to prepare a place; and you and me 'll be at home again, with Him.'"

THE KING'S WINDOWS;

OR, GLIMPSES OF THE WONDERFUL WORKS OF GOD.

BY THE REV. E. PAXTON HOOD.

II.—THE MAGNIFYING WINDOWS OF SCIENCE.

THE study of the indefinitely small has, since the microscope attained its wonderful perfection, become one of the most interesting windows of the Great King, looking out through which new marvels of creative wisdom are seen. Mrs. Somerville, in her captivating volumes on "Molecular Science," speaks of the microscopic structure of the vegetable world as furnishing a most interesting illustration of the relation between the powers of nature and the particles of matter. But where is nature not microscopic? Where have we not illustrations of even infinite marvels hidden in some minute globular nucleus? The book to which we have referred presents a perfect universe of instances. Comparisons are unsafe, but perhaps if we were called upon at once to mention the most marvellous we should refer to the great family of the diatoms (Diatomaceæ, or Brittleworts). They seem almost to constitute—shall we say?—the alluvial flooring of the globe. We suppose there is hardly a spot on the face of the earth, from Spitzbergen to Victoria Land, where they may not be found; they are in the ocean, in running fresh water, and even on the surface of the bare ground; they extend in latitude beyond the limits of all other plants; they can endure all extremes of temperature. Infinitely too small to be seen by the naked eye, they occur in countless myriads. Their beauty is exquisite beyond all power of description; they constitute the food of innumerable aquatic creatures, and they purify the water from the carbonic acid which animal respiration and the decomposition of matter produce. "Even the Noctiluci," says Mrs. Somerville, "those luminous specks, which make the wake of a boat shine like silver in a warm summer night, live on the countless millions of diatoms." As a creature it is ineffably beautiful, and appears through the microscope in a vast variety of forms. Few eyes have ever seen it, only the more cunning naturalist suspects its existence; but it exists in its manifold proportions of beauty everywhere. So that the words of the poet are not less true than beautiful:

"I tell thee that those living things,
To whom the fragile blade of grass,
That springeth in the morn
And perisheth ere noon,
Is an unbounded world—
I tell thee that those viewless beings,
Whose mansion is the smallest particle
Of the impassive atmosphere,
Think, feel, and live, like man;
That their affections and antipathies,
Like his, produce the laws
Ruling their moral state;
And the minutest throb
That through their frame diffuses
The slightest, faintest motion,
Is fixed and indispensable
As the majestic laws
That rule yon rolling orbs."

The man who wrote the above words fancied that he was an atheist. But what an assurance both the science of Mrs. Somerville, and the fancy of Shelley present to us of the infinite life spread over the whole compass of the globe. All these microscopic things and creatures were unknown until the power of the microscope was brought to bear upon them, and now, says the illustrious lady to whom we have referred, "the deeper the research the more does the inexpressible perfection of God's works appear, whether in the majesty of the heavens, or in the infinitesimal beings of the earth." And what a fine illustration she was of her own remark: her first work was to unfold the mechanism of the heavens when she was almost a girl; her last, when nearly ninety years of age, on the researches of the microscope. We recur to the fine words of Revelation, which tell us that as we look through the windows of the King, we find Him at once "telling the number of the stars, and comprehending the dust of the earth." And the faith of the Christian, as well as the observation of the philosopher, beholds how He

> "Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
> Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
> Lives thro' all life, extends thro' all extent, > Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

and the instructed heart, looking through all, may see the Great King pass by, whispering as He goes: "Have I been so long time with thee, and yet hast thou not known Me?"

There is an unseen glory underlying all created things; there is indeed an unseen universe; and the assurance of this should be a help and handmaid to faith. We have not seen Mr. Ruskin's "Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne," but we meet with the following extract from letter the twenty-fourth: "Yesterday afternoon, I called on Mr. H. C. Sordy, to see some of the results of an enquiry he has been following all last year" (the letter is dated April 24th, 1867) "into the nature of the colouring matter of leaves and flowers. You most probably have heard of the marvellous power which chemical analysis has received in recent discoveries in the laws of light. My friend showed me the rainbow of the rose, and the rainbow of the violet, and the rainbow of the hyacinth, and the rainbow of the forest leaves being born, and the rainbow of forest leaves dying, and last he showed me the rainbow of blood. It was but the three-hundredth part of a grain dissolved in a drop of water, and it cast its measured bars, for ever recognisable now to human sight, on the chord of the seven colours, and no drops of that red rain can now be shed so small as that the stain of it cannot be known, and the voice of it heard out of the ground." So true it is, as has been said, that we see only a very limited portion of what there is to see in nature, that we see only what our very limited organ of vision enables us to see. Professor Cooke, in his most interesting lectures on Religion and Chemistry, truly says: "The beauty of nature is in the infinite presence it conceals, and unconsciously though it may be, it is the spirit, not the matter which the artist loves. Not only is there a depth to the poetry of nature which man cannot fathom," but Professor Cooke goes on to show, "that there are waves of light and sound of which our dull senses can take no cognisance; there is even a great difference in human perceptivity." He quotes Professor Tyndall's words, from his very interesting work on the "Glaciers of the Alps," an illustration which the writer of this paper has in the same circumstances often confirmed. Tyndall says: "I once crossed a Swiss mountain in company with a friend; a donkey was in advance of us, and the dull tramp of the animal was plainly heard by my companion, but to me this sound was almost masked by the shrill chirruping of innumerable insects, which thronged the adjacent grass; my friend heard nothing of this, it lay quite beyond the range of his hearing." The illustration is very simple, but following upon a series of scientific incidents, Professor Cooke beautifully says: "There may therefore be innumerable sounds in nature to which our ears are perfectly deaf, although they are the sweetest melody to more refined senses; nay, more, the very air around us may be resounding with the hallelujahs of the Heavenly Host, when our dull ears hear nothing but the feeble accents of our broken prayers." And Sir W. R. Grove, in that great work on which the most advanced science in our day has set its seal, his "Correlation of the Physical Forces," goes so far as to say, "Myriads of organized beings may exist imperceptibly to our vision, even if we were among them." So that Shakespeare expressed a truth which Exact Science sustains when he says:

> "Such harmony is in immortal souls,
> But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
> Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it."

So true it is also that science teaches us that we know not a millionth part of the marvels and wonders of this beautiful world. In fact, it is science which reveals to us that which a little thought prepares us to expect, a whole universe of invisible things and powers, "things not seen"; we are compelled to believe in what we cannot see; we can only see effects, we cannot see causes or things.

It has been truly said, and some of the remarks we have already made illustrate the truth, that the world of sight in which we live is a sort of central point or table-land, half-way between the telescope and the microscope. But a very large portion of what we call the material world is invisible, composed of "things not seen." Heat and steam are invisible; we can feel a ray, and we can see vapour, that is, an invisible thing rendered visible by contact with cold air; but who ever saw the mighty giant at home in the boiler, the great moving power of the world? The force which drives a vessel of three thousand tons against wind and tide across the Atlantic, or hammers a twenty-ton weight of iron into shape as easily as you would mould a pellet of bread between your fingers? that five hundred or thousand horse-power nobody has ever beheld, only the vehicle through which it acts. Thus, everywhere a light shines guiding the mind to a principle of Divine order and proportion, all things turn into windows through which we may look out upon an infinite presence beyond; and so, to the thoughtful mind, the universe becomes another universe, and the world another world; it is all as if mysteriously haunted by a presence of Divine unity.

We remember what an old friend of ours, whose acquaintance we made many years since, Robinson Crusoe, says: "It happened one day about noon, going towards my boat, I was exceedingly surprised with the print of a man's naked foot on the shore, which was very plainly to be seen on the sand; I stood as one thunderstruck, as if I had seen an apparition; how it came thither I knew not, nor could in the least imagine." But Robinson Crusoe did not doubt that some man like himself had walked that way. Innumerable mysterious fossil footsteps have been traced in the various strata of the world, apparently of birds and other creatures, giving to us information concerning extinct races; strange "footprints on the sands of time" indeed. But there is far more than this shed by the light of the science of comparative anatomy. Can anything be more wonderful than the results of the labours of Baron Cuvier? You show him a tooth or a bone, and he seems to create or build up before you a startlingly-grotesque animal. Many papers, even volumes, have been written on fossil footprints; but what if Robinson Crusoe, as one has said, had found not merely a footprint, but a mathematical problem sketched on the sand? Do you think he would have said, "It is a way the sand has of working those problems"? And are not all these ancient creatures singular proofs of the unity and harmony of the one mind of the invisible Authorship, which has wrought through all ages in the kingdom of nature?

Thus, science is not hostile to faith, science is only one of the King's Windows. The discoveries of science only give more distinctness to the vision of Faith, they cannot enlarge the dimensions of the kingdom over which it prepares to spread its wing. It may be urged, indeed, that faith is a motive power to all the attainments of science, so that we may be bold to say there would be no science at all but for the principle of faith in man; faith antedates all science, as we see in religion or in reference to the being of God; faith affirms it, the philosopher reasons upon it, while the man of science proves it; so that we may repeat, that science is indebted to faith for its very existence.

Among the tales which have charmed and enchanted for many ages, in that strange volume of Eastern adventure, the "Arabian Nights," no story has been a greater favourite, and none has exercised a more pleasing pressure upon the imagination, than that of the poor youth who, while the victim of a magician, suddenly found himself possessed of an old lamp; there seemed to be no worth in it, and he was only meditating the polishing of it a little, when by that very accident he became wonderingly aware of its powers; he had but to touch it, and obedient to his touch or call appeared the wonderful Spirit of the Lamp. It was certainly very convenient: if he were hungry and poor, the touch of the lamp spread before him tables groaning with provisions, and the obedient slaves of the lamp came bearing their rich services of massive silver. It is, in truth, a very wonderful story, how the poor and simple lad was transformed by the possession of his quaint old piece of furniture, into the lord of vast possessions, the monarch of all conditions, and the bridegroom of the beautiful princess. It is a tempting story, and has thrown its charm over many fine poetic fancies, as in the splendid poem of the Danish poet, Oehlenschläger. But if we possessed the power, we could tell a tale which would even yet more marvellously inflame and affect the imagination; for certainly, while the hero of the old Arabian tale hovers like an unsubstantial child of the mist, a mirage picture, before the fancy, he of whom we are about to speak is substantial enough; he is no creation of the imagination, no mystical or dramatic impersonation of poetry.

The modern Aladdin has effected feats which, while as real in fact as those of poetry or fable, have as far eclipsed them as they in their turn eclipsed the wanderings of a dervish, or the adventures of a caterpillar.

It is a tale which leaves all the wonderful wonders of past ages and of Arabian enchantment far behind; for armed with his mystic lamp, he appears to have gathered all the tales of Arabian enchantment into one. Our readers will remember how the three kings' sons wished to obtain the hand of a certain lovely princess, and were told that he should have it who brought home the most wonderful object. And one brought a flying carpet; and the other brought the instrument which showed what a friend was doing at a distance merely by looking into it; and another brought the wonderful apple, by which the most exquisite sufferings were alleviated merely through inhaling its fragrance. Our friend the modern Aladdin has done such things that all these are mere trifles to his performances. He has invented wings by which we can travel six hundred miles in our own proper persons in the course of a day. He will enable us to send a message six or eight thousand miles away with nearly the same swiftness and ease as a whisper could be conveyed to a friend sitting in our room. Our friend can take us in his arms and wrap us in a dream of pleasant sensations, while a surgeon's knife is either taking our leg off or submitting us to some of the ghastly horrors we associate with his knife.

There seem to be no bounds to the powers of our friend; we do not fully know all that he has done or what he is doing now, or what he will do next, and he is as far beyond our conception as the story of the earth is beyond that of an ant-hill. He is all eye, all ear, all touch, he has the power of making things to grow out of vacancy, and seeing things where things are not. For instance, it is curious what our friend can do with a little piece of glass, as he fits it into his lamp. When Catlin was among the Red Indians, they had a decided objection to his taking their likenesses; they could not understand how that could be without his taking their souls away from them—although one of them did wax wroth when his profile was taken because the artist had in this instance taken half a soul, and left half a soul behind. But our friend has a way of catching a shadow as it flies through the air; before us there is nothing, no shadow, mere entirely empty space; a little wizardry, and lo! there we are—the very transcript and soul of ourselves. It is quite wonderful what the modern Aladdin can do with his little piece of glass fitted into his lamp. Upon an inconceivably small disc he drops a point, say of nitrate of silver, not larger than a pin's head: "Look!" says our friend, and lo, through the magic glass we see it growing—growing, a tree the gorgeous glories of whose jewellery far outshine the splendours of those fabled trees of blazing jewels, of which we read in the eastern tale. Every little grain, every drop of water, every thread of hair, when our friend holds his lamp over it is alive with wonders, and a mere grain of mud, one of our diatom friends, exhibits splendours before which the blaze of diamonds in the court of Majesty become dim and pale. "What do you think your friend can do," said one to us the other day, "with that piece of glass of his?" "Oh, we don't know," was our reply. "I'll tell you what I think," said he; "he shows me that there is nothing in anything." "No," we rejoined, "far other, at any rate, is the lesson his little pieces of glass have given to us; it is rather that there is something in everything, almost every grain of earth or drop of water seems alive." Most wonderful are the wizard-like tricks the young Aladdin plays with his little pieces of glass.

Have our readers ever seen a planet belonging to our system called Herschel? Probably not, for so far from being at all a near neighbour, it is exceedingly remote, and can only be well described through our friend's little pieces of glass. Very recently our friend was looking at the same old Herschel. The old acquaintance seemed fidgetty, restless, no eye but our friend's could have noticed that at all; but he continued to look, and to say while he looked, "What is the matter with you? whatever makes you so fidgetty?" There seemed to be no cause for it. Our friend thought, somehow, this must be accounted for by another world being in the way, so he went to work with his pieces of glass, and he held them steadily over that great dark waste, all those unfathomable millions of miles away, and there, at last, he discovered one of the last and most recent accessions to our celestial knowledge, Neptune.

We have heard of spirits seen in rock-crystal; we are not so certain about them. Magic mirrors, Aunt Margaret's mirrors and such like, are very curious to read of, ghosts stepping across the strange opaque plain. We very much want to see one. But our friend, he has a piece of glass with which he breaks a ray of light into pieces, and he has a strange way of discovering what the most distant thing is by the colours he has broken from the ray; having proved this down here it has been quite easy for him to use his piece of glass to take sun and moon and stars to pieces, at any rate so sufficiently dissecting them that he easily tells you the materials of which they are constituted.

But what is the uniting spirit here? It is not the glass alone, it is not the hand which holds the glass, alone; no, nor even the observing eye which looks through the glass; it is the wonderful, the harmonising and unifying power of light—

"All the world's bravery, that delights our eyes,
Is but thy several liveries;
Thou the rich dye on them bestow'st,
Thy nimble pencil paints this landscape as thou go'st.

A crimson garment in the rose thou wear'st;
A crown of studded gold thou bear'st;
The virgin lilies, in their white,
Are clad but with the lawn of almost naked light.

The violet, Spring's little infant, stands
Girt in thy purple swaddling-bands;
On the fair tulip thou dost dote;
Thou cloth'st it in a gay and party-colour'd coat."

For there is a revealing power in light, although light itself cannot be seen; in light the more luminous overpowers and extinguishes the feebler—just as we cannot see the light of a candle if we hold it up against the sun—it needs the background of darkness to bring out the light; and yet it is the merest truism to say that light reveals. Thus, the phenomena of nature enable us to realise the omniscience and omnipresence of God. As has been often remarked, we see no star as it actually is, but as it was at the second when the ray of light was transmitted; the light of our sister, the moon, is the most immediate, and we see her face as it was a second and a quarter before, the sun eight minutes before, Jupiter, fifty-two minutes, almost an hour previously, the principal star in the constellation, Centuar as it was three years since, Vega, twelve years since, Arcturus twenty-six years since, the pole-star forty-eight years since, Capella seventy years since, and a star of the twelfth magnitude as it looked four thousand years ago, or in the time of Abraham. And thus we are reminded that we are walking in the old light; divine words are transmitted to us from far off and ancient times. As the poet says:

"The light of Homer shines upon us still."

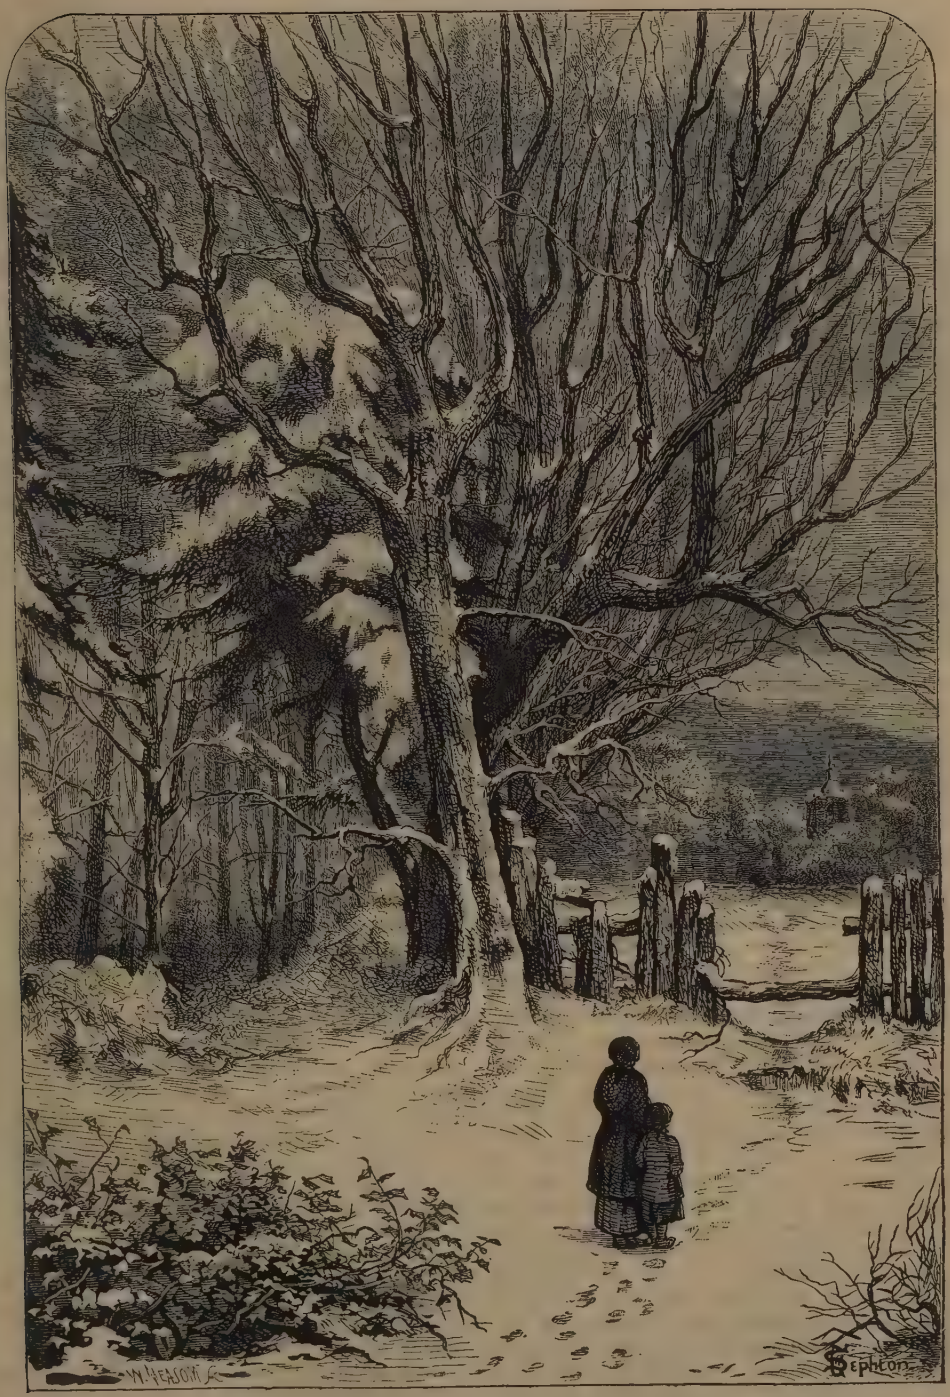
There is a transforming power in light. In this age of science it is only very recently that that which we speak of as light has been discovered to be only the sheath, even as it were the hiding of a more subtle force within itself. As when we speak of oxygen as that which supports life, we find that within oxygen there is a yet more subtle power, ozone, which is the true life-supporter; so when we speak of light, within light itself there is a yet more subtle principle, called actinism, which is the true life-quickener, the Actinic ray. So that in virtue of this, no substance can be exposed to the sun's rays without undergoing a chemical change. Thus it is with the mind and moral nature when it stands in the light of God—God, who is light. And we may separate, and say there is a spiritual light which is not Actinic, it reveals but does not transform, but the perfection of the Divine light is that it "converts the soul." There is a luminous ray which is not a transforming ray; but as there is no organisation where the sun's rays do not penetrate, where there is unchangeable darkness, all things that live are bound together by the silver thread of light.

"God said: 'Let there be light!'
Grim darkness felt his might,
And fled away;
Then startled seas and mountains cold
Shone forth, all bright in blue and gold,
And cried: 'Tis day! 'tis day!'
'Hail, holy light!' exclaim'd
The thund'rous cloud, that flam'd
O'er daisies white;
And, lo! the rose, in crimson dress'd,
Lean'd sweetly on the lily's breast,
And blushing, murmur'd 'Light'

Then was the skylark born;
Then rose the embattled corn;
Then floods of praise
Flow'd o'er the sunny hills of noon;
And then, in stillest night, the moon
Pour'd forth her pensive lays,
Lo, heaven's bright bow is glad!
Lo, trees and flowers all clad
In glory bloom!
And all the mortal sons of God
Be senseless as the trodden clod,
And darker than the tomb."

But light is altogether too large, too transparent, and too revealing a window in the palace of the Great King, to be sufficiently dealt with in a paragraph or two at the close of a paper. We must return to this window again.

Bare Boughs.



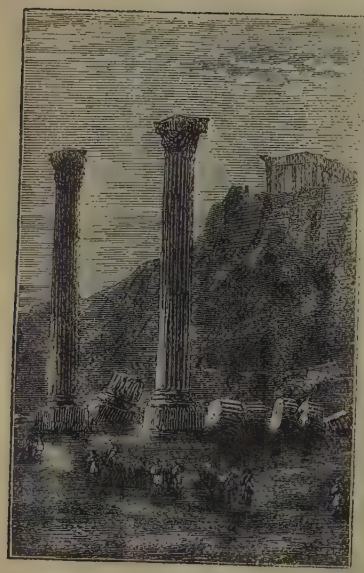
BUT let the months go round, a few short months,
And all shall be restored. Those naked shoots,
Barren as lances, among which the wind
Makes wintry music, sighing as it goes,
Shall put their graceful foliage on again,
And more aspiring, and with ampler spread,
Shall boast new charms, and more than they have lost.

Cowper.

ATHENS.

BY THE REV. W. URWICK, M.A.

I.



AS if to complete the experiences of a journey round the world, it fell to my lot to be for three days in quarantine. From Constantinople and the Chersonese we had crossed the Archipelago in the good ship "Oddone," and were approaching the port and city where centre all the interest of classic Greece. Land and water are eloquent with the associations of history and poetry on every hand. We round the high promontory of Sunium, the extremity of Attica, still marked out by the white columns of the temple of Minerva, which was the landmark to Greek sailors; the morning is bright and fair, and now, with the island of Salamis before us, we are passing up along the coast to the Piræus, when, lo! the portentous yellow flag is run up our mast-heads, and the isolation of quarantine casts a gloom over every face.

We passengers are all in health, and so are captain and crew, and every one on board; we have no sickness whatever. But alarms of the dreadful plague beginning to show itself afresh in Turkey are now abroad, and the States of Europe along the Mediterranean are enforcing a prudent quarantine. Though a clean bill of health can be presented, our ship has to cast anchor outside the harbour of the Piræus, and no boat approaches, save a gloomy, dark-looking barge, itself bearing the yellow flag, with the quarantine officers on board. Into this boat we passengers, bag and baggage, are lowered, and are rowed ashore to a barren rock, where stands the dismal "lazaretto," a sort of barrack, or prison-like house. A score of visitors to Athens, like ourselves, whose term of quarantine is partly gone through, saunter lazily over the rocks, and watch us from afar; but as we approach they retreat, and will speak to us only at a distance of at least six yards, for to approach us would be to re-infect themselves and to prolong their isolation. We enter the bare and roughly-built house, already nearly full, and find two small unfurnished rooms assigned to our party of five. Mattresses are brought in during the day, and spread in each corner on the floor, and an officer is told off to keep charge over us, who never allows us out of his sight. Fifty yards away is an eating-house where we get our meals at our own expense, and are charged heavily for very poor fare. Happily, however, the weather is gloriously fine, and the air bracing; the blue sea is at our feet, and the term of our sojourn is not to be, as the word "quarantine" signifies and originally denoted, "forty" days, nor even a week as for a time it had been, but now it is modified to three days and three nights, and one of these days is a Sunday.

We were now prisoners on a bare, rocky promontory, within sound of church bells, but there was no sanctuary, no service within our reach. There were perhaps about fifty persons here, now in quarantine; but we cannot associate, we cannot meet for worship, each must shun his neighbour. We five, however, who landed together, read together the Word of God, and unite in common prayer, and confer about many topics relating to the Church and Kingdom of Christ. It is an Easter Sunday, and this year Easter in the Greek and Latin churches falls upon the same day, and the war ships, before us in the harbour of the Piræus—Greek, Russian, French, Italian, and English—as a happy family, are all illuminated at night and gaily dressed with flags by day.

The prospect on every side was full of classic interest. The tongue of land on which we are, described by Plato as the claw or breakwater of the Piræus, bore the name Eëtionia, where was the Athenian arsenal, where the Four Hundred erected a fort and built a strong sea barrier. The granite rocks over which we climb bear marks of the mason's chisel. Signs of ancient fortification are on every hand down to the water's edge. Immediately before us across the sea channel is the promontory Alkimus, where lies the tomb of the famous Athenian statesman Themistocles, whose bones were brought from Persia. The supposed tomb is down at the water's edge, and is still marked by pieces of the shaft of the lofty column erected over it four centuries B.C. There are the foundations scattered round on which the altar mentioned by Plutarch was probably raised. It is not well said by Byron to be "high o'er the land," for it is hollowed out at the foot of a rock jutting forth into the sea. Yet, low as is the grave of Themistocles, he who stands by its side sees full in view "the gulf, the rock of Salamis," the scene and monument of his glory.

Before us to the west is the illustrious Salamis, and the narrow winding strait where the memorable battle was fought, and the little rocky island of Psyttalea, where Persian soldiers were stationed to destroy the Greeks, who it was expected would be driven ashore. Not far off is the hill, the "rocky brow" called "Xerxes' Seat," where the proud king sat to watch the battle.

"A king sat on the rocky brow
Which looks o'er seaborn Salamis;
And ships, by thousands lay below,
And men in nations;—all were his!
He counted them at break of day,
And when the sun set where were they?"

Climbing to the extreme boundary of our quarantine ground on the hill, a prospect of still fuller interest burst upon us, and in contemplation of it we spent hours of these bright quiet days. Below on the right lay the Piræus, the port and outpost of Athens, with its noble harbour in great part the work of Themistocles; and following the track of "the Long Walls"—the two arms of stone which connected the Piræus with Athens, forming a street across the plain, five miles in length—the Acropolis itself rose in all its majestic loneliness, crowned with the Parthenon, and the bare and tawny mountains Pentelicus and Hymettus formed the impressive background of the lovely picture.

"Cold is the heart, fair Greece! that looks on thee,
Nor feels as lovers o'er the dust they loved;
Dull is the eye that will not weep to see Thy walls defaced, thy mouldering shrines removed." *

Contemplating the prospect lying spread out in the rich sunshine, and with our Bibles in our hands, it was natural we should think also of the lonely Apostle, and picture to ourselves his arrival at this port. In St. Paul's time, even as now, the proximity of Athens caused the Piræus to be the resort of ships. Here no doubt he would land; here he would take leave of those who conducted him hither, commissioning them to tell Titus and Timotheus "for to come to him with all speed;" and along yonder road between the Long Walls, in his day already ruined, he would make his way to the proud city and would pass by the altar with this inscription, "to the Unknown God." Here too, again, would he take ship when he sailed on to Corinth, for his journey thither would not be made along the hilly and circuitous road over the mountains, but by the shorter and easier way by sea to Cenchrea, the port of Corinth upon the shore of the isthmus.

While thus in our bare rock-prison the scenes around carried our thoughts back to Scripture and to classic times; the dawn of a beautiful Easter Monday recalled our thoughts to modern times and transactions of the present day. The ironclads in the harbour were decked with flags and fired salutes. Ten and twelve-oared galleys were plying gracefully from one ship to another, and preparations were evidently on foot for a gala day. By-and-by the queen of Greece came down from Athens and went on board the Russian flag-ship, where she was sumptuously entertained. The sky was peculiarly clear, the air bracing, and the sunshine bright and joyous. On every hand were signs of new life and presages of future enterprise and greatness for the kingdom of Greece. English, French, and Russian warships were here in the ancient harbour, anchored side by side as pledges of defence and support against Turkish treachery, procrastination, and misrule. The band played the national air of each country in turn, and upon the queen's leaving, the yards were manned, the sailors gave three hearty cheers, and the great guns thundered forth the royal salute. From our quarantine ground we too gave the royal party below us as they drove towards Athens a hearty cheer. Afterwards the calm of sea and sky and mountains was most impressive, and the glow of sunset perfect.

* "Childe Harold," ii. 15.

Happily next morning, as no signs of disease had shown themselves among us, the term of our quarantine ended, and we obtained pratique, i.e. we were allowed to go free. Our baggage, our papers, our clothes had all undergone fumigation. The letters which we wrote and posted were dropped from our hands into a receptacle, where they were cut and pierced and thoroughly fumigated; in fact, every precaution was taken that the actual existence of the plague amongst us would demand. We bid farewell at a distance to those who had landed after us, and gladly enter our boat and are rowed into the harbour, and thread our way amid the ironclads to the landing-stage. Here we secure vehicles to convey us to Athens, for though there is a short railway, the carriage road follows the ancient track of the Long Walls, once the scene of Greek enterprise, business, and pleasure. The present road is itself almost a continuous street with many houses, and full of traffic. An hour's drive brings us up to the modern city which embraces ancient Athens, but extends north and north-west of it. Modern Athens looks bright and joyous. The chief streets, Hermes, Athena and Æolus, are clean, the houses well-built, stuccoed and white, and around the large rectangular palace with its gardens, are several good hotels. Here one meets, for the first time from the east, all the comforts and luxuries of a European capital. During the week of our sojourn we at once set ourselves first and chiefly to see ancient Athens, next to learn somewhat of evangelical Christian work in the city, and afterwards to make one or two excursions to places of historic interest.

Led by our guide, a very intelligent man, who boasted of having acted as cicerone to many distinguished names, we first of all crossed the olive-fringed Ilissus, the stream which bounds the city on the south-east, and entered the ancient Stadium. It is a vast oblong area grown over with grass, with two parallel hills sloping down on either side, continued at the end in a semicircular form, thus making an oblong amphitheatre open at one end. A low wall called the podium, runs along the arena on either side and round its semicircular end. Within this wall the foot and chariot racers and the wrestlers carried on their contests, and on the banks on either side the spectators sat. Of the Panathenaic contests here from time to time, Phidias has left us pictures in stone in the frieze of the Parthenon. As you look round and imagine those assemblies of ancient times, the comparisons of the Pauline epistles are felt with a force and a reality they never had for you before. Here stood the herald summoning the contending runners; before us is the course along which they pressed their way; there sat the judge holding out the prize, a wreath or chaplet only of olive or parsley leaves; and around on those banks, or on seats of marble sat the crowds of spectators, men only—for the presence of women was strictly forbidden—cheering the racers and eagerly watching for the result.

With these things before him, whether in Asia Minor or at Athens, or wherever the Greek stadia were, it was natural that the apostle of the Gentiles should adopt them to illustrate Christian duty in writing to Greek believers. Speaking of the race-course to the Ephesians, he says, "That I may finish my course with joy;" and of the careful diet on the part of the racer, he says to the Corinthians (1 Cor. ix. 25), "Every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things." Of the laws of the race, to Timothy (2 Tim. ii. 5), "If a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully." Referring to the prize, "They do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible;" and to the judge (2 Tim. iv. 7, 8), "I have finished my course: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of life, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me in that day." Drawing his illustration from the conduct of the runners, he writes, "Forgetting the things that are behind, and reaching forth to those that are before, I press toward the mark" (Phil. iii. 12–16); and with those banks on either side crowded with spectators to the number of forty thousand, we read (Heb. xii. 1), "Seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us." All these passages appropriately suggest themselves as we tread that vast now lonely grassy theatre, the Stadium of ancient Athens.

From the Stadium we recross the Ilissus, and see before us the giant yet graceful columns of the temple of Jupiter Olympus. Where all the massive masonry of that great building, which once had 124 Corinthian columns, has gone to, it is not easy to explain. Two huge columns lie prostrate, piece after piece like cut slices lying side by side on edge from base to cupola. Fifteen of the columns are still standing, and form an august and imposing group. They are of Pentelic marble, six feet six in diameter, sixty feet high.

Next we wind our way round the base of the Acropolis, and visit the Theatre of Dionysius, and the Odeum on our way. The Athenians lived in such a clear, mild and sunny atmosphere that they usually held their meetings in uncovered buildings and in the open air.

A winding footpath leads up to a flight of steps within the walls, and onwards to the platform of the Acropolis. This huge square craggy rock rises abrupt on all sides save the west to the height of 150 feet, and its summit is a platform of 1,000 feet long by 600 feet wide. It was called by the Athenians the "Polis," as we nowadays speak in London of "The City," denoting the central area only. Afterwards it was called the Acropolis or "upper city," as distinguished from the lower. It was a fortress, a sanctuary, a treasury, and a museum of art. Upon it are the ruins of the Propylæon, forming the great entrance-hall, of the temple of Victory, of the temple of Erechtheus, and of the Parthenon, the masterpiece of Phidias, the finest edifice on the finest site in the world.

Athens was so called as the city dedicated to Athené or Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, and the Acropolis was cleared of all buildings save temples, halls, and statues to her honour. Here stood three very celebrated statues to Minerva, that of olive-wood, said to have fallen from heaven, the Athena Polias, the Minerva "of the city" with its sanctuary the Erechtheum; that of ivory and gold, Minerva the Virgin, which stood within the Parthenon; and that of bronze, the Athena Promachos, the most colossal of the three, with helmet, spear, and shield, which towered over all the buildings upon the rock, and was hailed by the homeward seaman approaching the Piræus. We climb the path on the western face of the rock through the massive ruins of the Propylæon, and pass under an archway and along a pavement over which rolled for centuries the pomp and glory of the ancient world in the Panathenaic festivals and other triumphal processions. The ruts of the chariot-wheels are deeply marked, and between those two ruts the feet of the noblest Athenians have trod. To our right is the beautiful little temple of the Wingless Victory, restored from its broken fragments in the year 1835. And before us, a little to the right as we enter the vast platform scattered over with marble fragments, rises the majestic and graceful Parthenon, the glory of Athens and wonder of mankind. Fragments from the Parthenon, the Elgin marbles, forming its frieze, are still the admiration of visitors from all parts of the world in our British Museum. The Parthenon was the central goal of the Panathenaic festival, the festival of chariot-races and other games, and within, instead of an altar, there was before the goddess a platform whereon the victors in the race received their chaplets and vases of olive-oil.* The building is of Pentelic marble, which now, seasoned by age, is of a rich brown colour. It is pure Doric, and rests upon a vast base of limestone. There is nothing to divert the attention from the simplicity and majesty of the whole. The eye rests upon it, and is satisfied. There is not a straight line in any part. The steps from side to side form a gentle curve, being 12 inches higher in the centre than at either end; yet to the eye they look perfectly straight. Phidias must have understood so perfectly the laws of optics, as to anticipate in these delicate curves what only photography has taught us. The dimensions of the building are about 230 feet long by 100 broad, and its height 66 feet. The cella or hall is surrounded with columns, 8 at either end, and 17 on either side, all of marble, six feet diameter at the base. Here are no bricks, no mortar, no small stones; only large blocks of marble beautifully cut and polished, and adjusted with the nicest care. The whole building within and without was adorned with the most exquisite pieces of sculpture.

To the left of the Parthenon stands the Erechtheum, a most graceful ruin of the Ionic order, smaller than the Parthenon, and distinguished by the beautiful Caryatides, the draped maidens bearing up the portico, which has been imitated on the side of St. Pancras church in London. Within the precincts of this building is the fabled well of salt water, the emblem of Neptune, and the olive-tree, representing the goddess Athené, both Neptune and Athené contending for the presidency and protectorate of the city, which owed its wealth alike to the olive which grew in the plain, and to the sea which bore its commerce. The mythology associated with these temples, so childish and impure, presents a striking contrast to the purity, grace, and beauty of their architecture. Grandeur of architecture is no evidence of purity of faith. "The Most High dwelleth not in temples made by hands." "God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth."

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

FEBRUARY 20.

THE PREACHING OF JESUS. LUKE IV. 14–32.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 18.—'The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the Gospel to the poor; He hath sent Me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised.'

CONNECTION.—It will be observed that the present course of Lessons, in following the Life of our Lord as related by St. Luke, dwells chiefly on incidents and discourses omitted or slightly touched by the other Evangelists. Much had happened in the interval between His baptism and this visit to Nazareth. The Temptation—His enrolment of disciples—His miracle at Cana—His visit to Jerusalem—His earlier ministry in Judæa—and that memorable journey in which 'He must needs go through Samaria,' had all preceded His public work in Galilee, with which the Lesson opens.

I. JESUS IN THE SYNAGOGUE AT NAZARETH.—Read vers. 14–16. Returned; so far as would appear from this Gospel, from the wilderness of Temptation. But for His intermediate labours see above. In the power of the Spirit, describing the special energies, now awakened, latent before: the power of which the Dove descending on Him at His baptism was a sign. The same Spirit had led Him into the wilderness, ver. 1. Galilee, where His more public ministry had its beginning and centre, Acts x. 37. A fame of Him. It was the time of His first and brightest popularity. Not yet had His humbling doctrines aroused men's pride against Him. The people were everywhere charmed by His words, amazed by His miracles. The region round about, so desolate now, was then filled with busy life. The populous towns and thriving villages all had their synagogues: an active energetic population, rustic, simple and ardent, carried from place to place the tidings that a great Teacher had arisen. 'The Galilæans received Him, having seen all the things that He did at Jerusalem at the feast' (John iv. 45). To this period of His ministry belongs His second miracle (wrought at Cana) on the nobleman's son at Capernaum; after which, as it appears, Jesus Himself went to the latter city, Matt. iv. 13.

> The word He in ver. 15 is emphatic in the original. He Himself went, after His fame had preceded Him, and this report of His words and works was more than confirmed by His personal ministry. He was glorified of (by) all.

To Nazareth, where He had been brought up. Few events in a young life are more interesting and impressive than the first return to the home of childhood, after the experiences of maturer life have begun. This visit marked a great crisis in our Lord's career. At Nazareth, as a child, a youth, a man, He had lived in the 'favour' of all. They had loved Him for what they saw Him to be; but now their regard was to be put to another test. For they had never known Him really. Had even His mother spoken much among her neighbours of the marvels that she could tell? See ch. i. 19; ii. 51. The reports, therefore, which now reached Nazareth from Cana, Capernaum, and many a place beside, were strange to these villagers. Think how everyone would be talking about Him; the old men who had 'known him as a boy;' his former comrades in daily work and converse; the women of the place, as they gathered around the well at eventide! The news He is coming would set all Nazareth astir; and on the Sabbath when He was seen accompanying His mother to the Synagogue, as had been His custom in the bygone quiet years,* the village sanctuary would be crowded by an audience, eager with curiosity. [The arrangement and services of a synagogue in our Lord's time should here be briefly sketched. See Biblical Dictionaries, art. 'Synagogue,' and almost any Commentary on this passage.] The reading of the Law (the first Lesson) was over; and at the time for the second Lesson, from the Prophets, Jesus stood up. This was according to custom. There was no minister, in our sense; one of the villagers, or a visitor might read; and any one of reputable character, or a stranger present, might be further called on, or might volunteer, to give an address. See Acts xiii. 15.

II. CHRIST'S READING, AND ITS APPLICATION.—Read vers. 17–21. The book, the roll, of the prophet Isaiah: no doubt because it contained the Lesson for the day. This scroll, wound upon two upright cylinders, was so arranged that when drawn apart they disclosed the proper Lesson. He thus opened it, well knowing what the words would be.

> We must not suppose that He selected a Lesson out of course, or that He unrolled the scroll at random. On the other hand, we cannot tell from the passage read what particular time of the year it was. In later times, this part of Isaiah was selected for the Day of Atonement, and this may have been the ancient plan. If so, how appropriate the words from the lips of the great Atoner!

Compare this truly 'Golden Text' as it stands in the prophecy, Isa. lxi. 1, with the citation here. [Our Lord read, of course from the Hebrew. St. Luke quotes mainly from the Septuagint Greek translation; hence the little diversities.] It is part of the same great chain of prophecy as that fulfilled in the Baptist's ministry. See last week's Lesson. The imagery, however, is not that of a return from captivity, but of the year of Jubilee; Lev. xxv. This is the acceptable year, employed as a type of Christ's saving work; and He, on whom the Spirit descended in His baptism, who had come into Galilee in the power of the same Spirit, now proclaims release: He is the MESSIAH, the Anointed—solemnly set apart, to preach the gospel, glad tidings, to the poor, literally, Matt. xi. 5, spiritually, Matt. vi. 3. To the poor what tidings could be better than the announcement of their debts being paid, their lost possessions restored? Such was the purpose of the Jubilee. Show how Christ does this for the 'poor in spirit.' Other descriptions of human need—brokenhearted — captives — blind — bruised, literally. crushed: all pictures of what sin has made us—the need which Christ supplies—the misery from which He redeems. Thus far the reading from the prophet. The 20th verse surely is from an eye-witness; every action being noted by one whose eyes in that synagogue were fastened upon Him—with an intense gaze, as the word denotes. Giving the book to the minister—the attendant, or chazzan, as called in Hebrew, He sat down—the teacher's posture (Matt. v. 1). This seating Himself—on the raised platform in sight of all—was the sign that He had something to say to that eager audience. And He began—with the most direct simplicity, the most august majesty. Fulfilled; because I am here in the power of the Spirit to proclaim these glad tidings to you.

> The anticipation of the first three Beatitudes in the Sermon on the mount, Matt. v. 3–5, is here very noteworthy.

III. THE EFFECT OF CHRIST'S DISCOURSE.—Read vers. 22–27. Note the successive emotions of the hearers—first gazing intently (v. 20), then bearing witness, i.e. to the truth of the rumours that had reached them respecting Him, then wondering—now it was no longer the mere confirmation of what they had heard from others—for they themselves listened to His gracious words—words of grace—beautiful, winning, tender, Psa. xlv. 2; John vii. 46. No doubt He continued speaking, although we are not told of His words after the first. For a time His hearers were thus entranced; then, as if breaking the spell, they began to question, Who is this, that is so speaking to us? Joseph's son—for aught they knew—John vi. 42. As if that settled the matter! The words of grace, the fame of the mighty works, were to go for nothing—because they had known Him in his childhood, because He had been a villager amongst them! (In Jewish synagogues much more freedom of conversation was tolerated than in our places of worship.) Jesus overheard their mutterings, or knew what was in their hearts, and Himself puts their thoughts into words. The proverb, in its application, seems simply to mean, Why not begin at home? Art Thou the great Healer? Then show it in Thine own case (making Thyself great) and in exalting the people of Thy country Nazareth! Christ's reply, No prophet is accepted, etc., had been uttered by way of anticipation; before this journey into Galilee (John iv. 44; a reason why he had gone to other parts of Galilee before visiting Nazareth). He declared the same thing again; Matt. xiii. 57. So true was it in His case, that even His brethren did not believe on Him, John vii. 5. The Old Testament instances which follow show how the prophets of God had been sent to others than the chosen people. Elias—Elijah. How long did the famine last, according to the history? Explain the variations. (One reckoning starts from the last rainy season, the other from the time when rain might have been expected, i.e. three and a half years from February, three years from November, 1 Kings xviii. 1; James v. 17). Sarepta, Zarephath. Sidon, a heathen territory. Eliseus, Elisha. Naaman the Syrian, again a heathen.

* At five years old a child might, at thirteen he must attend the Synagogue.

> Observe the force of the words save, saving (= except). It is not implied that the widow of Zarephath, or that Naaman belonged to Israel. Lay the emphasis in each verse on them.

IV. CHRIST DEPARTS FROM NAZARETH.—Read vers. 28–32. A yet deeper animosity is now aroused; the thought of a gospel for strangers being especially abhorrent to them. 'Thou rejectest us, and we reject Thee!' How short the transition from admiration to wrath! We see the tumultuous throng, climbing the nearest ascent, thrusting Him forward in the midst of them to the brow of the hill.

> Not the traditional Mount of Precipitation, which is two miles from Nazareth, but some rocky projection of the limestone hill on whose broken face the village stands. One is pointed out, above the Maronite Convent, about 40 feet high.

Cast Him down headlong—not a customary punishment among the Jews, though it was so in other ancient nations. (But see 2 Chron. xxv. 12.) The marvel that followed was not necessarily supernatural. A disorderly mob will often be awed by calmness and resolution. A momentary hesitation may well have held them back from completing their murderous design; and in His own majesty He passed on, before the boldest or most cruel of the crowd ventured to lay hands upon Him. Involuntarily they all fell back, and He passed through the midst of them! If not a miracle, it was a marvel attesting His Divine dignity (John viii. 59). So He left them, but not for ever, and returned to Capernaum, where for a time He made his home among a people astonished at His doctrine (or teaching, manner as well as matter), eager to listen, proud of Him (Mark ii. 12, etc.), but, alas! not saved. See ch. x. 15.

> Did Jesus ever visit Nazareth again? The account in Matthew xiii. 54–58 seems to decide the matter. Some expositors, however, from the likeness between that narrative and the present Lesson, regard both as referring to the same visit, narrated by Matthew much too late, or by Luke much too early, for its place in the history. It seems more natural to suppose that a second visit was paid, in the Saviour's unwearying love, and that the Nazarenes who had spurned Him once, rejected Him again, though with less violence. On this second occasion also, He wrought miracles among them, but 'not many' because of their unbelief.

QUESTIONS.

1. What passages speak of the Spirit of God as resting upon Jesus?
2. Name the several provisions of the year of Jubilee, and show how they prefigured the blessings of Christ's salvation.
3. Why was Jesus rejected by the Nazarenes; and how does their conduct illustrate that of all despisers of the Gospel?
4. What illustrations does the ministry of Jesus contain of God's purposes of mercy to all mankind?
5. In what passages is the effect of Christ's teaching on his hearers specially marked?

THE NEW SCHOLAR.

I.

THE holidays were over, and the Abbey school at Bandlebury, which had been silent and almost deserted for the last few weeks, began to show signs of returning life and activity.

Flys and cabs were continually drawing up at the door of the school-house, and there discharging their freights of merry-faced boys, most of whom seemed to be as happy in returning to school as they had been six weeks before in leaving it.

Piles of luggage, boxes and hampers brought from all parts of the country, stood in the large hall, and suggested an immense amount of labour in store for the school porters, before they could all be put in their places.

There was a good deal of excitement among the boys who had already arrived, as they heartily cheered their friends and schoolfellows who came later in the day, and greeted them with question after question: "How are you?" "How have you got on?" "Have you enjoyed yourself?" and so on.

At length the evening closed in and the latest arrival for the day made his appearance.

"Many new boys this time?" asked one of the elder lads of a classfellow.

"I don't know, Charlie; there is one new fellow put in our room though."

"Oh! What a pity. What do we want with a new boy there? What sort of fellow is he?"

"I haven't seen him yet. I only know he is coming by his box being put with ours."

"Did you see his name?"

"No, but his box is marked with the initials 'O. C.'"

"'O. C.;' what can they stand for? Obadiah something, I expect. I'm sure I shall not like him."

"Oliver Cromwell, more likely," put in one of the boys. "You will have to look out for your head, Charlie Stewart," he continued.

"And your kingdom," said another; "you won't be allowed to reign in our room after Cromwell comes."

Charles Stewart laughed, but did not appear quite pleased. For some time he had been high in his class, and he was also the acknowledged "head" of his dormitory, and the joke about being deposed irritated him.

Just then the prayer-bell rang, and the conversation ended for the time; but when the boys were in their room a short time afterwards, it was resumed.

"Look, Stewart," said one; "here is Oliver Cromwell's box; don't you tremble?"

"I wish you wouldn't be so foolish," he answered rather loftily. "I think it is a pity you have not got something better to talk about."

This speech set the boys laughing, and when they found that Stewart was getting vexed, they teased him all the more.

Fortunately most of the lads were sleepy, and they soon ceased talking, but not before they had said enough to annoy their schoolfellow and, foolish as it may seem, to prejudice him against the owner of the offending initials.

Charles Stewart was not altogether a favourite with his schoolfellows; he was easily offended, and ready to take as an insult any little joke that did not just suit his humour, and once offended, he was not easily reconciled.

Knowing this, it was a pity that his schoolfellows should have tried to annoy him. They would have shown much greater wisdom and proper feeling if they had carefully avoided anything that was likely to give offence and cause unpleasantness. Instead of this, however, they were constantly trying to irritate him, just for the fun, as they called it, of seeing him in a passion. Need we tell our young readers that, in this, they acted not only foolishly, but sinfully. We think not, and we hope that if any of them are ever tempted to tease, either their brothers and sisters or their schoolfellows, they will remember the words of our Saviour, "Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God," and thus be prevented from doing or saying what might cause anger and sin.

The next day, the new boy made his appearance at the school. Whatever his name might be, he certainly did not look likely to prove himself a very formidable rival to Charles Stewart. He was a little fellow with a pale face and shy look, as unlike the portraits that the boys had seen of Oliver Cromwell as could possibly be. They had yet to discover that the slight and childish frame of the new-comer held a courageous and manly heart, and that although he appeared diffident and shy he could, when occasion required, speak and act with a boldness that few of the others would have attempted.

In a large school, such as that at Bandlebury, the advent of a new scholar was hardly noticed except by the boys in whose class and room he was placed; but by them he was usually put under a sort of examination as to what his name was, where he came from, how far he was advanced in his studies, and various other things, interesting only to those into whose immediate companionship he was likely to be thrown; and no exception to this rule was made in the present case. Hardly were the morning studies over before the new boy was surrounded by his classfellows, all except Charles Stewart, who walked away, and the catechism commenced.

"I say, what is your name?" asked one of the boys.

"Oswald Compton," was the quiet answer.

"Oliver Cromwell, I said so," laughed the first speaker, and his laugh was taken up by the others.

"I said Oswald Compton," returned the new-comer, his face flushing a little; "not Oliver Cromwell."

"Ah! well, it's all the same; that's what we shall call you; and you know you will have to look after Charles Stewart, and keep him in order; do you understand?"

"No," answered Compton, "I do not."

"Why, don't you know that Oliver Cromwell had Charles the first, Charles Stuart, you know, beheaded, and——"

"But I don't want to behead anyone," answered the new boy, smiling.

"No, no! but there is a boy of the name of Stewart in our room, and if we call you Cromwell, you will have to put him down, you know."

"Oh," answered the other; "but if I am to be like Cromwell, I shall think and act for myself, and not let others tell me what I am to do."

This answer seemed to stagger the others for a moment, but they soon commenced again.

"It is only a joke, you know, but we have been telling Stewart that you will sure to be his rival, and that before long you will be head of the class, and of our room, too."

"And what does he say to that?" asked Compton.

"Oh! he is in a terrible way about it. He dislikes you already, and the very mention of your name, at least of Oliver Cromwell, puts him in a passion."

"Then why do you mention it?"

"Oh, it's such fun to see him in a temper. He looks so wild and fierce."

"Yes," said another; "he is terribly hot-tempered, and as he has taken a dislike to you he will lead you a nice life. I wouldn't be in your place for something."

"I shall know who to thank for setting him against me, at any rate," answered Compton; "but if you think you are going to frighten me about a boy I have never spoken to, you are mistaken."

"Ah! it's all very well to talk like that; you just wait and see."

"That is what I intend doing," answered the new boy; "and even if I find Stewart such a formidable fellow, I dare say I shall be able to conquer him."

"Bravo, Cromwell," shouted the boys; "we will tell Charlie Stewart what you say."

"Do as you please," Compton answered. "I am going to look round the place now."

"Wait a minute," cried one of the lads. "How far are you in Latin?"

"Oh! you will see when we are in class; I am tired of being examined now." Saying this, Compton moved to the door, leaving the others looking after him in surprise.

"Well, he is a cool fellow," said one; "I never saw a new boy take things so easily."

"Won't Charlie be in a rage when we tell him what Cromwell, or Compton, or whatever his name is, said about conquering him."

"He is a little fellow, but he looks as if he means what he says," put in another.

It was not long before the boys found Stewart and told him what Compton had said.

"He declares he will conquer you," said one.

"Yes, and he said he wasn't going to be frightened by you," put in another.

"Did he say that?" exclaimed Stewart, who was already getting angry.

"Ay, that he did; he regularly sets you at defiance."

And so these young mischief-makers rattled on, trying all they could to make ill-will between Stewart and Compton; and so well did they succeed, that before he had spoken to his new schoolfellow, Stewart thoroughly hated him.

With a rod and staff supporting,
Who are they that come?
Shall they find the promised mansion—
Dwell at home?

Yes; they'll enter in with gladness,

THE NEW TESTAMENT REVISION.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

I.—PRELIMINARY.

IT is one of the happiest characteristics of that great Bible revision, whose firstfruits appear during this month, that, by common consent, our own English Scriptures are, in every essential feature, to be preserved. No new translation could ever become, to the faith and intelligence of English-speaking people all over the world, what the old Book has been for more than two hundred and fifty years. For, apart from higher claims to reverence, it is the foremost of British classics. Its phrases and turns of expression, even more than direct quotation, pervade our entire literature. Its tones and cadences live in our ears and hearts; it is among us, yet above us, the homely, lofty standard of our speech. Other works of the same age survive in their antique grandeur as relics of the past, this belongs to the living present, like some old cathedral untouched by modern art, yet crowded with the worshippers of to-day.

"Who will say," writes a late distinguished pervert to Romanism,* "that the uncommon beauty and marvellous English of our Protestant Bible is not one of the great strongholds of heresy in this country? It lives on the ear, like music that can never be forgotten, like the sound of church bells, which the convert hardly knows how he can forego. Its felicities often seem to be almost things rather than words. It is part of the national mind, and the anchor of national seriousness. The memory of the dead passes into it. The potent traditions of childhood are stereotyped in its verses. The power of all the griefs and trials of a man is hidden beneath its words. It is the representative of his best moments; and all that there has been about him of soft and gentle and pure and penitent and good, speaks to him for ever out of his English Bible. It is his sacred thing, which doubt has never dimmed, and controversy never soiled."

Grievous would be the loss, hardly to be compensated by any gain in critical accuracy, should associations like these be rudely broken. This choicest treasure of the household and the Church we never can let go. Nor is such a demand now made, whatever may have been the case in former times. New translations have been often proposed, and not infrequently attempted, during the last hundred years; but the protest of instinct and affection is at length seen to be in accord with the soundest judgment; and the New Testament soon to be given to the world is still the old book, unimpaired in its majesty and music, and with the necessary amendments so inwrought into the structure that the fabric still is harmonious and one. Such, at least, has been the aim of the revisers; we shall know very soon whether they have succeeded. Meantime, it may be useful to remind ourselves that the New Testament of 1611 was itself no more than a revision, or rather the result of several revisions, of Tyndale's version published eighty-five years before. For this, as Mr. Froude truly says,* though many times revised and altered, "is substantially the Bible with which we are all familiar. The peculiar genius—if such a word may be permitted—which breathes through it, the mingled tenderness and majesty, the Saxon simplicity, the preternatural grandeur, unequalled, unapproached in the attempted improvements of modern scholars, all are here, and bear the impress of the mind of one man, William Tyndale." The story of these successive revisions, from 1526 to 1611, has been told so fully by Mr. Anderson and Professor Westcott, by Dr. Eadie, Dr. Stoughton and Dr. Moulton, and in our own columns by Mr. Demaus,† and is happily now so familiar, that no details need here be given. Suffice it to say that the aim of the revisers of 1881 has been to do for the version of 1611 what the revisers of 1611 did for Tyndale's, or rather, for the Bishops' Bible, the form which Tyndale's had ultimately taken. Should they prove to have succeeded in this endeavour, they will have performed the noblest task of our generation.

It is a task, we may add, which could not have been hopefully attempted until quite recent times. During the Georgian period of English literature, at least, the standard of taste prevailing would have been fatal both to the simplicity and the unction of the Book, and that without any gain of critical accuracy: we should have had, in fact, "an elegant translation." The Archbishop of Dublin has gathered some curious specimens of modernised versions. Thus, where our Bible reads, "A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways," one of these improved translations has "A man unsteady in his opinions is inconstant in all his practices;" and in the same chapter, "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations," is replaced in another version by, "Keep yourselves perfectly cheerful when you are exposed to a variety of trials." The late Dr. Campbell, of Aberdeen, whose work on the Gospels (1788) is still read with profit by scholars, does not offend against good taste quite so grossly, but yet his renderings serve chiefly to show by contrast the superiority of the old diction. Thus to take a brief example at random, in Luke viii. 42–44, we read, "Who now is the discreet and faithful steward whom the Master will set over his household, to dispense regularly the allowance of corn? Happy that servant, if his master, at His arrival, shall find him so employed. I tell you truly, He will entrust him with the management of all His estate." Such versions are but a long succession of failures; and it is in English rather than in Greek that the translators have missed the mark. Happily, the scholarship of our own age has directed especial attention to English; the genius and resources of our own noble tongue are perhaps better understood than ever before; and one result has been the adoption, by the revisers, of two rules, a consistent adherence to which will have secured the success of their work:

"I. To introduce as few alterations as possible in the text of the Authorised Version consistently with faithfulness.

"II. To limit, as far as possible, the expression of such alterations to the language of the Authorised and earlier English versions."

Should these principles have been fairly carried out, such fears will at once be laid to rest as that to which, among others, the noble President of the British and Foreign Bible Society gave utterance when protesting ten years ago against a "diluted" and "Frenchified" adaptation of Bible language to modern tastes. We may say, with some assurance, pending the appearance of the Book, that this is precisely what has not been done. Nor have the apprehensions of the Archbishop of York been verified that the Bible would be "laid on the table of the anatomist," or "sent to the crucible to be melted down and recast." It remains with us in its integrity, retouched and corrected, but with its meaning deepened and its beauty unimpaired.

REASONS FOR REVISION.

The reasons for revision have during the last twenty years become familiar to all readers. Suffice it to say, confining our attention at present to the New Testament, that the first and chief reason is found in the imperfections of the Greek text to which the translators of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were restricted. Since that era, the discovery and collation of MSS., the examination of ancient literature bearing upon the subject—in a word, all that is comprised in the modern science of Biblical criticism, has led to the adoption of a text, not indeed absolutely perfect, but in accuracy far beyond that which our Authorised Version represents. It would plainly be unfair to the English reader that the results attained by Griesbach and Scholz, by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, with their only less renowned compeers who consecrated laborious years to the task of discovering the very words of evangelists and apostles, should be lost to all but scholars. Criticism has not indeed yet said its last word upon many points, but the greater number of readings may now be pronounced as virtually settled; and the revised version of the New Testament is, we understand, to be accompanied by two editions of the Greek original, one to be published by the University of Cambridge, containing the received text with accepted emendations in the margin, the other, undertaken by the University of Oxford, giving the text as amended. Two of the revisers, Professor Westcott and Mr. Hort, were at work upon a recension of the text several years before the present revision; another, Dr. Scrivener, has devoted a lifetime to the task; and this new Greek Testament may be accepted with confidence as representing the latest conclusions of the highest scholarship.

The second reason is based upon certain acknowledged errors in the Authorised Version. On these we do not speak in detail; it will be our business hereafter, when the work is before us, to point out the chief among them, and to show how they have been rectified. Only one word of forewarning must be given. Very probably it may turn out that these errors have been exaggerated both in number and quality. Even within the limits of alteration already specified, the New Testament will hardly be so much changed as many people think. The later stages of the revision have, we understand, been very much in the direction of restoring what had been questioned; not so much from the inevitable conservatism of so large a company, as from a further and deeper examination correcting first impressions. Illustrations of this fact we hope to give hereafter. It may serve meanwhile to quote an anecdote from old Izaak Walton respecting Dr. Kilbie, one of King James's translators. "A young preacher," says Walton, "had no more discretion than to waste a great part of the hour allotted for his sermon, in exceptions against the translation of several words; and showed three reasons why a particular word should have been otherwise translated. At supper time Dr. Kilbie observed to the youthful divine that as for that word for which he offered to that poor congregation three reasons why it ought to have been translated as he said, he and others had considered all of them, and found thirteen more considerable reasons why it was translated as now printed." The incident, mutatis mutandis, will probably recur pretty often within the next few years!

PREPARATORY STEPS.

Such being the grounds of action, it is not wonderful that the years before the task was formally undertaken were fertile in proposals and in partial endeavours to supply the need. Five-and-twenty years ago, scattered papers in our chief literary and religious periodicals* showed that the matter was taking some practical shape in the minds of scholars. In February 1856, Canon Selwyn moved the Lower House of Convocation to request the Upper House to consider an address to the Crown for a Commission "to consider such amendments of the Authorised Version as have been already proposed, to receive suggestions from all persons who may be willing to offer them, to communicate with foreign scholars on difficult passages when it may be deemed advisable, to examine the marginal readings which appear to have been introduced into some editions since the year 1611, and to point out such words and phrases as have either changed their meaning or become obsolete in the lapse of time." Nothing practical came at the time of this; but in July of the same year Mr. Heywood moved in the House of Commons for a similar address to the Crown praying for a Commission "to consider amendments that had been proposed in our present Version, to receive suggestions from those willing to offer them, to point out errors and obsolete words, and to report accordingly." The motion was opposed by Sir George Grey, then Home Secretary, and was withdrawn. Another effort was made in Convocation; this time simply to obtain the appointment of "a joint committee of both Houses to deliberate upon the best means of bringing under review the suggestions made during the last two hundred and fifty years for the still further improvement of the Authorised Version of the Holy Scripture, and of publishing the results of the inquiry." The motion was opposed by Dr. Wordsworth, the present Bishop of Lincoln, in an amendment declaring "That any alterations or additions which it may be deemed expedient by competent authority to be adopted, should be confined to the margin, and not be introduced into the text"; while Archdeacon Denison characteristically moved, "That it is not expedient that this House give any encouragement to any alteration or modification of the Authorised Version, whether by way of insertion in the text, marginal note, or otherwise." It does not seem that any division was actually taken on these competing resolutions. The original mover probably thought that sufficient had been done for the time by raising the question; and from that time it has never slept.

Good service was in the meantime done by many scholars, who took up the work on the principle, already recognised, of as close an adhesion as possible to the language and style of the Authorised English text. "Five clergymen"* led the way by a careful version of St. John's Gospel and most of the Pauline Epistles. A translation of the whole New Testament followed by Mr. Highton (1862), a work which has scarcely received the attention which its high scholarship and soundness of judgment well deserve. Dean Alford worthily crowned his lifelong labours as a commentator on the New Testament by his well-known and popular translation, first published in 1869. In the various critical commentaries, versions, more or less paraphrastic, will be found; while since the revision began Dr. Davidson has issued his literal translation of Tischendorf's Eighth Critical edition, and the late Mr. Joseph Gurney published a "Revised English Bible" with the avowed object of embodying only those emendations on which most scholars were agreed. Several editions of the Scriptures, or of the New Testament, were published with marginal notes, containing various readings, or corrected renderings. A Paragraph Bible in quarto with emendations was issued by the Religious Tract Society in 1871. But the "Variorum Bible," published by Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode,† must undoubtedly take the first place among publications of this kind, containing as it does, after the model of the "Variorum" classics, all the chief variations both in text and translation, in Old Testament and New, selected by four of the most competent scholars of the day. By the aid of this admirable volume, the English student may both understand and appreciate the conclusions of the highest Biblical criticism and exegesis; and as preparatory to the intelligent reception of the Revised Versions both of the Old and New Testaments the work will be found invaluable.*

Nor, to return to the period previous to 1870, were appeals to the public wanting in favour of a complete and joint revision of the Scriptures. Dr. Beard of Manchester published in 1857 a thoughtful and learned work, although occasionally questionable in its criticisms, entitled, "A Revised English Bible: the Want of the Church and the Demand of the Age." In 1858 Dr. R. C. Trench, the present Archbishop of Dublin, gave to the world his scholarly essay on the "Revision of the English New Testament;" a work which contains the sum of the whole question, put with the accomplished writer's well-known felicity of style and illustration. And in 1864 a "Licentiate of the Church of Scotland" published "A Plea for a New English Version of the Scriptures," still worth reading for its mass of illustrative instances, though somewhat loosely arranged. Mr. Malan, of Broadwindsor, came forward as a defender of the Authorised Version in its integrity, and made, it must be confessed, some good points. In the "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1865, the whole controversy is summed up with the hand of a master; and from that time it became evident that the moment for action could not be long delayed. Bishop Ellicott's "Considerations on the Revision of the English Version of the New Testament," and the essay of Canon Lightfoot (now Bishop of Durham), "On a Fresh Revision of the English New Testament," were issued when the work had actually been determined upon, and are of special value now, as handbooks to the whole subject.

THE PRESENT REVISION.

It is not easy to say who had the chief share in inducing the Convocation of the Southern Province at last to take decisive action. The initiative is probably due to the three great New Testament expositors of our time, Drs. Alford, Ellicott, and Lightfoot, well supported by the intelligence and determination of Dean Stanley. By this time the interest of Nonconformists also was thoroughly aroused. A valuable paper read by Professor Newth to the Congregational Union in 1870 excited much attention, convincing some who were undecided before. By this time it was understood on all hands that the work must be one in which the representatives of all churches should take part. Conferences were held by eminent members of the Church of England with Dr. Stoughton, Dr. Angus, and other leading Nonconformists. The idea of a Royal Commission, though still favoured by some, was tacitly abandoned; and the work was left to the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury; that of York, led by its accomplished and learned Archbishop, still declining to unite. The first formal resolution on the subject was moved, we believe, by Dr. Wilberforce, then Bishop of Winchester, who proposed that the revision of the New Testament should be undertaken, Dr. Ollivant, Bishop of Llandaff, immediately asking, "And why not the Old also?" a suggestion adopted at once. As the result, a Committee of bishops and other dignitaries was appointed, at whose instance the following resolutions were adopted at a meeting of Convocation held May 6th, 1870:

"That it is desirable that a revision of the Authorised Version of the Holy Scriptures be undertaken; that the revision be so conducted as to comprise both marginal renderings and such emendations as it may be found necessary to insert in the text of the Authorised Version;" and "that it is desirable that Convocation should nominate a body of its own members to undertake the work of revision, who shall be at liberty to invite the co-operation of any eminent for scholarship, to whatever nation or religious body they may belong."

entered on the task, Dr. Alford was soon called away by death. Bishop Wilberforce died in 1873, Dr. Eadie in 1876, Dr. Tregelles, who had been unable to attend from the first, in 1875. The rest have uninterruptedly continued the work for ten years; the Rev. J. Troutbeck acting as secretary. It should be added that the labours of the revisers have been gratuitous, the heavy necessary expenses of the work being defrayed by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, in consideration of the copyright.

The place of meeting has been the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey, a room of many and various associations with historic personages and events. Taking its name probably from the tapestry which once adorned its walls, and which represented scenes from the history of Jerusalem, it long seemed invested with a strange sacredness in the minds of men. It was the death-chamber of King Henry IV.,

THE JERUSALEM CHAMBER.

The Committee for the Revision of the New Testament consisted at first of the Bishops of Winchester, Gloucester and Bristol, and Salisbury, with Dr. Bickersteth (the Prolocutor, now Dean of Lichfield), Deans Alford and Stanley, with Dr. Blakesley, now Dean of Lincoln. To these, by invitation, the following were added, at first or subsequently, Archbishop Trench, Dr. Angus, Dr. D. Brown, of Aberdeen, Dr. Eadie, Rev. F. J. A. Hort, Rev. W. G. Humphry, Canon Kennedy, Archdeacon Lee, Professors Lightfoot (now Bishop of Durham), Milligan, Moulton, Newth, Edwin Palmer, and Roberts, Dr. G. Vance Smith, Dr. Scott, Dean of Rochester, Dr. F. H. Scrivener, Dr. Wordsworth, Bishop of St. Andrews, Dr. Tregelles, Dr. C. J. Vaughan, Master of the Temple (now Dean of Llandaff), and Professor Westcott. Dr. J. H. Newman was also invited, but declined, and Dr. Merivale, Dean of Ely, resigned soon after his appointment. Of those who as readers of Shakespeare will remember. Here, in later days, were laid in state the bodies of Robert South, Joseph Addison, Sir Isaac Newton, and other famous men. But the ecclesiastical associations of this chamber must ever give it a chief place in our remembrance. It was here (driven in the first instance by cold from the interior of the Abbey) that the Westminster Assembly held its sittings for more than five years (1643–1649). Here also was convened that well-intentioned though abortive conference held in 1689 for the Revision of the Prayer Book with a view to the conciliation of Nonconformists. So lately as 1867 another Royal Commission assembled in the same spot to examine the Ritual and Rubrics of the Church of England so as to relieve troubled consciences in the matter of subscription. But those ancient walls have never looked down upon a work more surely calculated to harmonize the strifes of the Church, and to reconcile divided brethren, than during the long sessions of patient labour in which men of various ecclesiastical relationships and often warring creeds have been found uniting with one accord in the serious and simple endeavour, first to discover to the uttermost minuteness what God has spoken, and then to devise how best and most directly to communicate that knowledge to the English people. Fitly were the proceedings of the companies introduced by the celebration of the Communion, June 22nd, 1870, in the Chapel of Henry VII., at the grave of Edward VI. In reference to this impressive service Dr. Bickersteth wrote the following sonnet:

"Over the youthful Sovereign's grave we bent,
A little company; and there was given
To each, with reverence due, the Bread of Heaven:
And then some silent prayers were upward sent
To God's high Throne, that He would deign to bless
All those who knelt in meek devotion there,
With the strong faith and gentle holiness
Of that sweet saintly king. Moments there are
When strives in vain the over-burdened heart
To utter what it feels. Dread Spirit, guide
With pure intention and with judgment clear,
The students of Thy Word! Do Thou impart
True wisdom, light celestial. All beside Is dark, light comes if only Thou be near."

In this spirit the work has been continued, with painstaking and reverent care. The Bishop of Winchester was the first President, and after his lamented death the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol succeeded to the chair. The proceedings have been simple and orderly, the rules of procedure being few and explicit. Every important suggestion has been submitted in writing; the discussion on each several point being full, careful, often animated, but always friendly. The revisers have virtually, though not formally, fallen into place, each being regarded as an authority in his own department, one on textual criticism, another on the discrimination of synonyms, another on the niceties of English, and so on; while for the final adoption of any change, a majority of two-thirds has been requisite; alternative renderings strongly though not decisively supported being placed in the margin.

The sessions have been monthly, ten in each year, each for four days of about seven hours. During somewhat more than ten years, therefore, 412 meetings have been held; corresponding thus to about a year and a quarter of working days, to say nothing of the time given to private study in connection with the work, and in preparation for the meetings. On the thirteenth of December, 1878, the Second Revision was closed; and this again drew from Dean Bickersteth a graceful sonnet:

"Propitious hour! in which we saw with joy
Our hopes well nigh fulfilled, the approaching end
Of nearly nine years' toil. The Almighty Friend
Has blessed our work and given us to enjoy
His Peace throughout this dignified employ.
His Love has been our banner on our road!
His Truth has led us, Truth without alloy!
Therefore we knelt and humbly thanked our God.
Glory to God! for He our minds has taught
To shed some rays of light which He has given
Upon the abiding Word which came from heaven;
Contented we, if through our careful thought
These living waters henceforth flow more clear,
The longing soul to satisfy and cheer."

It so happened that December the 13th is Dean Stanley's birthday, and on receiving the above sonnet, he sent the following charming reply:

"When dark December's days had reached thirteen,
Heaven's light first dawned upon a future Dean.
What seer could in that far-off year have guessed
How his grey age would on that day be blessed?
A gift to grace with more than gold or gem
The chamber of his own Jerusalem,
By the skilled hands of kindest friendship wrought,
Through nine long years of labour and of thought;—
On its bright face forgotten splendours shine;
Though old, yet new, though human, yet Divine!"*

Another year was still to elapse before the completion of the work; not only for those final touches on which supreme excellence depends, but for full and deliberate intercommunication with the American company, which had been working almost through the whole period upon the same lines. So early as August, 1870, Dr. Angus, then in New York, had been authorised by a letter from the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, to open negotiations for the formation of an American Committee of Revision. Not until the latter part of the next year were the two companies fully organised, very much on the English plan; the first meeting for the arrangement of preliminaries being held December 7th, 1871; the first for active work, October 4th, 1872. The companies include names of world-wide fame as Biblical scholars and theologians, Dr. Philip Schaff having been throughout the leading representative in communication with the British revisers. As might be expected, there has been much friendly discussion between the two countries, not so much, perhaps, on directly critical matters as on minutiæ of style and expression. All these points have, however, been satisfactorily settled, the two companies in some few cases "agreeing to differ;" and not the least of the achievements connected with this great work will have been the adoption on both sides of the Atlantic after a century of national separation, of this one book—the standard at once of language and of faith—for English-speaking people throughout the world.

Of the new bond of concord thus instituted between Christians of almost every name, it is needless now to speak. Whether the Revised New Testament be speedily adopted or not for common worship matters comparatively little. It is in the preparation of the work, far more than in the circumstances of its first diffusion, that the sublime possibilities of Christian unity appear. It is impossible that the members of the New Testament Company should go their several ways without a greater mutual respect, a deepened mutual trust; and though the old controversies are sure to reappear, fortified on either side by texts from the Revised New Testament, a proof will at least have been given to the world that no diversity of opinion has prevented Christian men from hearty co-operation in ascertaining the uncorrupt text and the simple meaning of Scripture. And so, before a line of it can be publicly read, the Book has already taught the world its greatest lesson.

THE ADVENTURES OF RUPERT LONG.

BY THE REV. H. J. BROWNE, B.A.

CHAPTER I. — DIEPPE PIER.

IT was blowing a gale in the Channel, and the waves were beating boisterously against the end of the Dieppe pier. A few adventurous spirits were clustered around the little lighthouse which stands on one side of the entrance to the harbour, to watch the wild grandeur of the sea in this her angry mood; and truly it was a sight worth seeing, the breakers near at hand, and the vast ever-moving floor beyond, across which the foam was being blown, like so much chaff before the wind. Nearer in, towards the town, a group of women were kneeling at the foot of the lofty crucifix, which presents so conspicuous an object to the traveller entering Dieppe harbour. These were praying for husbands, fathers, and brothers in peril on the sea.

The Newhaven steamer had long been expected, but it caused no surprise that her arrival should be so much more tardy than usual, considering the state of the weather. The usual knot of officials, idlers, and employés were waiting for her; the same little crowd that always meets us on our landing in these parts, the important gendarme, the inquisitive douanier, a few slovenly soldiers of the line, with their hands in the pockets of their red trousers, and a contingent of swarthy mariners from the "Pollet," in blue jerseys and heavy boots.

"How now, Monsieur Anglais?" observed a somewhat pompous gendarme to a shabbily-dressed but bright and intelligent-looking lad, whose general appearance bore evidence of English extraction; "how comes it that you are idling here, instead of being busily employed in the workshop of Monsieur Lecroix?"

The lad thus addressed blushed slightly and then replied, "All the world knows, Monsieur Pompon, that the ivory trade is bad at this time of the year, and that the last order from Paris has been finished. Besides," added he in a lower tone to himself, "there is never much work to be given to English workmen and Protestants."

"But what is it that you expect to do here?" enquired the gendarme, still eyeing the lad suspiciously, and with that show of authority in which all classes of French officials seem so much to delight.

"I simply wish, monsieur, to earn a few sous," replied the boy, moving away from the gendarme and trying to penetrate further through the little crowd on the landing-stage.

The expectant throng were not destined to wait much longer. The semaphore at the harbour's mouth indicated the near approach of the steamer.

To enter was by no means an easy task in such a sea, in spite of the skill and experience of the commander. The passage is narrow, and the ever-moving tide threatened at every moment to sweep the vessel with resistless violence against the stony barriers on either side. A cable was, however, soon attached to the steamer, and even the women left their devotions at the foot of the crucifix to give the assistance of their brawny arms and sturdy frames in pulling the vessel into calmer waters.

The usual pale and weary-looking travellers appeared on the deck as the vessel was being made fast to the landing-stage; and the English lad looked anxiously down upon them, to see if any of them were likely to need his assistance. Scarcely was the connecting plank thrown across to the steamer than an eager rush began; gentlemen with rugs and carpet-bags, and ladies with baskets and children, all pushed together, and all anxious to be the first to quit the wave-tossed vessel, the captain, now that his anxiety was over, looking on unconcernedly from his paddle-box at the impatience of his passengers to leave him.

"Do you want any one to help you, sir?" asked the lad repeatedly of the passing travellers, till at last he met with a response from a tall and pale-looking clergyman, who was crossing the plank with rather feeble steps.

"Ah, an English lad, the very thing I want, to carry this bag for me through the douane," replied the clergyman, with a kindly smile as he handed a somewhat heavy carpet bag over to our young friend.

The process of examination did not take so long as usual, owing to the alertness of the bearer of the carpet-bag in securing a good and prominent position on the examining counter. There being nothing to "declare" the usual chalk hieroglyphics were hastily made upon it, and the clergyman and his young companion quickly found themselves in the street outside.

"Can you show me the way to the Hotel des Postes?" asked the gentleman, looking about him in a somewhat bewildered way, at the numerous white-curtained cafés which line the sides of the Quai de Henri Quatre.

"Certainly, sir," answered the boy; "if you will be so good as to follow me this way down the Grande Rue."

The clergyman slowly followed his guide over the rough stones of the trottoir, Monsieur Pompon, the gendarme, still looking suspiciously after the lad as if he would throw some difficulty in the way if that were possible.

The traveller was evidently wearied with his journey. His naturally kind and pleasant countenance seemed as if it had been clouded by overwork and illness. But now that he had found his feet safe on terra firma his spirits seemed to revive, and he began to give his young companion some kindly looks of interest. And truly the lad's features were such as anyone might have gazed upon with pleasure, for besides those natural advantages, which a clear bright complexion, blue eyes, and curly auburn hair are supposed to contribute, these were lighted up with looks of intelligence which invited sympathy and conversation.

The numerous ivory shops that adorn almost every street in this quaint old town did not fail to attract the traveller's attention, and the clergyman soon found that he had in the lad an intelligent authority in all the mysteries of the most beautiful art of ivory carving.

"Ah, what a masterpiece!" observed the clergyman, pausing for a moment before a beautifully-carved group displayed in a shop window, representing Faust and Marguerite; in which the artist (for such he might truly be called) while he had not failed to do justice to the German magician's mysterious features, seemed to have devoted his softest and most skilful touches to the graceful form and innocent countenance of the German maiden.

"Yes, sir," replied the boy, in answer to his companion's involuntary expression of admiration, and gazing upon the group as if on the countenance of an old friend. "It took Monsieur Collette a whole winter to carve that. We always said how fortunate he was in having such a piece of ivory for the work."

"Then you know the workman who carved that group?"

"Yes, sir, Monsieur Collette is a Protestant, and I worked in his shop. It is Mademoiselle Christine who is Marguerite. Mademoiselle Christine is Monsieur Collette's niece, and he carved the figure from her, but we all said it was not beautiful enough."

"And where does Monsieur Collette work?" enquired the clergyman.

"He is gone to London, sir. Monsieur Lecroix owned that he was the best workman in the trade, but it is not so easy for Protestant workmen to get on as others here."

"And are you employed in any ivory shop yourself?"

"I was sir, but trade is bad, and they do not care to give me work."

"Ah, that is why you met us at the steamer," continued the clergyman. "And have you no friends in France, no parents or relatives?"

"I have a mother, sir, but she is very ill. My name is Long—Rupert Long; we live in the Rue des Maillots, numero 27 on the fourth étage."

"Well, if I have time to-morrow, I think I must try to find you out. I am going to the South of France. I have been very ill—but come, show me the way to the Hotel des Postes."

"Here it is, sir," said the boy, carrying the clergyman's luggage up the carpetless stairs to the room which the bowing landlord indicated.

CHAPTER II.—NUMERO 27, RUE DES MAILLOTS.

The town of Dieppe, busy seaport that it still is, presents many evidences of having been a more important and affluent place in days gone by.

The beautiful art of ivory sculpture, which is carried on here, is a vestige of the African trade which at one time poured its treasures through the narrow portals of this safest of French harbours. The vast and stately mansions to be found in the back streets, and which seem almost to be without limit in their extent, to him who explores them afford additional indications of the wealth of the early Dieppe merchants. The place has changed its character and the ordinary traveller sees but the fanciful hotels and pensions on the plage—the summer resort of Parisian bathers—but the old mansions in the back streets of the town still remain.

Picking his way over the rough stones and enquiring of the jersey-clad sailors and white-capped workwomen of the cigar factory for the Rue des Maillots, our traveller of yesterday found himself at length at the door of a large and gloomy mansion, within a stone's-throw of the grand old cathedral of Saint Jacques.

"Numero 27, fourth étage," said the clergyman to himself, as he prepared to ascend the dark staircase; "I think that was the address."

The first story was occupied by a blanchisseuse, the numerous achievements of whose art were hanging about conspicuously at the open doors and windows of the apartment. On the second a tailor was located, and on the third there were to be seen through the open door of a workshop, several men and boys filing pieces of ivory, and surrounded by plaster casts of all shapes and sizes. On the fourth landing-stage the clergyman was confronted by a very rough and shaggy dog, of the terrier type, who sat immovably staring at the intruder, and who returned his proffers of friendship and an attempt at a caress only by a solemn growl.

Venturing to pass this somewhat unsympathetic guardian of the étage, the visitor knocked at the door of an apartment, which was immediately opened by the young English lad whose acquaintance the reader has already made.

"Good morning, my boy," said the clergyman entering the apartment; "you see I have kept my word, and am come to see you. Is that your dog outside, that keeps such solemn watch over your home?"

"Yes, sir," answered the boy, "that is our dog; we call him Bruno. Perhaps he growled and looked as if he wasn't glad to see you, but that's only because he doesn't care to do himself justice now. He was a very different dog, sir, when Mademoiselle Christine was here—Mademoiselle Christine, Monsieur Collette's niece. He belonged to her, but she went away to England with her uncle, and she could not take Bruno with her. So she left him to me, because she thought I would take care of him, and because I knew what kind of a dog he had been."

"Well," said the clergyman smiling, "I daresay you don't blame him for remembering his mistress; but let me see how your mother is."

The visitor now advanced farther into the room, and found to his surprise, lying on a very poor but neat bed, a really beautiful and refined-looking English woman. She was indeed only a shadow of what she once must have been, for the practised eye of the clergyman at once detected the ravages of consumption.

"I thought, my friend," said the minister, kindly, "that the visit of an English clergyman might be a comfort to you in this foreign land."

A flush passed over the delicate features, as the invalid gave utterance to a few heartfelt words of thanks. Whilst Rupert now left the room, on some errand for his mother, the clergyman sat down by the bedside and began to speak such words of comfort as his experience seemed to prompt. The sufferer's answers, whilst they convinced him that she had long been in the possession of the truth, both surprised him because of the clear intellect which they revealed, but also because they seemed to indicate that there had been some hidden sorrow, which had long burdened the heart and clouded what ought to have been bright and happy days.

By degrees the skilful pastor seemed to gain the invalid's confidence, and in accordance with his kind and sympathizing invitation, the young Englishwoman commenced to tell him her sorrowful story. That story was often interrupted by her racking cough, but the facts, as the clergyman gathered, were briefly these.

Mary Long, for that was the invalid's name, had removed thither. But, in quitting his native land, he did not leave his old habits behind him. At last, through bad company and drink, he had drifted into smuggling transactions and become a suspected character. Soon a terrible calamity fell upon Mary Long and her unconscious babe. There had been a fierce encounter between a coastguard and two smugglers at a seaside village near the town. The coastguard was left dead upon the shore with a bullet through his heart, and Richard Long was been deceived in the man who sought her love fifteen years before, and whom she had married in the confiding trustfulness of early womanhood.

From a good position in life, he had gradually sunk lower and lower, until it became necessary for him to support himself and his wife by the labour of his hands. There was one talent which Richard Long possessed in an eminent degree, that was skill in ivory carving. An opening for his abilities had been offered in Dieppe, and he and his wife had searched for everywhere, as the supposed murderer.

But he could nowhere be found, except that, after three stormy days, a boat was cast up upon the beach, bottom upwards, to which was attached some article of his clothing. When it was known that the murderer had thus met with a watery grave, the excitement gradually diminished, although suspicion was for a time attached to a gendarme named Pompon, as his probable accomplice, in consequence of evidence which Mary Long had been obliged to give of frequent mysterious conversations between the two men. But this was not considered sufficient proof of Pompon's guilt.

For the first few years of her widowhood Mary Long had been supported by remittances from a somewhat harsh and unsympathising father in England, but subsequently on his death she had become dependent on her own exertions, and earned a scanty livelihood by lace-making and needlework. But it was a sad life for this cultivated and high-principled young Englishwoman; and by degrees hardship and a life shadowed by a sad reproach, had done their work and laid her on a bed from which she knew she could not hope to rise.

"Ah that is a sad story," said the clegyman with tear-moistened eyes, "but do you not think that God may have sent me at last, a minister from your own land, to offer you words of sympathy and consolation?"

"Oh yes, sir," said the sufferer softly, closing her eyes, as if to summon up old familiar memories, "a voice from dear old England with a message of comfort from dear old England's God."

"Let me then read to you a few words out of dear old England's Bible," said the minister gently, and then he read slowly and with a subdued voice those ever-memorable words of comfort and invitation: "'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For My yoke is easy, and My burden is light.'" The clergyman added a few words of exhortation and then closed his Bible, kneeling down by the bedside. Rupert, who had returned, knelt reverently too, and added a fervent "Amen" to the minister's petitions. Mary Long's lips moved silently, pleading not merely for herself but for her boy whom she was leaving behind.

These travellers on life's journey, assembled by such an apparent accident, were agreeing together as touching anything they should ask—a simple meeting, with simple surroundings, but if there be a word of truth in that Book which they had been reading, they had not met nor prayed together in vain.

"I fear I must not stay longer," said the clergyman, looking at his watch. "Should you like," he added turning to Rupert, "to have this book from which I have been reading to your mother?" and taking a pen and ink from a little table which, with a bouquet of flowers, stood close by the bed, he wrote in it—"Rupert Long; the gift of a friend." In a moment more, having placed a little money in the boy's hands, he was hurrying down the stairs to be in time for the Paris express.

Mrs. Long did not survive the stranger's visit many days. Her bodily strength rapidly declined, but her spirits seemed to rise as she drew nearer the realisation of those blessed hopes with which the minister had filled her mind. When she grew too weak to read it herself, she would often ask Rupert to take the Bible and repeat to her once more those gracious words of invitation to the weary and heavy laden. Thus the boy got to know the words by heart, and would always turn to them of his own accord.

The end was not so mournful as might have been expected. The atmosphere of rest seemed to have entered the poor chamber, and left a smile upon the dead mother's face. She had left her boy to God.

One or two of the neighbours followed the humble procession up to the quiet cemetery above the town, for there are kind hearts in most lands, and left their immortelles on the poor Englishwoman's grave.

THE MASTER AND HIS SLAVES.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D., MANCHESTER.

"Denying the Lord that bought them."—2 Peter ii. 1.

THERE were three great stains on the civilisation of the world into which Christianity came: war, the position of woman, and slavery. With the two first of these we have nothing to do at present, but the relation of the New Testament to the last of these great evils naturally connects itself with the words before us. That relation is at first sight very singular. There can be no doubt that the atrocious system of slavery is utterly irreconcilable with the principles and spirit of the Gospel. It dies in the light of Christianity, like some foul fungus that can only grow in the dark. And yet there is not a word of condemnation of it in the book. The writers of the New Testament found that evil institution, which makes the slaves chattels and the masters fiends, in full force, and they said nothing against it. Paul recognises it in several of his letters, regulates it, gives counsels to Christians standing to each other in the extraordinary relation of owner and slave; sends back the runaway Onesimus to his master, and shows no consciousness of the revolutionary force of his own words, "In Christ Jesus there is neither bond nor free." Whether he foresaw the effect of the gospel in breaking every yoke or no, the fact remains that Christianity at its beginning ran no tilt against even the most execrable social iniquities, but was guided by the wisdom which said, "Make the tree good, and its fruit good." The only way to mend institutions is by mending individuals. Elevate the tone of society by lifting the moral nature of the units, and evil things will drop away and become impossible. Other ways are revolutionary, and imperfect.

In like manner, this same wicked thing, slavery, is used as an illustration of the highest, sacredest, noblest relationship possible to men—their submission to Jesus Christ. With all its vileness, it is still not too vile to be lifted from the mud, and to stand as a picture of the purest and loftiest tie that can bind the soul. The apostles glory in calling themselves "slaves of Jesus Christ." That title of honour heads each epistle. And here in this text we have the same figure expressed with Peter's own energy, and carried out in detail. The word in our text for "Lord," is an unusual one, selected to put the idea in the roughest, most absolute form. It is the root of our word "despot," and conveys, at any rate, the notion of unlimited, irresponsible authority. We might read "owner" with some approach to the force of the word.

Nor is this all. One of the worst and ugliest features of slavery is that of the market, where men and women and children are sold like cattle. And that has its parallel too, for this Owner has bought men for his.

Nor is this all; for, as there are fugitive slaves, who "break away every man from his master," and when questioned will not acknowledge that they are his, so men flee from this Lord and owner, and by words and deeds assert that they owe Him no obedience, and were never in bondage to Him.

So, then, there are these three points brought out in the words before us: Christ's absolute ownership of men; the purchase on which it depends; and the fugitives who deny his authority.

I. The strong expression of the text asserts Christ's absolute ownership. If a word had been sought to convey the hardest possible representation of irresponsible unlimited authority, bound by no law but its own will, the word in our text would have been chosen. Such authority can never be really exercised by men over men. For thought and will are ever free. To claim it would be blasphemy, to allow it would be degradation. But such an authority, in comparison with which the most absolute that man can exercise over man is slight and superficial, this peasant of Nazareth claims, and not in vain. Proud hearts have bowed to his authority, and through the centuries the whole being of thousands upon thousands has gloried in submission—utter and all-embracing to Him. "What manner of man is this," it was said of old, "that even the winds and the sea obey Him?" But the question opens a deeper depth of wonder, and a higher stretch of power: "What manner of man is this that even the hearts and wills of men obey Him?" His autocratic lips spake, and it was done, when He was here on earth, rebuking disease, and it fled; the wild storm, and there was a great calm; demons, and they came out; death itself, and its dull cold ear heard, and Lazarus came forth. To material things and forces He spoke as their great Imperator and commander, saying to this one "Go," and he went, and claiming his Divinity, as even the pagan centurion had learned, by the power of his word, the bare utterance of his will.

But His rule in the region of man's spirit is as absolute and authoritative, and there too "His word is with power." The correlative of Christ's ownership is our entire submission of will, our complete acceptance of the law of his lips, our practical recognition that we are not our own. Loyola demanded from his black-robed militia, obedience to the general of the order so complete that they were to be "just like a corpse," or "a staff in a blind man's hand." Such a requirement made by a man is of course the crushing of the will, and the emasculation of the whole nature. But such a demand yielded to from Christ is the vitalising of the will and the ennobling of the spirit. To give myself up to Him is to become not "like a corpse"—but to be as alive from the dead. We then first find our lives when we surrender them to Him.

The owner of the slave could set him to any work he thought fit. So our Owner gives all His slaves their several tasks. As in some despotic eastern monarchies, the sultan's mere pleasure makes of one slave his vizier, and of another his slipper-bearer, our King chooses one man to a post of honour, and another to a lowly place; and none have a right to question the allocation of work. What corresponds on our parts to that sovereign freedom of appointment? Cheerful acceptance of our task, whatever it be. What does it matter whether we are set to do things which the vulgar world calls "great," or things which the blind world calls "small?" They are equally set us by Him, to whom all service is alike that is done from the same motive, and all that we need care about is to give glad obedience and unmurmuring honest work. Nobody knows what is important service, and what not. We have to wait till another day far ahead, before we can tell that. All work that contributes to a great end is great, as the old rhyme has it "for the want of a nail a kingdom was lost." So, whatever our tasks, let us say, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

The slave's hut, and little patch of garden ground, and few bits of furniture, whose were they—his or his master's? If he was not his own, nothing else could be his own. And whose are our possessions? If we have no property in ourselves, still less can we have property in our property. These things were His before, and are His still. The first claim on them is our Master's, not ours. We have not the right to do what we like with our own. So, if we rightly understand our position, we shall feel that we are trustees, not possessors. When, like prodigal sons, we "waste our substance," we are unfaithful stewards also, "wasting our Lord's goods."

Such absolute submission of will, and recognition of Christ's absolute authority over us, our destiny, work, and possessions, is ennobling and blessed. So to bow before a man would be degrading were it possible, but so to bow before Him is our highest honour, and liberates us from all other submission. The king's servant is every other person's master. We learn from historians that the origin of nobility in some Teutonic nations is supposed to have been the dignities enjoyed by the king's household—of which you find traces still. The king's master of the horse, or chamberlain, or cupbearer becomes noble. Christ's servants are lords, free because they serve Him, noble because they wear his livery and bear the mark of Jesus as their Lord.

II. The text brings into view the purchase on which that ownership is founded.

This master has acquired men by right of purchase. That abomination of the auction block may suggest the better "merchandise of the souls of men," which Christ has made, when He bought us with his own blood as our ransom.

That purchase is represented in two forms of expression. Sometimes we read that He has bought us with his "blood;" sometimes that He has given "himself" for us. Both expressions point to the same great fact—his death as the price at which He has acquired us as his own.

There are far deeper thoughts involved in this statement than can be dealt with here, but let me note one or two plain points. First, then, that is a very beautiful and profound one, that Christ's Lordship over men is built upon his mighty and supreme sacrifice for men. Nothing short of his utter giving up of himself for them gives Him the right of absolute authority over them; or, as Paul puts it, "He gave himself for us," that He might "purchase for himself a people." He does not found his kingdom on his Divinity, but on his suffering. His cross is his throne. It seems to me that the recognition of Christ's death as our ransom is absolutely essential to warrant the submission to Him which is the very heart of Christianity. I do not know why any man who rejects that view of the death of Christ should call to Him, "Lord! Lord!" We are justified in saying to Him, "O Lord, truly I am Thy servant," only when we can go on to say, "Thou hast loosed my bonds."

Then, consider that the figure suggests that we are bought from a previous slavery to some other master. Free men are not sold into slavery, but slaves pass from one master to another, and sometimes are bought into freedom, as well as into bondage. Hebrew slavery was a very different thing from Roman or American slavery—but such as it was, there was connected with it that peculiar institution of the Goel, by which, under certain circumstances, if an Israelite had sold himself into slavery, he could be redeemed. As the law has it, "One of his kinsmen may redeem him." So our Kinsman buys us back from our bondage to sin and guilt and condemnation, from the slavery of our tyrant lusts, from the slavery to men's censures and opinions, from the dominion of evil and darkness, and making us His, makes us free. He that committeth sin is the slave of sin. If the Son therefore make you free, ye shall be free indeed.

III. Our text also brings to view the Runaways. We do not care to enquire here what special type of heretics the apostle had in view in these solemn words, nor to apply them to modern parallels which we may fancy we can find. It is more profitable to notice how all godlessness and sin may be described as denying the Lord. All sin, I say, for it would appear very plain that the people spoken of here were not Christians at all, and yet the apostle believes that Christ had bought them by his sacrifice, and so had a right over them, which their conduct and their words equally denied.

How eloquent that word "denying" is on Peter's lips. Did the old man travel back in memory to that cold morning, when he was shivering beside the coal-fire in the high-priest's palace, and a flippant serving-maid could frighten him into lying? Is it not touching to notice that he describes the very worst aspect of the sin of these people in the words that recall his own? It is as if he were humbly acknowledging that no rebellion could be worse than his, and were renewing again his penitence and bitter weeping after all those years.

All sin is a denial of Christ's authority. It is in effect saying, "We will not have this man to reign over us." It is at bottom the uprising of our own self-will against his rule, and the proud assertion of our own independence. It is as foolish as it is ungrateful, as ungrateful as it is foolish.

That denial is made by deeds which are done in defiance or neglect of his authority, and it is done too by words and opinions. It is not for us to bring such a grave charge against individuals, but at least we may exhort our readers to beware of all forms of teaching which weaken Christ's absolute authority, or which remove the very foundation of his throne by weakening the power and meaning of his sacrifice.

Finally, let us beware lest the fate of many a runaway slave be ours, and we be lost in trackless bogs and perish miserably. Casting off his yoke is sure to end in ruin. Rather, drawn by the cords of love, and owning the blessed bonds in which willing souls are held by the love of Christ, let us take Him for our Lord, who has given himself for our ransom, and answer the pleading of his cross with our glad surrender. Then shall He say, "I call you not servants but friends."

MY BOYHOOD IN THE EAST.

CHAPTER II.—THE NEGLECTED TRACT.

PENANG lies in latitude 5° 16′ north of the equator. Although the morning and evening breezes are as constant as the rising and setting of the sun, and soft zephyrs seem to be ever breathing over the seas and the hills, the rays of the sun are vertical, causing the temperature on the plains (notwithstanding these compensations) to range in the shade from 80° to 90°. It will be obvious, therefore, that for some hours of every day it is dangerous to be exposed to the sun. But, with true boy-nature, in spite of all warnings and prohibitions, it was my delight in holiday times to be out the whole day. And at last the terrible penalty came. I received a sunstroke, and was brought home utterly unconscious, or as it was often described "like a log of wood," and thus lay for days, to awake in a state of wild delirium. My condition may be imagined when I say that my scalp was five times covered with caustic, that I was bled by the lancet six times, besides leeches, and ordinary blisters, and drams of physic. Never was human life more awfully shaken over the mouth of the grave. Such was the effect that when on slowly recovering, I was first seen by an intimate friend of the household, so ghastly was the sight that she fainted away. Surely, thought all the dear ones around the couch, this life, thus marvellously preserved, will begin its new era by consecration to the Eternal Father of our mercies.

As soon as able to be removed the sick lad was carried to one of the peaks of the hills already referred to. How vividly he can recall every incident and scene of that memorable journey! The cot on which he lay, the four "coolies" who bore him, the delicious shade of the dense woods, the air cooling with every step of the ascent, reaching the plantations of spice trees: the clove with its leathery shining leaves, purple berries, and brown buds (a fragile-looking evergeen, but known sometimes to bear fruit or rather flower, the clove of commerce, for a hundred-and-fifty years), and the handsome nutmeg, with rich laurel-like leaves, blossoms like the lily of the valley, and yellow fruit with bursting rind exposing to view the brown kernel nut coated with its thick blood-red flaky mace, —and finally the "Convalescent Bungalow," having a huge domed black rock in front, and precipitous slopes around covered with mighty ferns, splendid orchids, aromatic shrubs, wild pineapples, and creeping and climbing plants, weaving with their gay flowers garlands of fantastic beauty. How many stricken and sinking men have blessed God for these hills! The thermometer here often stands at 62° and averages about 70° so that the idea of ice became comprehensible by the sight of frozen oil, and cold could be imagined as natives shivered in the dark dewy evening, and wrapped themselves in blankets. Often did I see this as I approached them with my bladder lantern filled with fireflies caught in my twilight gambols. Health soon came back, and with it hours of wandering amid the scenes of luxuriant life. The boy never tired of cutting feathery bamboos, chasing butterflies of golden colours, and moths of every size and hue, watching kingfishers at the frequent pools and springs, searching for nests of birds of brilliant plumage, setting scorpions to fight (the island is famous for them), and especially was he delighted by the antics of monkeys and baboons bounding from branch to branch of the leviathan trees, grinning, chattering, quarrelling and throwing nuts about. One day, I remember I saw a monkey shot. What a human cry did it raise when struck, and even more terribly human did it look as it tried in falling to catch bough after bough, and at length lay at our feet moaning and bleeding from the mouth—a sight that even now makes my heart ache. Shall I confess it? No pastime in those days was so unfailing in interest as amateur cookery. To find a shady nook by a tiny rill and put together three boulders; and gather sticks and leaves and set them alight (kindling the fire by flint and steel, and keeping it up was the chief trouble), fill a small earthen pot with rice and water from the brook, and watch the boiling, and stir the contents, and skim off the bubbling scum, and at the same time bake on heated stones some wild plantains, and when ready serve the rice and fruit on plantain leaves to any guest I could invite, old or young, black or white,—this was a daily and triumphant joy!

But was there to be no recollection of the danger just passed and of the merciful God who had wrought deliverance, no thanksgivings, and resolutions and prayers? In the devout hope that there would be all this, a fond father had sent up with his petted lad, a few narrative tracts (published by the Religious Tract Society), thinking that the hour might come, when resting from the rambles and gambols of renewed health, there would be inclination for some such reading. Never were prayers more fervent offered than for his recovery, and that the recovery might be full of spiritual blessing. Even the many Mohammedan friends of the household gathered at the tombs of eminent saints, with offerings of rice and fruit, to present and beseech intercessions for the preservation of the threatened life. Were none of the "fervent" prayers to prove "effectual"? The tracts were never read by him for whom they were intended. So far from this, as soon as they were found they were consigned to a neglected drawer, in a rickety table, in one of the rooms of the bungalow, and utterly forgotten. There they remained when the youth, now fully restored, left for his home on the plains.

But while I was on the heights enjoying the unspeakable delights of rapid convalescence, down below there was stricken to his bed by jungle fever, a young artillery officer who occupied quarters in the little fort. He was from Ireland and had probably received religious instruction in his early youth. But here, in the alluring climate, he became the gayest of the gay, and soon passed into the wildest extravagance of folly and sin. I believe I am writing the simple truth when I describe him as of violent temper, profane, and dissipated. Arrested by raging fever he too was brought to the brink of the grave. And he, too, was delivered, and carried to the "Convalescent Bungalow." And here in his hours of quiet ease, seeking occupation, he lighted upon the neglected tracts, was spiritually aroused, sent for the thoughtful father whose name he found with them, and under his guidance found rest and joy in Christ. On his return it was soon seen that he was as truly changed as was Saul the blasphemer and persecutor when he became the consecrated servant of the Lord who called to him. The last I can remember of the young lieutenant was that he had sold his commission, and become a minister of the Church of England.

But were the prayers for the sick boy not answered? Let the reader judge. Soon after the return of the officer he and a brother in arms and the boy's father, the faithful friend of both, were sitting together one evening on a lawn, while the boy was running about among the flowers and shrubs which surrounded them. They were speaking of the evil of sin and the love of Christ, and the confessions and declarations of the young officer were overheard by him, entered his very heart, and that evening when he got home he sought his beloved mother, and with tears besought her to help him to pray. How well he remembers her prayer at his side, and that he afterwards knelt alone and uttered aloud, as descriptive of his own state and expressing his desires the prayer in Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," entitled, "The meditation of a sinner who begins to be awakened."

"In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good" (Eccles. xi. 6)

Comfortable Words.

THERE is no human heart but hath desired
Something at times beyond life's petty quest,
Beyond its daily round; we are so tired,
So hungering for comfort and for rest;
We see with envious eyes the children pressed
In ready arms that soothe their childish woe;
Oh! that we, too, upon a mother's breast
Such all-sufficient love again might know.

But what if, while these hidden longings haunt
Earth's restless denizens from age to age,
Filled with self pity at a fancied want
They spurn a greater love than they can gauge,
Nor pause to gather from the sacred page
The comfortable words for their relief,
The tidings meant all trial to assuage,
The covenants that are as balm to grief?

'Tis strange, 'tis passing strange, we can repine,
And slight the voice which would our craving feed;
We laugh to scorn the man that hath a mine
Of wealth untouched, if poverty he plead;
Yet—righteous judges—do the like, who heed
So little what Himself, our Maker, saith,
With gracious words waiting upon our need,
"I, even I, am He that comforteth."

FEBRUARY 27.

JESUS HEALING THE SICK. (LUKE v. 12–26.)

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 17.—'And the power of the Lord was present to heal them.'

CONNECTION.—Our Lord, leaving Nazareth, took up His abode at Capernaum, making this city the head-quarters of His Galilean ministry, and thus 'exalting it to heaven,' ch. x. 15. Here He called His first four apostles. Whether the completion of the number of the Twelve and the Sermon on the Mount preceded the cure of the Leper, related in to-day's Lesson, is one of the unsolved questions of the Gospel Harmony. From Matthew's account, ch. viii. 1, 2, it would seem that this cure was wrought 'when Jesus came down from the Mount,' and yet this is by no means certain, as Matt. viii. ix. record a group of miracles without strict regard to chronological events.

I. A LEPER HEALED.—Read vers. 12–16. We cannot tell what this certain city was. If we place this miracle (see above) after the Sermon on the Mount, the place would probably be the village of Hattîn at the foot of the "Mount of Beatitudes." Behold a man—as if he sprang up suddenly before the little company, from some roadside, or street corner, where he had been grovelling in his humiliation. Full of leprosy—the most loathsome of diseases, eating away the body by slow corruption—regarded as a proof of Divine anger, and the most expressive type of sin. The leper was an outcast, compelled to live apart from human fellowship—bidden to cover part of his face when he went abroad, and when he saw any one approaching to cry with a loud voice, Unclean, unclean! Note the strength and simplicity of the man's faith. The annals of Israel had no record of a leper cured by miracle since the days of Naaman (2 Kings v. 1–14). Yet could not Jesus do even this? The Evangelists combine to represent the eager passion of the man's appeal: Matt., 'the leper worshipped Him'; Mark (i. 40), 'beseeching Him, and kneeling down to Him': here, fell on his face and besought Him. The entreaty is echoed in the answer: here the words in all three are the same:

If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean.
I will—be Thou clean!

Moreover, in saying this, Jesus put forth His hand and touched him—gloriously transgressing the letter of the Law, but true to its spirit of love! The manner of the miracle was thus as gracious as the deed itself was mighty. The whole is a type of human sin and Divine pardon—the corruption of guilt (leprosy was hereditary)—its loathsomeness—incurableness by human remedy, need of simple faith in Him who 'will' and 'can' (He will, for He is love; He can, for He has made atonement). Christ's instant response—His 'touching' our humanity by taking it upon Himself (Heb. ii. 16, 'taketh hold on the seed of Abraham')—and the completeness of His work. The miracles of Christ were parables in act—symbols of a greater salvation. Immediately—this 'living death' vanishing at once before the touch of the Lord of Life! But why was the cured leper to tell no man? (So in ch. viii. 56; Matt. ix. 30.) Partly because of Christ's own work. He did not choose to be prematurely made known (Matt. xii. 16), but purposed by degrees to unfold His own purposes of love. Partly because of the man himself. To some minds it would be unwholesome to bring themselves and their own experiences into public. Silence for a time would be best, even with regard to what God had wrought. Other temperaments would be benefited by the call to speak out ('Go home to thy friends and tell them,' Mark v. 19). Then in this case there may have been a special reason. He was to go to the priest first, in Jerusalem. Perhaps, should the news of the miracle get abroad beforehand, the priest might refuse the certificate out of malice. Offer, etc. The process of declaring a leper clean was very prolonged, costly and elaborate, requiring a whole week for its completion. Read Lev. xiv. 1–32. For a testimony unto them; i.e., to the priests, that the cure is real. Did the man comply with the injunction? Was his conduct right? He might have said, I must tell what Jesus has done; I cannot help it! Yet he ought to have obeyed. He might not know the Saviour's reasons, but should have trusted Him. The man was ungrateful, not (for the time) to hold his peace! See the result. Great multitudes came; and He was kind to them all! Yet in coming simply to be healed they were in danger of missing His true character. It was as SAVIOUR that He would have men seek Him. But as they crowded around Him chiefly or only for their bodily gain, He withdrew from them into the wilderness (see Mark i. 47), for silent communion with His Father.

II. A PARALYTIC BROUGHT TO CHRIST—Read vers. 17–19. This was in Capernaum (Matt. ix. 1, Mark ii. 1), whither He had once more come from 'the wilderness.' 'It was noised that He was in the house,' Mark, possibly the house of Simon Peter. A great company had gathered, 'insomuch that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door.' The scene was probably the covered central court, from one corner of which, near the door, an outside staircase led to the roof. Note the company gathered. The excitement had now fairly reached the upper classes. Pharisees, now for the first time mentioned by Luke; the 'ritualists' among the Jews. Doctors of the law, Teachers. These might also be Pharisees (Acts v. 34), and were the highest among the Scribes, 'members of the Sanhedrin' (Lightfoot), their business being to expound not only the written but the oral Law. At this stage of our Lord's ministry they had come probably just to see and hear Him, without any definite evil intention. Yet the phrase sitting by seems to separate them from the eager throng, as though they were already out of sympathy with the multitude. From Jerusalem, even, they had travelled to hear the Prophet of Nazareth. It was a time not only of wise and heavenly teaching, but of holy energy. Something showed that a wondrous influence, the Power of the Lord, filled the place. 'The Lord' is here JEHOVAH, the God of Israel, whom these 'Pharisees' worshipped, whose words and will these 'Doctors' spent their lives in expounding. And here He reveals Himself; it was the beginning of the great Manifestation;—'GOD in CHRIST') Isa. xi. 2). To heal them, whom? no doubt the sufferers who sought Christ's aid—not the Pharisees and Doctors, who needed spiritual healing, though they knew it not.

The discourse is strangely interrupted by a noise overhead. [Some Biblical Dictionary should be consulted on the structure of Eastern houses.] Four men (Mark) carrying a mattress, on which lay a helpless paralytic. They had made their way up the outer stair, and had removed a part of the roof. The court would be boarded over with planks, reeds or brushwood being laid on these, and the whole coated outside with mortar, hardening to a concrete which formed the housetop. It would be easy to break through this layer, to remove the planking.

> We have here supposed the ordinary Eastern house of the middle or lower class, of one story, only a covered court opening into small chambers on three sides. If a superior house, two-storied with an open court, we must suppose our Lord to have occupied the large upper room, which with its balcony overlooked the court.

Note the faith of these four men; they were so assured of Christ's power and willingness to heal, that they would take any trouble to bring their friend to Him: their kindheartedness; it was not for themselves that they did all this, but for another: their eagerness; they could not wait until the teaching was over, and the multitude dispersed—the imploring eyes of the poor, helpless one seemed to say, 'Make haste!' and lastly, their ingenuity; if they could not approach the Great Healer in one way, they would in another. True earnestness will find out a way. Can none of us bring our friends to Christ?

III. The Paralytic Forgiven and Healed.—Read vers. 20-26. The first words of Jesus, when He saw their faith (the faith of the paralytic as well as of his friends), were of forgiveness. Why was this? It was for healing that they came. No doubt, as in another case, John v. 14, our Lord saw that there was a connection between the man's infirmity and his sin. All weakness and suffering arise from sin; but not always directly. We cannot trace the connection; the Jews who tried to do so were rebuked (ch. xiii. 1-5; John ix. 2, 3). But He saw how the bitter fruit sprang from the evil seed; and, the better to show His grace, He struck at the cause rather than the effect. See the graciousness of His word to the poor sufferer: 'Son,' Matt., Mark (then the paralytic was probably a youth), 'be of good cheer,' Matt.: Thy sins are, literally, have been, forgiven thee.

The cavils of the Scribes and the Pharisees must here be specially noted, as probably the first utterance against Jesus of the terrible word, Blasphemy! Of this beginning Calvary was the close! Yet was not the principle laid down correct? No one can forgive sins, but God alone. This they had learned from their own Scriptures, Isa. xliii. 25. Their error was in its application; they would not own in Christ the signs which showed His right to speak for God. Jesus perceived their thoughts, their reasonings, either overhearing their muttered words, or by His Divine insight (ch. vi. 8; ix. 47; xi. 17). What was His reply? How should we answer His question? Whether is easier? Only God can do either. But to say, thy sins, etc., is easier than to say, rise up and walk; because, in the latter case, the work can be tested. Everyone can see whether the paralytic rises and walks; no one can see whether sin is forgiven or not. But the one may be inferred from the other. That ye may know that the Son of man hath power. Here is a statement of the design of miracles. Proving the possession of a divine power in the physical realm, they attest it also in the spiritual. And who among those Scribes and Pharisees would not feel that the claim was made good, as the paralytic, suddenly restored, rose up before them from his couch, rolling it up to carry it away? The crowd that had hindered his entrance, would part asunder to let him go, as he departed, with praises on his lips. Note the effect upon every mind. Amazement we can understand, and praise, but why the fear? The presence among them of supernatural power and holiness was awful to them: a revelation by contrast of human unworthiness and sin. And they had called Him a blasphemer! See the cry of Peter, ver. 8; of Isaiah, vi. 5. But as yet the full force of Christ's truth had not reached their hearts. They could get no farther than this: We have seen strange things to-day!

Questions.

1. Show how leprosy is a type of sin, and Christ's healing of forgiveness.

2. Give instances parallel to that in ver. 16 of Christ's preparing Himself for public work by secret prayer.

3. Miracles are called not only wonders and mighty deeds but signs. How is this last designation to be understood?

4. On what chief occasions was our Lord charged with blasphemy?

5. Jesus speaks of Himself as the Son of Man, ver. 24. Show the Biblical use of this phrase, and its connection with the Saviour's work.

THE NEW SCHOLAR.

II.

DAYS and weeks passed by, and Compton was no more looked upon as a new boy. It was soon discovered that he was no dunce; indeed he frequently outdid his elders in the class; but he took his honours very quietly and without the slightest show of exultation. With most of the boys he was a favourite, but not with Stewart, who seemed to look upon him as an enemy. Not that he was afraid that Compton would endeavour to usurp his position, that idea was soon dispelled, but because of what the others had told him about the new boy—as he then was—setting him at defiance.

More than once Stewart had tried to quarrel with him, but as it takes two to make a quarrel, and as Compton declined being one of the two, he had failed in the attempt. Nevertheless he constantly tried to annoy him, and if Compton had not possessed a very even temper, he must have resented his conduct. At length he did speak to him about it, not angrily, but in such a quiet and self-possessed manner as quite to surprise him.

"Why is it, Stewart," he asked, "that you should take a pleasure in trying to annoy me? If I offend you in any way, and you tell me how, I will try not to do so again."

That was enough for Stewart; he thought he saw an opening now through which he could force his long pent-up wrath.

"Didn't you defy me the very first day you were here?" he exclaimed. "Didn't you say you weren't afraid of me, and you would put me down? Put me down indeed, I——"

"Certainly I did not say anything of the sort," interrupted Compton.

"Yes, you did, there is Thompson, and Green, too, and indeed nearly all the class to prove it."

"No one can prove it, Stewart, simply because I did not say it. I think I can tell you what I did say though, if you like to listen."

"Yes, I will listen, but I know you set me at defiance."

"When I first came, before I had been here a single day, the boys tried to frighten me about you. They said that you would lead me a dreadful life, because you disliked me on account of some joke having been made about my name. Now I put it to you, Stewart, would it not have been very foolish of me to be frightened about one of whose very existence I was ignorant?"

"Well, but you threatened me, even if you did not know me."

"I did not threaten you. I said I would try and conquer you, and I have been trying ever since, I am trying now; but I am afraid it won't be much good unless you try to conquer yourself."

"What do you mean, Compton?" asked Stewart.

"I mean that you have tried to make me uncomfortable and unhappy, ever since I came here; and I have tried to take it patiently. I have prayed to be able to do so; and not a day has passed but I have prayed for you. I was in hopes that before now I might have conquered you, and you would have seen how badly you were acting, but perhaps I haven't gone the right way to work. I know this, that if you were less easily offended and more forgiving, you would be much happier yourself, and much more agreeable to others."

A good deal more passed between the two boys, little Compton putting plainly and yet kindly before Stewart the folly and sin of his conduct, and begging him for his own sake to try to curb his temper.

Perhaps Stewart had never been more plainly and openly rebuked; he was surprised at Compton's boldness, and he was touched by what he said. Rising suddenly from his seat, he held out his hand, saying,

"You have conquered me, Compton, and with God's help I will try to conquer myself."

It was a hard matter for Charles Stewart to overcome his besetting sin; but striving, as he did, not in his own strength, but in the strength of God, he succeeded; and from being a hasty and unforgiving boy he became patient and generous.

And this change in him was brought about by means of the very lad he had tried to injure and annoy.

Dear young reader, try to remember this: that whatever may be your besetting sin, and however firm a hold it may have upon you, if you pray for grace, and strive earnestly against it, God will give you strength to overcome it. Let your cry ever be, "Create in me a new heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me."

A BENGALI GIRLS' SCHOOL.

THE Bengali Zenana school at L—— was held in a large cool vaulted building (probably the remains of some palace) close to the handsome new native Christian church of the Epiphany. On entering one morning about eleven o'clock, I found twenty or thirty children from the ages of three to eleven assembled on the gallery at the end of the room. Forms were arranged round the rooms for different classes, and pictures, texts, and maps ornamented the walls. An ayah was busy getting out books and work-bags.

The children had all arrived in "doolies" or "palkees" sent round to the different houses to collect them. They were all high-caste Bengali girls, for though often asked to admit little boys, the Zenani Mission ladies find it best to confine their work entirely to the female sex, and there are the schools of other missionary societies for boys. Two or three of the eldest girls would now soon be leaving the school for good, after some eight years' instruction, to pass into the seclusion of their own homes.

Some were very plain, and not very tidy, with dishevelled hair. They wore all sorts of clothes; some only long cotton drawers and a muslin "sari" wound round them; others petticoats and bodices. As with the parents so with the children. Neatness, cleanliness, and fine clothes are not the attributes of high-caste rank or wealth in India. All had, of course, bare feet. Some of the little ones were such quaint little objects, with round, roguish faces, and bright, black, bead-like eyes. One little figure, a new arrival, in an English-shaped red cotton frock, reaching to its toes, amused me very much.

The teachers were an old pundit and his wife. For two hours a day, however, the services of a superior pundit are engaged for the elder girls. An English lady superintends the whole school, spending an hour there every day, and examining the classes every month. A Christian Bengali lady, attached to the mission, devotes herself daily to superintending the needlework.

Christian teaching, such as reading the Bible and singing hymns is the basis of the instruction given, and any parents objecting to it must remove their children. The school was therefore opened by the Lord's Prayer repeated by the children. They then sang Bengali versions of well-known English hymns set to the original tunes. The Bengali language is less harsh than Hindostanee, and "There is a happy Land" and "Shall we gather at the River," sounded very musical, in their foreign dress. The school was then put through various drilling exercises of the infant school type, accompanied by songs and clapping of hands, which seemed to amuse the children, and also to inculcate discipline and dissipate any temporary attack of fidgets.

They then adjourned to the sewing class and exhibited to me the garments and work bags they were sewing, as well as some gay wool-work, which is the favourite employment. They pay for the materials of the work themselves. One elder girl was knitting socks, and showed me a very creditable pair she had just finished. Another was copying from a painted picture an elaborate pair of wool-work slippers. One mite of four was very quick with the wool-work, counting her stitches and crossing them all the right way. Some others were doing patchwork of printed cotton pieces such as we see in old-fashioned cottage quilts. The work appeared to me to be, on an average, quite equal to that of girls of the same age in our elementary schools in England.

In the geography class I next examined, I had an opportunity of judging of the natural ability and quickness of the children. The Bengalis are the most intellectual of the races of India, and these girls exhibited an eagerness, interest, and energy in their lessons, which one would look for in vain among our stolid agricultural or artisan children. Standing in front of the large wall map of the world, with the pundit, dressed in a black cassock and bareheaded, behind them, questions and answers followed each other rapidly from the group. They enumerated and pointed out on the map, the countries of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and the boundaries of each continent. They showed the isthmuses and chains of mountains. They described the route to England, and explained the Suez Canal. They would have done much more, but my time was nearly up, and before leaving I could only glance at their writing. This was in neatly-kept copybooks of the English type.

Nearly all the children paid for their schooling, books, and work materials, as, except in a few rare cases of poverty, the conductors do not like to make the school a charity. The number of enlightened Bengali baboos anxious for their daughters' education is steadily increasing, though at present the attendance is in nothing like proportion to the Bengali inhabitants of the large city of L——. Some are utterly indifferent and send their children irregularly, needing constant domiciliary visits and stirring up. In time, however, as the benefit of education makes itself felt in their homes, the desire for it will increase.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VI.

Once prohibited severely;
Once enjoined by Jesus dearly;
In three words a sentence find,
Binding, loosing all mankind.

1. What is yonder vale of burning?
2. Whither is that dove returning?
3. What is he that wears a crown?
4. Where did Jacob's sons go down?

1. Who by Jacob's God was hated?
2. To what king was Esther mated?
3. Which disciple scarce believed
What his senses first perceived?

1. Who with opened heart attended?
2. With what name was Judas blended?
3. What the tree of Christ the type?
4. Whence those clusters rich and ripe?

From these names and terms official,
Take and join the signs initial;
Then the precept LEARN and DO;
Doubt not Jesus speaks to you!

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

THE ADVENTURES OF RUPERT LONG.

BY THE REV. H. J. BROWNE, B.A.

A TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER III.—A SUPPER AND BED AT THE EXPENSE OF THE STATE.

MADAME DUDONET, a white-capped old lady, who, in company with her cat, sat all day long at the window of the little money-changer's shop on the Quai de Henri Quatre, was the proprietress of the house in the Rue des Maillots, where Rupert and his mother lived. She was not an unkind old lady, although, true to the instincts of her nation, and above all, of her profession, she had an ever-watchful eye to the fluctuations of profit and loss. Madame Dudonet kindly allowed Rupert to remain as long as was necessary in the now lonely apartment, without demanding any rent, which she acknowledged had been regularly enough paid to her in the lifetime of Rupert's mother.

No. 1400.—FEBRUARY 26, 1881.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Mademoiselle Georgette, too, the neat little blanchisseuse, on the ground floor of Numero 27, was very kind to Rupert, as she had been to his mother, and had called him more than once to share in a long roll of bread and coffee.

But the quaint old Norman town, always somewhat lugubrious in its aspect, now looked unspeakably dismal to the poor orphan boy listlessly wandering up and down its rough and dirty streets. It was impossible for Rupert to stay long in the room where he had seen his mother die.

The first day after the funeral was spent in a long ramble on the sea-shore, along the cliffs as far as the lofty lighthouse which nightly flashes its warnings and welcomes far over the inhospitable waves. The morning and afternoon of the second were spent upon the quays in search of chance employment, but in the evening there was nothing for it but purposeless wanderings up and down the dimly-lighted streets.

For a moment, Rupert would listen to the voice of the fish auctioneer as he disposed of that day's harvest to the buyers from Paris; then he would gaze for the hundredth time through the windows of the ivory shops, seeing there many an old acquaintance from Monsieur Collette's workshop—monuments of his former master's handiwork. Then he would pass along some of the less-frequented streets, with their great solemn and silent mansions, with their wondrous courtyard doors, massive and closed to all intruders. Even the portals of Notre Dame des Flottes, from whence Rupert had often seen the good Sister Elizabeth issuing forth at the head of a joyous little band of orphans, in fanciful sailor costumes, were closed to him. Rupert was far too old to be admitted there; besides he was not a sailor's orphan. He might, if he chose, put a sou into the tronc attached to the door, and then pass on; but poor Rupert was an orphan himself and had little to spare for others. What was he to do? Where was he to go? How was he to get away from this dismal old foreign town, with its sad memories.

Rupert was but a lad, and not more thoughtful than others of his own age, and the only resource that seemed to offer itself was to seek for some diversion in his melancholy.

It was the annual fair at Dieppe; that is to say, there were a number of wooden shops (as is the case for a month or two every year) erected in the market-place, under the shadow of the old cathedral. These were brilliantly lighted up in the evening. There were also a few shows and shooting-galleries in the Rue Desmarest, a very wide street, running up from the harbour to the foot of the château which overlooks the town.

It was something to be near these brilliant gas-lights and to hear the music, such as it was, and Rupert soon found himself amongst the sightseers and idlers who were seeking here an evening's entertainment.

The principal crowd was gathered in front of a large circular wooden shed, which had been erected with considerable care at the top of the street. The entrance, which was hung with red curtains, was decorated with a profusion of flags, amongst which the tricolour and the stars and stripes of America were most conspicuous. From within were to be heard the effective, if not very harmonious strains, of a brass band, giving utterance, with the most unflagging perseverance and vehemence, to the oft-repeated melody of the "Pompier de Nanterre." Over the doorway, in dazzling illuminated letters, might be read this inscription: "Grand Cirque Imperial; Duclos, Propriétaire."

In front of this building, with his back to the entrance, and facing, or rather overlooking the crowd, for he seemed to be a head and shoulders above them in stature, was stationed a man, who from his singular appearance immediately attracted Rupert's attention. He wore a wideawake of that peculiar shape which seemed at once to proclaim him as an American, if his sallow complexion, high cheek bones, and the characteristic cut of his beard had not already indicated that as an undoubted fact. Over his shoulders was thrown a long blue cloak, and his feet were encased in large top-boots which reached beyond his knees.

In French which would scarcely be accepted as Parisian, but which was sufficiently correct to be understood by his auditors, this individual was haranguing the gaping crowd with a description of the attractions of his entertainment, and a general invitation to enter at the small individual sacrifice of six sous.

The American, after having given utterance to his harangue, cracked his whip, and looked round him to see what effect his eloquence had made upon the populace.

The crowd had now considerably thickened, raised to a fierce heat of excitement and curiosity by the alluring description of the orator outside, and further inflamed by the vehement utterances of the band from within.

The performance was then evidently going on, and a few pressed forward between the red curtains which concealed this paradise from the vulgar gaze. But the majority seemed to be of that class whom a certain scarcity in the domestic treasury obliged to be contented with the gratuitous amusements of the fair.

Rupert was certainly unwilling in any way to decrease the little all that now remained to him (advanced to him by Madame Dudonet on the poor furniture), which he kept tightly buttoned up in his trouser pockets, and which, after having paid all the expenses attendant on his mother's funeral, he found merely to amount to a few francs. Yet the lad was unable to escape from the scene, owing to the crowd, which now compactly hedged him in.

A French crowd is not the same as an English one. There is indeed less rudeness and less roughness about the former, but then there is less hearty good-humour. The French crowd is more fickle in its moods, and is on that account more to be avoided. It can be very quiet and orderly, but a single word or untoward accident will break it into fury.

Amongst the crowd in which Rupert found himself, there were not a few suspicious-looking characters. These "gentlemen of the pavement" manifested a more marked interest in the entertainment than any others of the crowd of sightseers. Their eagerness was considerable, so much so as to produce an apparent unconsciousness of their actions, and it was not long before, in an absorbing fit of abstraction, the hand of one of them was discovered in the pocket of a neighbour. The neighbour, not being equally absent in mind, was by no means so slow to detect the mistake, and in an instant the cry of "pickpockets" was raised.

A scene of confusion quickly ensued, and a violent scuffle in which Rupert found himself a most unwilling sharer. It was not the interest of the light-fingered fraternity to allow the excitement too soon to subside, and the confusion and uproar increased rather than subsided. Half stunned with the rough treatment to which he was being subjected by his neighbours, and violently pushed from side to side, Rupert suddenly felt his arm arrested by a stronger than his, and looking up, recognised the grim visage of Monsieur Pompon, the gendarme.

"Ha! ha! Monsieur Anglais," exclaimed the pompous official, with a flushed face and a voice which was even more disagreeable than usual; "to vary one's occupation is very pleasant, and when one changes ivory-carving for picking pockets, one often secures a night's lodging for nothing. Come, my friend," he added, hastily securing a pair of handcuffs on Rupert's wrists, "you shall sup and lodge to-night at the expense of the State."

It was in vain for poor Rupert to protest and struggle against the stronger arm of the law, in the person of the redoubtable Monsieur Pompon, nor did the bewildered crowd show any inclination to dispute the gendarme's authority. There were evidently pickpockets amongst them, and it appeared as likely that Rupert was one of the offenders as not; so amid hissings and hootings the poor lad was marched off under the guardianship of Monsieur Pompon; the tall American appearing to be the only cool spectator of the scene, who when he saw the turn which affairs had taken, quietly put his hands in his trouser pockets and whistled "Yankee Doodle."

It did not take long for Rupert and his escort to reach the guard-house where the prisoner was to sup and sleep that night at the expense of the State.

The lump of coarse bread, of which his supper consisted, remained uneaten, and the hard bench on which he was to spend the long hours of darkness was not likely soon to woo

"Tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep."

A host of sad reflections filled the poor lad's mind, as he thought of his mother, sleeping her quiet sleep in the cemetery above the town, and wondered what she would think did she know he was there. Then he would think of what he still called his home, and of Bruno all alone, awaiting his return and howling piteously for his supper; and lastly his thoughts would wander over to England and he would wonder where his friends the Collettes were, and what they were doing, and what Christine, who was so good and beautiful, would think could she see him in his present pitiful state.

Thus the poor lad wept himself to sleep at last, for though in trouble, he was still young, and it is only later on in life that we spend wholly sleepless nights.

CHAPTER IV.—STRANGE COMPANIONS.

Rupert was allowed to sleep his troubled sleep pretty long into the next day. The examining judge did not take his seat until somewhat late, and the officials did not care to trouble themselves much with their prisoners until then.

In due time, however, Monsieur Pompon arrived in all the pomp and splendour of his official uniform, to conduct Rupert into the presence of the magistrate. The Rue des Tribunaux, where the court-house is, runs immediately at right angles to the Rue Desmarest, where the crowd of the previous evening had been taking their pleasure; and Rupert recognised amongst the faces of the little knot of idlers which was assembled at the court-house doors, not a few of those connected with the fair, amongst whom conspicuous, a head and shoulders above all the rest, was the gaunt visage of the tall American.

The enquiry did not last very long. French gendarmes are not infallible, and even in the eyes of French justice, Monsieur Pompon seemed to have a little overstepped his duty. There being no evidence against the prisoner, the magistrate dismissed Rupert with a caution, and with an intimation that his movements would be watched as one who was at least suspected.

To his own relief, and to the evident disappointment of Pompon, the boy found himself once more at liberty, but he stepped out of court with that unpleasant feeling which those experience who have been dragged before the stern eyes of Justice, even though innocent of the charges laid against them.

Being preoccupied with the trying circumstances surrounding him, and pondering what should be his next step, Rupert had scarcely noticed that he was being keenly eyed by the tall American of the previous evening, who was walking up and down the courtyard outside the tribunal.

"Wall, stranger," said that individual, suddenly addressing him. "You're a Britisher, I surmise. How do your views coincide with these French judicial arrangements? Saw the gendarme arrest you last night. Knew you weren't the man, but that was no business of mine. What's your name? Where do you live? And how do you get along?"

Rupert was a little startled by these personal enquiries, but in answer replied, that he was living, at least for the present, in the Rue des Maillots, and that he was not "getting along" particularly prosperously just then.

"What line in the profession are you in?" enquired the American, looking at him critically. "You've done nothing in the plate-spinning and balancing business I guess?"

"Oh no, sir," replied Rupert, with some surprise. "I'm not connected with the fair. I was brought up in the ivory-carving trade, but I haven't had anything to do for a long time. My father and mother are both dead," he added, the tears coming into his eyes.

"Humph," soliloquised the American; "no visible means of obtaining a livelihood, and yet respectable in appearance. Can you read and write this aggravating language, and," he added deliberately, "play the French horn?"

Rupert replied that as regarded reading and writing in French he had received a pretty careful education, but as regarded the last-named accomplishment, a knowledge of the French horn was not amongst his attainments.

"Sorry for that," replied the American, "considerable sorry; because at the present moment, young man, there is a French horn in our establishment which isn't paying its footing. The bills and advertising business has always gone along with that French horn. Still," he added, gravely and thoughtfully, "other arrangements aren't outside the region of possibility. An opportunity for travel and seeing the world is now offered to you. Young man, what do you elect to do?"

Such a proposition coming to a lad brought up respectably as Rupert had been was certainly a startling one. It did not need much thoughtfulness or penetration on his part at once to perceive that the occupation offered to him, with its probable associations, was the very last which he ought to accept. Still, the temptation came to him in a time when he scarcely knew how to resist it. It was not that the employment suggested to him seemed to offer such particular charms, but it was at any rate a means of immediate escape from his present misery, and the rambling kind of life which it implied was not out of harmony with his present restless feelings.

Arrested the previous evening as a criminal, having spent a night in prison, an object of suspicion and petty persecution, without a home and friends, with no means of obtaining a livelihood—is it to be wondered at that the lad hesitated? On the one side was conscience whispering to him that the step which he was asked to take was not what would tend to his good, and on the other was necessity reminding him of his destitute condition.

The tall American watched the struggle going on in the lad's face, with the same cool expression of countenance with which he had witnessed Rupert's arrest on the previous evening, and again putting his hands in his pockets, whistled, "Yankee Doodle."

"I am willing to go with you, sir," said Rupert at length, silencing the voice of his inner monitor. "When do you wish me to begin?"

"We start for the city of Rouen to-morrow morning, young man, and if you conclude to join us, I rather calculate that you'll find us making tracks at an early hour; we leave this town at five o'clock."

Rupert hurried along the now lighted streets which led to his old house in the Rue des Maillots with a beating heart. Now that he had made up his mind to go, all the older and pleasanter associations connected with his past life came back to his memory, and it was with tears in his eyes that he climbed the dingy staircase to put his few things together and prepared to take a last farewell of his humble home. Mademoiselle Georgette was not in her room as Rupert passed her étage. He sighed when he thought that he ought to say farewell to this kind little woman, but he had made up his mind to slip away without any one knowing. But when he reached his own door an obstacle to his plan presented itself which the poor lad had quite forgotten until that moment. That obstacle was Bruno. Scarcely had the door been opened than the faithful dog flew to welcome back his master and only friend.

"Oh, Bruno," said Rupert with a tone of remorse, "I had quite forgotten you. Monsieur Pompon and the prison, and the strange American, had all put you out of my memory. Oh, my poor dog, have you had nothing to eat all this time? What would Mademoiselle Christine say?"

But if Bruno could have spoken he could tell of Mademoiselle Georgette's kindness, if indeed a well-licked plate upon the floor did not testify that the dog had not been altogether unattended to.

"Oh, Bruno, Bruno," said Rupert with tears in his eyes, as the dog began gradually to resume an air of easy indifference, "what must I do with you? Those people at the circus will never let me take you with me, and I promised Mademoiselle Christine to take care of you, and always be a friend to you. Oh, my poor Bruno," continued the poor lad, now giving way to sobs, "what must I do?"

Bruno was not much accustomed to hear his master give way to such sounds of sorrow, but he felt that there must be something wrong, and immediately commenced to join in with a dismal groan.

But Rupert now felt that there was no time to be lost. It was getting very late, and what arrangements had to be made must be made at once. A moderate-sized bundle was sufficient to contain all the poor lad's earthly goods. What furniture the family had possessed, had been already sold to Madame Dudonet. A few shabby clothes, the kind clergyman's Bible, and a photograph of his mother, these completed his little property, and did not take long in packing. Without undressing, Rupert threw himself upon the bed to have, if possible, a few hours' sleep; and Bruno, with his usual calm assurance, quietly jumped up beside him and made himself as comfortable as he could under the circumstances.

The great clock at St. Jacques was striking four when Rupert arose from a troubled sleep. One more trying act was before him, and then he would silently creep down the stairs and be gone. With the tears rolling down his cheeks, and a face averted from his only friend and companion, he stole to a drawer in what had been his mother's old armoire, and taking from it a short piece of rope, he laid it on the table before him while he sat down and wrote a few hurried words on a small slip of paper to the kind Mademoiselle Georgette. She had always been kind to him, and to his mother, he said, would she be now kind to Bruno for their sakes? He then took the rope and attached it to Bruno's collar, and without daring to look at or speak to the poor animal, he tied the other end to the bed; then taking up his bundle he left the room with a heavy heart, and in another minute found himself hurrying along the cold and silent streets.

As Rupert approached the large wooden circus in the Rue Desmarest he found everything in a state of excitement and confusion. Lights were moving rapidly about, horses were prancing and neighing, men were shouting and scolding in various different languages. Hiram Wilkes, the tall proprietor of the circus, had been hurrying about to hasten on as much as possible the departure, but the morning was cold and cheerless, and did not seem much to improve either his own temper, or that of his company. They were an ill-looking set of people, and their queer jargon and harsh voices sounded strangely in the silent street. Horses were being led out of their wooden sheds, and rapidly harnessed to different kinds of vehicles. Some of these animals were really handsome creatures, and looked far more noble than the masters who were leading them. One or two of the strange equipages had already started up the Route de Rouen, when Rupert arrived upon the scene.

He had been told by the tall American on the previous evening, to ask for Hiram Wilkes, and not perceiving that gentleman's commanding presence, timidly enquired for him of a man with fierce moustaches, who while his lower extremities shivered in circus attire, was wrapt up in a very rough and shabby greatcoat, with a muffler round his neck

In this man's dirty face might be recognised the well-known features of Signor Viralla, whose nightly performances on a fiery steed, one foot on his courser's back the other in his own mouth, had won such thunders of applauses from the ignorant multitude.

"I say, Sam," said Signor Viralla, addressing a man a shade more dirty and miserable-looking than himself, "here's a chap that's asking for the governor. I expect he's in far too great a hurry to be talking to him this morning. He hasn't had his coffee yet, and it's uncommon cold."

"Oh no, Bill," replied the man thus addressed, (Rupert afterwards learnt that this was the celebrated Tom White the clown), "it's all serene; the chap's not a mounseer, he's an Englishman like you and me. Our governor met him yesterday as he was coming out of quad and engaged him for the advertising and general utility business. Step this way if you please," said Tom White to Rupert, at the same time leading him into a small shed adjoining the circus. Here Rupert found Hiram Wilkes, seated on a bucket turned upside down and regaling himself with a steaming bowl of hot coffee.

"Wall, stranger," said that individual, without discontinuing for a moment his interesting occupation. "I thought it might eventuate that we shouldn't see you this morning, you seemed so downhearted yesterday when I made you that brilliant offer, but to be sure you haven't been in this line before. Why I felt strange when Duclos made me his first offer, but you see I've worried on pretty well, and I'm in Duclos's place now. Bill," he shouted to Signor Viralla, who was standing shivering at the door of the shed, "I'll drive the piebalds this morning, and this young man can come along with me."

In less than half an hour more, the whole company had taken their departure. The sun was just beginning to streak the sky above the old château, when Hiram Wilkes drove his horses up the still silent Route de Rouen, with Rupert Long beside him. The quiet inhabitants in their beds in the tall houses on either side had long been wondering what was the cause of the unwonted uproar at such an early hour, and one or two sleepy faces had appeared at the bedroom windows, and seen the last of the procession.

ORTHODOX PARADOXES.*

BY RALPH VENNING, A.M.

RALPH VENNING was one of the godly ministers of the old time who were laid to rest in the Campo Santo of Bunhill Fields. He was buried in 1673, aged fifty-three years. A great concourse of Nonconformists, as was the manner on such occasions, attended the burial, and a funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. R. Bragge, the colleague of Mr. Venning, at Pewterers' Hall, then one of the licensed places of worship for Dissenters.

He had not always been a Nonconformist. Born in 1620, he studied at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and he held the Lectureship of St. Olave, Southwark, at the passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662. Refusing to conform, he was one of those ejected on St. Bartholomew's Day.

Of his life and services very little is known. In the public conflicts of those times he seems to have taken no part, but he is known, from his writings and from occasional references in the records of that period, to have been a faithful and earnest minister of the gospel. His other works have passed into oblivion, but the terse style as well as the sterling matter of this little treatise have gained for it longer life and wider notice.

In the original preface, written in 1647, the author seems to have due consciousness of the worth as well as sincere desire for the usefulness of his collection of "Orthodox Paradoxes."

"That to me, both in the first writing of them, and since in the often reading of them, they have been not a little profitable, I cannot but declare; and whatever my gain hath been, I wish the reader as much, and as much more, terque quaterque, thrice and four times. If the Spirit of God join with him in the reading of them, I believe he will find that made clear in two or three lines which many pages, if I say not volumes, have left under a veil. If it prove so, let God have all the glory."

In an "Epistle to the Reader" he gives fuller explanation of the scope and object of the work. The style of this preface, while marked by the pedantry too common in discourses of that age, has a quaintness characteristic of the author.

"Christian reader," he says, "in these Paradoxes thou hast a large part of my creed; I will not call it the Apostles', nor Athanasius's Creed; nor say of it, as he saith (or at least, as it is said of his), that 'whosoever doth not believe it cannot be saved.' I intend not to dogmatise, or impose; only I entreat thee to search the Scriptures, to see whether these things be so. It is the very genius of a well-instructed soul to try all things, but to hold fast only that which is good. If thou find anything in this, or in any of my writings, contrary to sound doctrine and godliness, I entreat thee to disown it, as on discovery I shall be ready to do. But if there be anything that may be of use to thy edification, as I hope there is that may be, do not despise it because the author is despicable.

"Reader, I think it is no news to tell thee, that some men rather believe that they know, than know what they believe; and that there be some also who have attained even to know what, why, and in whom they have believed. Some men think this their knowledge, that they know nothing (hoc tantum scio, me nil scire); they are always learning, yet cannot say that they have so learned as to have attained to the knowledge of truth; they confess that things are δυσνόητα, hard to be understood; that there are dubia evangelica, some dark shadows in the clearest manifestations; yea, that to their apprehensions there are more than Gordian knots in scirpo; difficulties in the plainest passages. Others are grown to such gigantic statures in knowledge, faith, or at least fancy, that they cannot find difficulties enough for their active faith; they think this no riddle, but a very orthodox paradox (though not among mine), that things are true because impossible, and therefore to be believed because incredible."

With regard to the alleged difficulties of revealed truth, he affirms that things necessary to be understood are plain and clear:

"It hath pleased God, the Father of lights, and lover of the souls of men, to write the things of men's greatest concernment, (which relate to eternity), in so fair and legible characters, in such capital and golden letters, that he that runs may read. I have heard of one that said to a lady who complained of the darkness and obscurity of the Scriptures, though too well acquainted with the works of darkness, 'What more plain than this, madam,' said he, '"Thou shalt not commit adultery"?' So indeed one may say to the whining querulosity of many, What more plain than this: 'He that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned'? What more plain than this: 'He that hath this hope, or this faith, purifieth himself, as God is pure'? What more plain than this: 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God'? What more plain than this: 'Without holiness no man shall see God'? What more plain than this: 'He that sinneth wrongeth his own soul'? What more plain than this: 'For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, or of God. Let no man deceive you with vain words; for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience'? Ah! if we did but seriously meditate upon these things, and put them in practice, we should then have the true knowledge of God and eternal life."

We now give some specimens of the Paradoxes. There are nearly three hundred in all (299). In style as well as matter they are very unequal, and some of them are nugæ, or trifling matter, if not mere plays upon words.* But there are not a few which contain much truth in little compass, and which may be used as seeds of thought.

"The Christian believes that which reason cannot comprehend; yet there is reason enough why he should believe it."

"He believes three persons (Ὑπόστασεις, subsistences) in one God, two natures in one person, and one will in three persons."

"He believes that Christ has and shall have a kingdom in this world; and yet he believes that Christ's kingdom is not of this world."

"He believes that God's will and power are equal; and yet he believes that God can do what He never will do."

"He believes that God foreknew all things; and whatever He foreknew to be must needs be; and yet he believes that God's foreknowledge was not the cause of their being."

"He sees that the things which God knows are variable and changing; and yet he believes that the knowledge of God never changes."

"He believes that man did enjoy blessedness before he fell; and yet he believes that man was never sure of blessedness before he lost it."

"He believes that Christ obeyed and fulfilled the law for him; and yet he believes that the law is to be obeyed by him."

"He knows that there is a curse denounced against them that break the law; and yet he believes that he shall not be cursed, though he hath broken it."

"He eagerly pursues the works of righteousness; but peremptorily rejects the righteousness of works."

"He believes that God will not acquit the wicked; and yet he believes that God justifies the ungodly.

"He believes that by faith, without the works of the law, we are justified; and yet he believes that faith without works doth not justify.

"He knows that grace is much resisted; and yet he believes that on some occasions nothing works so irresistibly.

"He believes that he cannot be saved by his working; and yet he believes that he is to work out his own salvation with fear and trembling."

"He eats Christ's flesh, and drinks the blood of Christ, and lives by it; and yet he never takes the flesh and blood of Christ into his mouth.

"He believes that the bread and wine are not the body and blood of Christ; nor that Christ is in them or under them; and yet when he takes them he partakes of Christ, yea, of the body and blood of Christ."

"He believes that God hath forgotten his sin, and will remember it no more; and yet he believes that God brings sin to his remembrance.

"He is ashamed that he is a sinner; and yet is not ashamed to confess himself a sinner."

"He strives to be the highest saint; and yet is contented to be the lowest."

"When the irons do enter into his soul, they do not touch his inward man.

"He may be imprisoned; yet never deprived of liberty.

"Men may kill him; but they cannot hurt him.

"He may be bound hand and foot; yet cannot be hindered from walking with God.

"Men may cast him out of house and home; but they can never banish him from his inheritance."

"He believes that he goes not to heaven for holiness; and yet he believes that he cannot go there without it."

"He disowns all the duties he performs; and yet believes that God doth own them all."

"He believes that there is more in Christ than he needs; yet less than all will not content him, or serve his turn."

"He is careful in nothing; yet none so careful as he."

"He fears God; and yet is not afraid of God."

"He believes that some have grace who cannot define it; and that some can define it who have it not."

"He is always in pilgrimage; and yet he is never from home."

"He believes that having made a promise, he ought to be as good as his word; and yet he thinks he may go from his word to go to truth."

"He knows that he was once an enemy to God; and yet he believes that God was never an enemy to him."

"He believes that all saints have a zeal for God; yet all that have a zeal for God are not saints.

"He believes that all things are ordered by providence; yet time and chance happen to all.

"He believes that every saint is careful to avoid sin; yet every one that is careful to avoid sin is not a saint.

"There is nothing hinders acceptance but sin; yet sin doth not hinder his acceptance.

"He hath no sufficiency of his own; and yet he is able to do all things.

* For example, "He (the Christian) believes that bodily exercise profits but a little; and yet he believes that there is great use of bodily exercise, and great profit by it."

"He believes that there is no new thing under the sun; and yet he believes that all old things are past away, and every thing is become new."

"He believes that dead men cannot speak; and yet he believes that Abel, though dead, speaks yet."

"He believes that there is not any thing less than nothing; and yet he believes that all the nations of the earth are less than nothing."

"He is no man-server; and yet he is willing to serve any man."

"He is one who lives to die, and dies to live; yea, he is dead while he lives, and lives when he dies.

"He is one who lives in another, and for another; he seeks not himself when he aims most at his own good: God is his all, and his all is God; he aims at no end but the glory of God, of which there is no end."

"He believes that sin cleaves to the affections of the saints; but he believes that the affections of the saints do not cleave to sin.

"He believes that a man may have thoughts of evil, which yet he believes may not be evil thoughts."

"He believes there are some who never doubt of their salvation, but live and die with their hearts full fraught with confidence that they shall get to heaven; when as he yet believes that their salvation is to be doubted of."

"He believes that it is not the will of God that men should do any evil; and yet he believes that men do often fulfil the will of God by the evil they do."

"He believes that sin itself works together for his good; and yet he believes that it is not good for him to sin."

"He believes that all things are lawful to him; and yet there are some things which he dares not do, because he believes that they are not lawful for him."

"He believes that many shall call upon the name of the Lord, saying, 'Lord, Lord,' who shall not be saved; and yet he believes that whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved."

"He believes that it is the pleasure of the Lord that the wicked should die; and yet he believes that God takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked."

"He believes that whatsoever the godly man doeth shall prosper; and yet he believes that many a godly man doeth many a thing which doth not prosper."

"He believes that our good works may be, yea, that they ought to be so done before men, as to be seen of men; and yet he believes that we must not do good works in order to be seen of men."

"He believes that men are sometimes delivered up to Satan, that they may be delivered from Satan."

"He believes that man's idle time is the devil's busy time; and therefore he believes, as Latimer said, 'that the devil has more service done him in one holiday than in many working days.'"

"He believes that there are many poor in the world, and many poor spirits; and yet he believes that there are but few in the world who are poor in spirit."

"He believes that a man may give all his goods to feed the poor; and yet he believes that that man may have no charity; for every man that gives is not charitable."

"He believes that a man may die for Christ; and yet he believes that such a man may not die in Christ."

"He believes that many men receive the truth who do not receive it in truth."

"He believes that every earthly-minded man minds earthly things; and yet he believes that every man that minds earthly things may not be an earthly-minded man."

"He believes that though a saint may be sometimes weary in doing the work of the Lord, yet that a saint is never weary of doing the work of the Lord."

"He believes that we may not speak evil of dignities; and yet he believes that we may speak of the evil of dignities."

"He believes that a man may be a true believer, though he should not believe all the paradoxes which are here written to be orthodox."

THE GREEK CHURCH IN RUSSIA AND SIBERIA.

BY THE REV. HENRY LANSDELL, F.R.G.S.

III.

AS it is with education, so the status of the Russian clergy is low; but in thinking of the Russian priest, we must put out of our minds the average English pastor of the present day, and even the Roman priest in Ireland. We must remember Macaulay's picture of the English clergy of former centuries, or try rather to picture to our mind what English priests were when Christianity had existed no longer here than it now has in Russia. We shall then be carried back to the fourteenth century; and what sort of clergy are they to whom Chaucer introduces us in his "Canterbury Tales"? We have, therefore, no place for boasting; nor are these remarks made with any idea of drawing unfavourable comparisons, but only to give a true picture of certain of the Russian ecclesiastics. Where they are immoral, their influence, of course, is small, and they are looked up to only for their official acts; on the other hand, as in other countries, where they show a proper interest in their people, as I rejoice to have heard many do, their influence is considerable. I have heard of more than one priest taking up the temperance movement, and doing great things thereby. I called upon some few of the priests in Siberia, who, like the peasants, seemed decidedly superior, and better off than those in Russia. On arriving at a post station, I not infrequently sent for or called upon the priest, and gave him tracts to circulate in his parish, and offered to sell him at a reduced rate, for distribution, portions of Scripture. This offer was almost always accepted. One priest bought upwards of twenty shillings' worth of New Testaments, and would have purchased more, only that I feared not having enough for the prisons and mines.

But let us now pass to the monastic clergy, who alone fill all the higher offices in the Russian Church, and between whom and the parish clergy there is said on that account to exist much ill feeling, more even than between the regular and secular clergy of Rome. Among the monastic clergy are many scholars. The present Metropolitan Macarius of Moscow may be selected as a bright example. He has written extensively, and from the very outset of his literary career is said to have resolved to devote all the money derived from his works to the progress of knowledge. He has founded scholarships and prizes at Kieff, St. Petersburg, and Vilna, and so long ago as 1867, he possessed a capital of 120,000 roubles, the interest of which is distributed yearly in premiums for the best writings in the Russian language. I did myself the honour to visit this Metropolitan. A former visit to another ecclesiastical dignitary had caused me to brace my nerves for a formal and dignified interview; but in this case I was agreeably surprised by his Grace taking my hand, kissing my cheek, and motioning me to a seat at his side. He heard with interest of my intention to visit and supply with the Scriptures the Siberian prisons; said that the Russians had not the means to perform all they would like; commended the English for what they were doing; and wished me "God speed!" Other things might be said to the praise of the Russian clergy, and notably their simple manner of living. I entered the sleeping-room of the Archimandrite (who is also the Metropolitan of Moscow) at the "Skit" near the Troitza monastery, and found a room that would be thought not too well furnished for the guest-chamber of an average English rectory. Further, in Russia, both orders of clergy fast at least 226 days in the year; and the monastic clergy, which includes all the bishops, never eat flesh at all.

Something must be said of the Russian monasteries for women and men. They are of three sorts: "Lavra," of which there are only three, namely, at Kieff, St. Petersburg, and Troitza, near Moscow; next are those called "Cœnobia;" and lastly, others called "Stauropegia." Their general characteristics are Egyptian rather than Roman. The Lavra of Egypt are supposed to have been collections of tents in the deserts, where each man provided food for himself though sharing in common devotions. Cœnobia were institutions where all lived in common. The discipline is the same in all three, but the Stauropegia are under the direct jurisdiction, not of the bishops, but of the synod. Men are not admitted to be monks till thirty years of age, and nuns do not receive the tonsure till sixty, or at least fifty. Younger women may enter as probationers; but they take no vow, and are at liberty to leave and be married. Probationers, whether men or women, wear a black velvet hat without a brim, and the men a black cassock. Attached to the hat, proficients have a black veil (with metropolitans this is white), and monastics of the third degree always wear the veil or hood down, and never suffer the face to be seen. What, however, has now been said may suffice for the constitution and government of the Russian Church and its ecclesiastical institutions and persons.

We come now to speak of the missions of the Church of Russia, but first it may be remarked that in the time of Alexander the First, foreign missionaries were allowed to work among the heathen within the empire.

At the beginning of the present century a few men were sent out by the London Missionary Society to labour among the Buriats, a Mongolian tribe to the east and south of Lake Baikal in Siberia. (One of them, Mr. Stallybrass, now very old, is still living.) They went to Irkutsk, and thence to Selenginsk, where they remained for many years; but in 1840 the Emperor Nicholas was induced by the synod to dismiss all foreign missionaries from the country. This was done on the plea that the Russian Church wished to do all the mission work to their own heathen. I passed through Selenginsk, and purposely turned aside to see the spot where these men laboured. There were still a few traces of English ideas about the house and buildings, but the most touching sight was five English graves, those of Mrs. Yule, Mrs. Stallybrass, and three children. The memory of the English missionaries was still fragrant, and we met an old man who as a boy attended their school. They baptized no converts; for they were under agreement with the Russians not to do so; but their labour was not in vain, for they laid a good foundation, Messrs. Stallybrass and Swan having translated the Bible into Mongolian. I took with me some copies, and found others in the hands of the Russian missionaries.

The greater part of the "orthodox" missionary zeal for the heathen is expended in Asiatic Russia; but there are yet to be found in some parts of Russia in Europe the remnants of heathen tribes, who, though partly or nominally brought to Christianity, still practise heathen rites and customs. Their chief European pagan missions are in the governments or provinces of Astrachan, Riazan, Perm, and Kasan, in which last are several semi-heathen tribes. In the city of Kasan I visited an institution for training boys from the Tatar, Cheremisi, Mordvar, Chuvashi, and Votyaks, to whom, when trained, they are sent back as schoolmasters. They have also in Kasan a college, in or near the bishop's house, for training some of these boys and others to be priests, and then to go as missionaries to their own people. In Asia, I called upon a Russian missionary living in the Trans-Baikal district, and he told me that there had been baptized about three hundred persons on the east of Lake Baikal during the previous year, and more than a thousand on the western side. At Selenginsk the Buriats were said to be of two sorts—fire-worshippers and worshippers of idols; more accurately, I suppose, followers of Shamanism and Buddhists. The fire-worshippers, they said, were gained without much difficulty, but the idol-worshippers are much opposed to Christianity. Farther east, almost to the Pacific, the Russians have two or three missionaries to some strange people called Goldi and Gilyaks, who are certainly the lowest types of humanity with whom I have ever been brought in contact. I met a priest who had been a missionary on the Lower Amur for twenty-three years, during which time he has baptized, he told me, more than two thousand persons, chiefly Goldi, Orochons, and Gilyaks. It should be understood, however, that the Russian missionaries differ widely from the English as to what constitutes proper qualification for baptism, and that the preparation and instruction of converts are very little indeed.

OSTJAKS OF THE YENISEI PROVINCE.

The late Metropolitan of Moscow, Innokente, was in his way a remarkable missionary. He translated a portion of the Scriptures and liturgy into the languages of the Aleutian and Kurile Islands, and more, he brought the manuscript all across Northern Asia, from beyond Kamtchatka, to St. Petersburg, a distance of more than ten thousand miles, had the books printed, and took them back! I myself have driven three thousand miles behind Siberian horses and over Siberian roads, and know something of their pains and penalties; but when I heard of a man who had multiplied that distance sevenfold, I could not withhold from him my intense admiration.

It cannot be denied that there is a very considerable amount of toleration of foreign religions in the Russian Empire. The Tsar does not emulate the Bishop of Rome, who, as long as he could prevent it, which was up to about ten years ago, would not allow a Protestant place of worship to be built within the walls of his capital. On the contrary, at the fair of Nijni Novgorod, the Mahometan mosque and the Armenian church stand side by side with the orthodox cathedral, and I am not sure that I did not see in the Chinese quarter a Buddhist temple. Notwithstanding all this, however, the religious toleration of the Tsar is of a somewhat one-sided character. A man is certainly left in peace to practise the religion in which he was born. Again, should an Englishman, or any one else living in Russia, be convinced that the Greek Church is more Scriptural and catholic than his own, the Greek Church will gladly receive him into her communion. But not vice versa. On the contrary, should a Russian living in Russia be convinced that the English Church, for instance, is more scriptural than his own, and should he attempt to carry out his convictions, he would thereby render himself liable, I believe, to expatriation, confiscation, and other pains and penalties too dreadful to mention; and to receive the convert into the English Church would be more than the chaplain at St. Petersburg or Moscow dare do. The matter, therefore, stands thus, that whilst the Russian Church is ready to receive from all, she gives to none.

There are notwithstanding a great many non-conformists in the empire. Among these the Russians have certain sects to deal with, whose tenets are so outrageous that no enlightened government could do otherwise than try to repress them. Some of their ideas are sufficiently ludicrous. "Cursed be the man," said one of these people to an acquaintance of mine—"Cursed be the man who presumes to pray to God in a pair of trousers!" There are other sects whose tenets are directly mischievous and abominable, but the great mass of Russian Raskolniks are of another character, and their history goes back for some years.

When, in the seventeenth century, the Patriarch Nikon began to have the church books revised and corrected, he met with fierce opposition. He was charged with interpolating, instead of correcting the books, and nothing would persuade some of the people to the contrary. Many thus became unsettled and broke away, not they would say, because they were leaving the Church, but because the Church, with its new-fangled notions, was leaving them. Then, when, in addition to Nikon's changes, Peter the Great introduced further novelties, things were looked upon as becoming worse than ever. There was accordingly a large section of the most ultra-conservative Russians, both of priests and people, who clung to old books, old pictures, and old ways, under the impression that thus only could they worship God according to the customs of their forefathers; and it is from these secessionists that the great mass of the "Staroveri," or old believers, are descended. They are split into two principal parties. They had a bishop with them at the time of their secession, and he ordained many priests. But as these priests died, they asked, How shall we fill their places? They had no second bishop to ordain more. Some decided that they would do without priests, and these are called Bezpopoftchins, or priestless. Others for a time got priests from the Established Church as best they could, but eventually came to a compromise with the government; and by certain concessions made to them, saved their scruples, and obtained their priests. These are called Popoftchins. The differences, however, between both parties on the one side, and the Established Church on the other, were not questions of doctrine, but such as these: the Starovers gave the benediction with two fingers, the established clergy with three, which latter practice was regarded by the Old Believers as a mortal sin. The Starovers' form of the cross had three transverse beams, instead of the Greek two, or the Latin one. Again, to say the name of Jesus in two syllables instead of three (as in Greek) was condemned by the Starovers, as also was the repetition of the hallelujah in the service thrice instead of twice. It became also an alarming innovation to read or write, for ecclesiastical purposes, a word of modern Russ.

But there are many among the Raskolniks of Russia who dissent from the Established Church on points less diminutive than those of the Starovers, as the Dukhobortsi, or "wrestlers with the Spirit," who spiritualise to a high degree both doctrines and sacraments. Also they reject pictures, do not cross themselves, nor observe the appointed fasts. In their meetings they pray for one another, sing psalms, and explain the Word of God. They call themselves Christians, and their great dogma is to worship God in Spirit and in truth. They have no magistrates, but govern their own society; they practise brotherly love, have all things common, and are remarkable for the orderly and cleanly manner in which they live.

The last sect I shall mention is that of the Molokans, so called because they drink milk on the usual fasting days. Their origin is involved in obscurity, and by some is dated back to the middle of the last century. Early in the present century many were living in the south of Russia. An English gentleman residing at Berdiansk in 1848, visited their villages; and from his wife I learn that Salamatin,

GOLDI FISH-GOD, OR IDOL.

the Molokan chief, and his family were pious but very simple, uneducated people. My friend used sometimes to invite them to her table. She tells me that their enlightenment came to all appearance simply from reading the Bible. They found there the worship of images forbidden, and accordingly declined to bow down before them, on which account some of them were persecuted even to bodily pain; but to no purpose. They would not give way. Their alleged disuse of baptism and the Lord's Supper agrees with what I heard of them in Siberia, near Blagovestchensk, where there are considerable numbers of them, probably the remnant or descendants of those long since exiled. A fellow-passenger who lodged in the house of a Molokan, told me that on Sunday they hold meetings, read the Scriptures, pray, sing, expound the Bible, and ask questions, but he thought they did not baptize or receive the Lord's Supper. They had, moreover, no priests, but only elders. But I remember my friend saying to me, that when the Molokans separated from, or were turned out of, the Russian Church, they had no priests nor any persons of education to guide them: and hence I am not clear whether they are without sacraments from choice or from necessity. The Molokans of Ekaterinoslav certainly were not indifferent to the sacraments, for Salamatin, their then chief, was wont to baptize some of their people by immersion: and as for the Lord's Supper, in Salamatin's time they celebrated it sitting round a table, each communicant receiving a piece of bread broken from one loaf, and the cup with wine was afterwards passed round to each member.

In consequence of the army recruiting system adopted in Russia many of the descendants of these men, as well as the Menonites from the same locality, have migrated to Canada, for they consider war, except in the case of self-defence, as sinful. They are now British subjects and are doing well. My fellow-passenger gave the Molokans of Blagovestchensk an excellent character. He said he never saw them drunken, nor even enter a tavern; that he rarely or never saw them out of temper, or heard them use bad language; and that they spend their spare time in reading the Bible. Looking therefore at this and subsequent testimony, and comparing the lives of the Molokans with the lives of the orthodox, I felt that to bring the orthodox into contact with the Molokans would be likely to improve the "orthodox" rather than otherwise, and that the Tsar would have more good subjects than he now has if he had more of the Molokans.

SHORT MODEL PRAYERS.

II.

"God be merciful to me a sinner."—Luke xviii. 13.

WE have here a prayer which may most certainly be taken as a model for our own prayers, for our Lord tells us that the man who offered it in God's house went home a "justified" man. He had asked for mercy, and he had received it to the full.

Let us examine a little what we are told of the man who offered this prayer. He was a publican, or tax-gatherer, and we know well the usual character of such men in the time of our Lord. Their office exposed them to great temptation. They paid a certain sum to the Roman government for the right of farming the taxes by the Jews to the Romans. When some of them came to John the Baptist to receive baptism of him, and asked him, "Master, what shall we do?" he answered, "Exact no more than that which is appointed you." This direction shows plainly what was their usual character. Accordingly, we find the Pharisee in his prayer thanking God that he was not an "extortioner," or "unjust," or "even as this publican."

We may then take it for granted that this publican had been unjust, and had obtained money by extortion and hard dealing. But he had been aroused to a sense of sin. His soul was burdened. He must seek relief in prayer. He goes to the Temple, but there he feels too much his own unworthiness to venture to mingle with the other worshippers. He stands "afar off," in some retired part of the building, and, with every outward expression of the deepest penitence and humiliation, he utters this short but fervent prayer: "God be merciful to me a sinner."

Reader, have you ever put up this prayer? You may perhaps often have called yourself a "sinner" in your prayers, yes, even a "miserable sinner." But have you truly felt what these words imply? Have you felt that you had absolutely no claim whatever upon God, that mercy free, unmerited mercy, was all you dared to ask?

Let me try to describe two classes of persons for whom this prayer is suitable.

I. If you have any sense of sin on your conscience; if you have been roused by some sermon, some event, some word, in short, by any means, to feel it may be for the first time in your life, "I am a sinner," go straight to God, and cry for mercy in the very words of the publican. The feeling which causes you so much pain and uneasiness is sent by God, and is the work of his Spirit. No power in the world can produce a conviction in a man's heart that he is a sinner but the Holy Ghost. I know that many may be brought easily enough to say, "Oh yes, we are all sinners;" but the real sense of sin on the conscience that makes any one say of himself, "me, a sinner," is assuredly given by God the Holy Ghost.

Do not try to get rid of this feeling by comparing yourself with others whom you think are as bad as yourself, or even worse. Cherish it rather, but let it lead you to pray. Do you want an assurance that God will show you mercy if you ask Him, then look in his word and see what is said on this subject. You will indeed find that sin is most hateful to Him: you will read that "sin is the transgression of the law," and that by God's written law given to man, sin was shown to be "exceeding sinful." You will see that our Lord Jesus Christ makes men accountable for even a bad thought. As you read, you will be more than ever convinced of your own exceeding sinfulness.

But when you look further to see what is said of "mercy" for sinners, you will see that you have every encouragement to pray in faith: "God be merciful to me a sinner."

The whole Gospel is so full of promises and invitations to sinners that it is difficult to know which to point to. Take only this one saying of the Lord Jesus: "I am come to call sinners to repentance" (Matt. ix. 13), and read his assurance that the publican's prayer was one that was accepted by God, and then kneel down and offer it with assured hope that you also may rise from your knees "justified" by faith in Jesus Christ and having peace with God. (Romans v. 1.) "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin" (1 John i. 7). When you cry for mercy in the name of Jesus Christ, his blood shall be sprinkled on your conscience, and his voice shall whisper the blessed words, "Go in peace: thy sins are forgiven."

II. This prayer is suitable for believers, whenever a sense of their own sinfulness returns upon them. Well is it for those who "walk in the light as He is in the light," for while thus walking they are cleansed "from all sin"! But alas, how many have not attained to the close walking with God which is thus described!

We must never deny that all ought so to walk, and that we find no encouragement to be content with anything lower. Yet is there not often given to the child of God a fresh revelation of what sin is, so that he cries out: "Unclean, unclean! behold, I am vile"? He does not lose sight of the cross, and the atoning blood, and past forgiveness, but yet he feels a deeper need of mercy, pure, free mercy, than he has felt before.

It may be that he has fallen into some inconsistency, has spoken unadvisedly with his lips, or has had some sins of omission brought home to him. Or it may be that he has been thrown with some spiritual and advanced Christian, whose bright light seems to show him the dimness of his own. Or, again, in reading or hearing the word of God preached, he may have felt its keen edge "discerning the very thoughts and intents of his heart."

In short, there are times, I believe, in the lives of many true Christians when the words "me a sinner" are all he can say of himself.

At such times, it is good to pray the publican's prayer. It is not well to turn for comfort to past experiences or to try in any way to stifle or lessen the sense of sin. The Holy Spirit is at work, producing that feeling, and no safer way can there be for obtaining renewed peace and a cleansed conscience than this: "Enter into thy closet and shut the door," and kneeling down as in the very presence of God, cry to Him in the name of Jesus Christ: "God be merciful to me, a sinner, for my Saviour's sake."

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

MARCH 6.

WITNESS OF JESUS TO JOHN. LUKE VII. 19–30.

GOLDEN TEXT, JOHN V. 35.—'He was a burning and a shining light: and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light.' CONNECTION.—After the miracles considered in the preceding Lesson, our Lord goes up to Jerusalem to the Feast of the Jews, John v. i; probably the Passover. Returning to Galilee, He finally appoints His twelve Apostles and delivers the Sermon on the Mount (See Introductory Remarks on last week's Lesson). Then follow the healing of the Roman centurion's servant, and the raising of the widow's son at Nain (Christ's first miracle of raising from the dead. Somewhere near Nain, there meet Him messengers from John the Baptist.

I. JOHN'S APPEAL TO CHRIST.—Read vers. 19, 20. (See Matt. xi. 2, 3). John was now imprisoned in Machærus, a strong fortress at the S. extremity of Peræa, overlooking the Dead Sea (See Pictures from Bible Lands, p. 76). He was in the power of Herod Antipas, the frivolous, capricious, worthless tetrarch. For the reason of his imprisonment, see Mark vi. 17–20; as well as for the way in which Herod treated him, with alternate severity and deference. As in the case of Paul, Acts xxiv. 23, John's friends were permitted to come to see him, so that he had no difficulty in calling two of his disciples that he might send them to Jesus with his message. It was the greatest question which could be asked, then or at any time. Art Thou (lit.) the Coming One—He whom Israel expects, whom the world needs, the Messiah, the Promised Saviour? Or look we for another? Professed deliverers have before now appeared; but all to no purpose—is this to be only another disappointment?

But was it not wonderful that John should ask this question? He, of all men, must have known the answer. He—'the voice crying in the wilderness'—the Forerunner, who had seen 'the heavens opened, and the Spirit like a dove descending,' who had cried aloud, 'Behold the Lamb of God!' is it John, who now seems to question whether his life had not been a mistake? Some explain the matter by supposing that he asked, only for his disciples' sake, that their faith might be confirmed; others, that all he wished was to have Jesus to declare Himself. John hearing of 'the works of the Christ' (Matt.) is thought to have been anxious for some corresponding word that should arouse the whole nation to follow Him. But why propose any such explanation? John was but a man, at the best: and it is not wonderful if in that prison air even his faith and courage began to droop. In the open wilderness he could speak boldly to the multitudes; when face to face with Herod he could bravely rebuke the king. But to be shut up there—still a young man—cut off from his work—not permitted to follow the Master to whom he had borne witness—no earthly prospect before him but speedy death! In such circumstances gloomy thoughts might naturally steal in upon him. (To what Old Testament prophet is he likened? Did that prophet ever fail in courage and faith? See 1 Kings xix. 4.) Was it all true that he had been saying? Was Jesus indeed the promised Redeemer? From His own lips let the assurance come! And let the Master show that the servant, the forerunner, was not forgotten! With such a word of comfort John would even dare to die! Let us learn from all this to tell our doubts to Jesus, and to wait for the answer of His love.

II. CHRIST'S ANSWER TO JOHN.—Read vers. 21–23. The answer is practical. As though Jesus had said to these messengers, 'Wait, and see, and judge for yourselves.' So He cured many. Note the variety as well as the number of His miracles. Imagine the wonder of John's disciples as they looked, and felt at every fresh wonder, 'It is truly He! We look not for any other!' Then, turning to them, Jesus says: Go and tell John what things ye have seen and heard—wonder above wonder, even to the raising of the dead! Tell your master, if you can, of the joy of that mother to whom, at the gates of Nain, I gave her son, alive from the very borders of the tomb. And lastly, tell him this, as a greater and Diviner marvel still, that to the poor the gospel is preached.

Note here three main points for profitable thought. 1. Christ's appeal to Scripture. He plainly refers to passages from the prophet Isaiah (xxxv. 5; lxi. 1), which would be familiar to John. 'Open the prophetic roll; there read of Me; and doubt no more!' 2. His argument from His own works. This is what we term 'the argument from miracle:' never out of date. He who could perform such wonders must be from God. John iii. 2; ix. 32, 33; Acts ii. 22, etc. 3. The crowning miracle. A gospel, a gospel preached, a gospel preached to the poor—'beggars.'*

* There are two words for poverty in the New Testament, one denoting simple want of wealth (as of day-labourers), the other absolute destitution. The latter is the word used here. So ch. iv. 18; vi. 20, etc.

For the sake of this all other wondrous works were wrought. Here is the highest exercise of spiritual power, 1 Cor. i. 24, and the supreme proof of love reaching to the very lowest; —even the poor—the poor as well as the richer and wiser—truth so simple that they can understand it, love so tender that it reaches their hearts.

Then the Lord dismisses the messengers of John with a benediction, which is also a gentle reproof. Not to be offended, made to stumble, by the lowliness of Christ's condition, or by anything in His acts or words. See Isa. viii. 14, 15; Matt. xxi. 42; 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8, etc. 'Blessed is he who shall trust Me, even in spite of sorrow and persecution—he who shall believe that I know to the uttermost the will of Him that sent Me, and how and when to finish His work.' We may be sure that after these words and acts, John and his disciples would 'stumble' no more!

III. CHRIST'S WORDS ABOUT JOHN.—Read vers. 24–28. The disciples of Jesus and others standing by, may have been indignant that He should be interrupted with such a question. For John to doubt, or waver in his faith—how strange! how unworthy! Christ at once checks such thoughts by reminding the people, who had been accustomed to listen to the Baptist, how true and great he really was, in the most splendid eulogy ever breathed over mortal man (Farrar). A reed shaken with the wind? Nay, rather, but a cedar half uprooted by the storm! (Lange). Weak-minded people are easily moved, this way or that; but when the strong are shaken the conflict is terrible. Nor was there any softness or effeminacy in John. He who stood in his rough prophet's mantle in the wilderness, exhorting the people to repent, was noble in every sense. If you would seek such a man in the kings' courts, you must go to look for him in the palace dungeon, a martyr to the truth. But what was He? Let the people themselves declare what they went out for to see. No doubt they expected a prophet (ch. xxi. 26) and they were right. More than a prophet; because he did not only speak and write of the object of his prophecy, but himself beheld it in the coming of Christ. The messenger has more than a prophet's honour. Our Lord here quotes and applies to John the great prediction of Malachi iii. 1 (See Mark i. 2).

It is in this sense that we are to explain the Golden Text. A light, or luminary (lit. lamp). 'He was not that Light' (John i. 8), but shone with a borrowed glory, springing from Him who was to come. Such are all Christ's true servants (Phil. ii. 15). Note, the light is both shining and burning: it shines because it burns. There is such a thing as light without heat (like frosty moonlight), or heat without light, a dull fierce glare. So there are people who have the light of knowledge without the glow of love, others who have the heat of zeal without the brightness of wisdom or purity. The followers of Jesus should seek to combine all. He Himself can give no worthier character than this to His great forerunner. And the people were willing to rejoice in what they saw John to be—but for a season only. They did not abide in the truth he taught, and they rejected the Saviour to whom he bore witness. Let us see to it that we make the right use of the 'lights' that God has sent us to point the way to Himself.

One more word, which perhaps would have been a hard saying to John's disciples, had they stayed to hear it. John indeed was more than a prophet; yet less than the least in the kingdom of heaven. Not, certainly, in character, but in privilege and blessing. It is more to be a Christian child, knowing Jesus and His salvation, than to have been the greatest and wisest before He came. For, to be in the kingdom of heaven is to know the Gospel—the truth 'which kings and prophets waited for, and sought, but never found.' 'John, not inferior to any born of women; but these, even the least of them, born of another birth (John i. 12, 13; iii. 5). John, the nearest to the King and the Kingdom—standing on the threshold—but never having himself entered; these in the kingdom, subjects and citizens and indwellers of the realm; "whose citizenship is in heaven;" he, "the friend of the Bridegroom;" they, however weak and unworthy members, His Body and His Spouse' (Alford).

IV. THE EFFECT OF CHRIST'S WORDS.—Read vers. 29, 30 (not a continuation of Christ's words, but the historian's comment). Those of Christ's hearers who had been baptized with the baptism of John, owned the truth of what He had said, and justified God, i.e., accepted and approved His declarations (John iii. 33).

So God is said to be 'justified' in connection with His dealings with men; i.e., vindicated, or declared just, Rom. iii. 4; and Christ to be 'justified' in the Spirit, i.e., vindicated in His true character as a Saviour, through the Divine Spirit that was in Him (1 Tim. iii. 16).

This class of hearers specially included publicans (ch. iii. 12; Matt. xxi. 32); while those, who, like the Pharisees and lawyers (teachers of the law), had disdained John's baptism, now in the same spirit rejected Christ's testimony. This testimony was nothing less than the counsel, or plan of God against, or with reference to themselves. How great their sin! How sure their ruin!

QUESTIONS.

1. What various motives may we suppose to have prompted the Baptist's message to Jesus?
2. Give passages in which the title of 'the coming One' is applied to Christ.
3. The question is asked of us also, whether Jesus is indeed the Divine Saviour. How may we best answer it?
4. Show that the spiritual work of Christ, wrought through the preaching of His Gospel, is the greatest of His works.
5. In what passages are Christians said to be lights of the world, and in what sense?
6. What did our Lord mean by the saying with which He closed His discourse, Wisdom is justified of all her children?

MILDRED MAYHEW'S PEARLS.

A STATE drawing-room was to be held, and amidst the crowd assembled to catch a sight of the grand carriages, and their nobly-born occupants an eager little face, full of expectancy and wonder, attracted the notice of near spectators, and drew forth the remark, "She looks as if she could see them all without envy."

Mildred Mayhew (for that was the child's name), heard this speech, and stowed it away for future deliberation. After long patient waiting, the first carriage appeared, and was quickly followed by a second and a third, and others too numerous for Mildred's power of counting.

Ladies, dressed as became their high position, were seated within the richly-appointed vehicles—ladies of all ages and of different styles of countenance and beauty. But for one particular carriage, for one particular lady, Mildred evidently watched; and so rivetted was her attention on this carriage and its lady when they arrived, that she had to blink away the stiffness from her eyes when they had passed from view, before she recovered sight for the rest of the pageant.

The lady that thus attracted Mildred was young and singularly beautiful, with a calm, gentle, happy expression on her fair face; whilst her soft auburn hair, which glistened in a ray of sunlight that shone through the open window, appeared to the onlookers as clusters of fine golden thread. But it was neither on the fair young face, with its exquisite beauty, nor the sunny hair that Mildred's gaze was rivetted, but on—what, do you think? The ornaments that decked those locks, and were suspended from that snowy neck. The ornaments were pearls, costly pearls, with a ruby pendant here and there. This much Mildred knew at a glance, for, although herself in great poverty through an intemperate father, she had an aunt living in a "great family," and this aunt had, by permission, often showed her young niece some of the jewels belonging to her mistress; but none excited the little girl's admiration so much as a set of pearls that lay in a casket lined with purple velvet.

To see this carefully fetched, slowly opened, and its contents displayed, was one of the pleasures Mildred anticipated in going to the mansion. This pleasure she was enjoying one day, and whilst standing in rapt delight over the jewel-case, she felt a hand laid gently on her shoulder, and heard a musical voice, saying:

"And what does Mildred think of these fine things?"

Mildred started, for it was a strange voice, and turning round she saw the beautiful lady of the carriage, who was none other than her aunt's youngest mistress, lately returned from an educational tour of three years. This accounts for Mildred's non-recognition of Lady Gertrude on the day of the Queen's drawing-room.

"Oh, your ladyship, I'm so proud to see you again! You are the lady with the lovely pearls, I'm sure."

"Yes, Mildred, and I saw the little eager face that watched for me."

"Please your ladyship it was the pearls I was looking out for. Aunt Stapleton didn't tell me you were back again—she only told me to be sure and look out for a young lady dressed in beautiful pearls. I didn't——"

Here Mrs. Stapleton interposed. "Your dear young ladyship will not heed a child's prattle."

"I like it; it does one good to hear the truth sometimes. Where so many tell me they are looking at me, it is refreshing to hear one little voice say, 'I am looking at your pearls.'"

And Lady Gertrude bent kindly towards Mildred, asking—"And what do you think of them?"

"Oh, your ladyship, I'd give ever so much to have just one, if it was only the tiniest!"

"And what would you do with it?"

"Oh, please your ladyship. I'd wear it round my neck to hang down where I could always see it."

"Milly, what are you thinking of?" exclaimed her aunt.

"Oh, I forgot I wasn't a lady, so I couldn't wear one."

"Yes, you could, Mildred; you need not be a lady to wear pearls. I know a very poor old woman who lives in a workhouse and never gets out of bed, and yet she wears the most lovely pearl I have ever seen."

"And please your ladyship" (Mildred's aunt never allowed her to speak to her mistress without using the title, which it gave her so much pleasure to use), "and please your ladyship, doesn't it make her very happy?"

"It does indeed! Whilst the other old people too often grumble and wish for a different lot than that God has appointed them, this dear old soul clasps her pearl to her heart and smiles so pleasantly. Before I knew she had this treasure, I wondered how she could look so cheerful and contented, shut in by four bare walls and so full of pain; and one day I asked how it was. Shall I tell you her answer, Mildred? I can never forget it."

"If it please your ladyship," replied the child in duly instructed form.

"'Cheerful!' she cried; 'why not, ma'am?'"

"She did not know my lady was a ladyship, I suppose!" said Aunt Stapleton, looking disapprovingly towards her niece.

"Perhaps not," smiled Lady Gertrude, "but that was of no consequence; the honour was in her speaking to me, as she is a daughter of royalty, though lying bed-ridden on workhouse straw."

Mysteries thickened, and poor little Mildred was fairly bewildered between the pearl in a pauper's possession, that pauper, as she imagined, being a grand lady in disguise, and the possibility of her being so happy in her low estate; but, obeying a nod from her aunt, she kept silence.

"We should all be happier," said Lady Gertrude, "if like my pauper friend, who was more astonished at my doubting her cheerfulness than I even at witnessing it;" and the speaker paused, as if to give both her hearers time to reflect a moment, then proceeded with her story of crippled Kate, as she was called.

"'Cheerful, why not, ma'am?'" ("ladyship!" muttered Stapleton). "'I have everything I need, though not everything my foolish heart wishes for. Contented!' and the dear old soul laughed in her joy—'why, ma'am, there isn't any one in the squire's open house as is better off nor me, nor got a finer look-out. For all that the lower glass is darkened over, I can see out of the top as I lie here. And day-times I catch a glimpse of God's own dear blue sky, and night-times I see a star a twinkling now and then, and oh, it do make me happy, sure enough, to think of what's up yonder for even such a poor old body as crippled Kate!' What do you think of her, my child?" asked Lady Gertrude.

Mildred did not reply until the question was repeated, when she said slowly, as though half doubting the words she spoke:

"Please your ladyship, when I went to see the queen's drawing-room I heard a woman say when I was delighted, 'She don't seem like to envy,' and I didn't one bit, but seems I could wish to be like the old woman in the house."

She glanced towards her aunt to see if she had been too bold, but Lady Gertrude quickly replied:

"You may wish it, dear, and I hope you will try to be like her, for wishing and trying must go together, and that will, by God's blessing, make you both cheerful and contented."

"I asked Kate if she had the comforts her age and infirmities required. Oh, Stapleton, her answer humbled me to the very dust. She said, looking more cheerful than ever, 'I have all the Lord promised and sees fit to give me, and that must be all I require. He promised bread and pure water; I have that and many a good thing too. He promised to make all my bed in my sickness; He does that too, or my poor old bones couldn't lie so easy here from week's end to week's end. He promised 'never to leave me nor forsake me;' and blessed be His holy name, a truer word never cheered a poor lone body like me. And oh, ma'am, my treasure's best of all,' and she clasped her precious pearl again to her heart."

Here Mildred's eagerness could no longer be restrained, even by her aunt's gesticulations, and she exclaimed; "Oh, please your ladyship, how did she get it? Was her husband a sailor like Uncle Dick, and brought it to her over the sea?"

"No, Mildred; she sold all she had and bought it."

"Is it as lovely as your ladyship's pearls?"

"A thousand times lovelier, and cost a thousand times more, Mildred."

"How could she buy it when she had so little money?" This was said in a half whisper as if to herself, then, struck by a sudden thought, Mildred exclaimed: "Why, if so little will buy it, I may be able to buy one when I am older."

"Shall I tell you a secret, Mildred? The price of the pearl is not what you've not got, but just what you have—if you give all you have, that is the price; but you shall come to my boudoir to-morrow, and hear all about the pearl, where you can get it, how you can get it, and what you must do with it, There is the warning gong sounding, I must dress for dinner."

"Will your ladyship wear the pearls to-night?" asked Stapleton.

"Yes," and then, in a low voice, she added to Milly; "and always the one pearl, I hope. Good-night, my child, come to me to-morrow."

"Yes, thank your ladyship."

The next day, when Lady Gertrude and Mildred were alone, the subject was resumed with mutual pleasure.

"It is the deep, deep sea of God's love," said Lady Gertrude, "in which this beautiful pearl is found." And she went on to explain her meaning, increasing first the wonder of her youthful listener by the assurance that she too might obtain this pearl of great price, salvation through Jesus Christ, with a quiet trustful and contented spirit, worth more than all things else in this world. In one place the Bible says, "Buy the truth;" in another, "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire." The pearl of price is set in this tried gold, and the gold is set with this pearl, they are inseparable, in the casket of Divine grace; therein finding one we find the other, in buying one we buy the other. Now, God's holy word would not tell us to buy this treasure, so priceless as far as our payment goes, if He knew there was no wherewith to come before Him. Do you ask, "Do I possess this price? Can I buy the pearl and tried gold?" All you have is of no value in comparison; but Jesus Christ has paid the price by which we may claim it. The pearl and gold are both offered, accept them on the gospel terms, give yourself, body, soul, and spirit, into the hands of the Saviour, and you will never repent the bargain; you will remember the day on which you closed with it as a red-letter day in your spiritual life, ay, and in your temporal life also, for the pearl worn within the soul is a talisman to protect us from evil and the wiles of the devil; whilst the gold enriches us with riches that cannot take to themselves wings and fly away.

So the quiet talk went on.

Mildred lived to find this treasure, nor did she wrap it from sight; others saw that she had it, and rejoiced with her: it was said of little Mildred, "It must be a real possession, because it makes her so happy."

"I've found the pearl of greatest price;
My heart doth sing for joy—
And sing I must, a Christ I have,
All gold without alloy."

THE Rev. T. Pelham Dale, whose arrest and imprisonment for contempt and contumacy, committed against the Arches Court of Canterbury, we mentioned last month (p. 80), was brought up lately before the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice on a writ of Habeas Corpus. Four rules (including that for the writ) had been obtained from the Queen's Bench, and now that Mr. Dale appeared before the Court in the custody of the Governor of Holloway Prison, the case came on for argument as to whether these rules should be made absolute or should be dismissed. The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General appeared for Lord Penzance, instructed by the Treasury, to support his jurisdiction and authority. Mr. Charles, Q.C., moved for the discharge of Mr. Dale from custody on a number of grounds, all of a technical character. He was followed by the other counsel on behalf of the prisoner; the arguments on the other side, led by the Attorney-General, were next heard; and Mr. Charles exercised his right of reply. These proceedings occupied five days. Judgment was afterwards given by the Lord Chief Justice and his learned colleagues. The four main points urged by Mr. Dale's counsel had been: 1. That Lord Penzance had not taken the oaths and signed the Thirty-nine Articles, as required by the Canons; 2. That the Bishop of Exeter could not act legally both for the Bishop of London and the Archbishop of Canterbury as alternate patrons of St. Vedast; 3. That the monition and inhibition were technically inaccurate; 4. That Lord Penzance had not statutory powers to enforce his judgment by imprisonment. One after another of these objections were relentlessly and positively swept away by the lucid judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. His lordship, after disposing of the "highly technical" objections taken to the jurisdiction of Lord Penzance, and the language of the requisition, monition, and prohibition, none of which were held to have any validity, proceeded to consider "the one point of substance in the case." He said: "It seemed possible that Parliament might never have contemplated the possibility of clergymen belonging to the Establishment deliberately disobeying and defying the law of their society pronounced by the highest Court of Appeal in the country, and claiming for their disobedience to the law the sanction of conscience and the credit of virtue. For these are not 'the weightier matters of the law—judgment, and mercy, and faith'—but, at the best, points of mere ceremonial observance—points on which, prior to experience, it would be difficult to believe that any man could persuade himself that disobedience to the law could be excusable; and I should be disposed to say, if the statute stood alone, that Parliament had not conceived it possible that there would be disobedience, and would have assumed that the clergy, like other men, would obey the law of their country, and so might not have provided any means to enforce obedience. But the statute does not stand alone. . . . Lord Penzance was made an Ecclesiastical Judge in an Ecclesiastical Court, and in this case the party was brought before him and duly cited, and a lawful order was made, with which the party was required to comply, and he has refused to pay obedience to that lawful order." His judgment, therefore, was for the Crown and for Lord Penzance. Mr. Justice Field gave an elaborate judgment to a similar effect. Mr. Justice Manisty, in declaring a similar view, appealed to the clergy to consider whether they ought not, as good citizens, to resign the benefices if they could not obey, and become Nonconformists. The Rev. T. P. Dale then left the court in custody for prison. The case of the Rev. R. W. Enraght, Vicar of Holy Trinity, Bordesley, was next called on, but it was a precise repetition of Mr. Dale's, with the addition of two purely formal points, on which Mr. Charles was heard, but which the Bench at once, and without the slightest hesitation, dismissed. In this case, therefore, the result was the continued detention of Mr. Enraght in Warwick Gaol. On a subsequent day notice was given of appeal in the Court of Appeal, in both the above cases. The Lord Chancellor and other judges, who heard the application, consented to the defendants being released on their own bail till the cases shall come on for hearing, on condition that nothing be done by them during the interval in contravention of the inhibition by Lord Penzance. Mr. Dale gave this undertaking in writing, and was released; but it was refused by Mr. Enraght, who therefore continued in prison.

In the Arches Court of Canterbury sentence has been pronounced in the suit against the Rev. J. B. De la Bere (formerly John Edwards), Vicar of Prestbury, near Cheltenham. He had been suspended by this Court for using an illegal ritual, and had disregarded the order of suspension, continuing all the time his illegal practices. In giving judgment, Lord Penzance said Mr. De la Bere had deliberately set at nought the Statute of Uniformity, the Ecclesiastical Law, the Canons of the Church the authority of his Bishop and of the Court, his own vow at his ordination, and his written promise on his institution. He must, therefore, be deprived of his office and benefice.

A CONVERSAZIONE was lately given by the British and Foreign Bible Society in the Bible House, Queen Victoria-street, when a large number of members and their friends assembled to meet some of the continental agents of the Society. The year now closed is the jubilee year of this Society's continental agency work, which began with the appointment of Dr. Pinkerton to Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1830. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided. Mr. Edward Millard, of Vienna, who entered the service thirty-four years ago, gave an account of the work done in the district under his charge, which includes Austria, Bohemia, Galicia, Poland, Hungary, Servia, Bosnia, and Roumania. M. Gustave Monod, of Paris, mentioned reasons for believing that France at present offered a hopeful field for the Society's work. Mr. W. H. Kirkpatrick, of Brussels, who has been the Society's agent in Belgium for sixteen years, stated that, advantage had been taken of the National Exhibition at Brussels this year to sell a large number of Testaments and parts of the Scriptures at reduced prices. The Rev. George Palmer Davies, of Berlin, who has superintended the Society's work in Germany and Switzerland for nearly twenty-four years, reported the marked progress of the work under his agency.

THE quiet old cathedral city of Canterbury has been stirred as perhaps it has never been stirred before, since Reformation days, by a general mission, the venerable cathedral having been the head-quarters of the movement. Night after night, almost all the nine or ten churches which took part in the mission were crowded, while in the cathedral the gatherings were so large, that it was found necessary to move from the choir to the nave, where a vast concourse of people were collected night by night to hear the Gospel from the Rev. W. H. Aitken. The mission was commenced on a Saturday with a general communion service for all the churches, in the cathedral, when the Bishop of Dover preached a very useful and appropriate sermon, and by a similar evening service, when Mr. Aitken was the preacher. On the Sunday afternoon, Mr. Aitken commenced the mission in the cathedral, when an overflowing congregation was gathered in the choir of the grand old edifice. That evening it was again crowded, after the other services had been dismissed, at half-past eight, by a congregation of men only; and the recollection of that sight will not soon pass away from the memory of those who witnessed it. On the following Tuesday, the numbers attending the evening service were so great that it was thought advisable to employ the nave. The services were regularly attended by the Dean, who, with Bishop Oxenham and the Bishop of Dover, did all that could be thought of to make the arrangement as complete as possible. The cathedral officials entered into the work with very good spirit, taking a great deal of extra trouble with the utmost possible cheerfulness. At the close of each service Mr. Aitken gave a short address to those who remained to the after-meeting, and then invited any who were really anxious to follow him to the north of the choir, where he has held conversation with a considerable and increasing number of seeking souls each night. From the other churches similar and encouraging accounts have been heard. Since the conclusion of his mission in Canterbury, Mr. Aitken has been delivering some highly effective addresses to "City men" in that quarter of London which has as its centre the Royal Exchange and the Bank of England.

Two hundred thieves—not all thieves; some of them Christian men earning honest wages, but who were thieves at periods varying from a few weeks to four years ago—sat down together to supper, a few evenings since, at the St. Giles' Christian Mission, Great Wild Street, Drury Lane. When they assembled afterwards for the anniversary meeting, Mr. Flowers, the magistrate of Bow Street, took the chair. Mr. George Hatton briefly stated the origin and progress of the rescue work among these men. Joshua Poole was preaching here for many successive nights in February, 1877. Many of the criminal classes formed part of the audiences, and at the close of one meeting two of them remained, and expressed their desire to lead a new life. Hence the effort which followed. The number of cases taken in hand has been 1,314; the far larger number of whom were sent to sea, found employment for on land, sent to various "Homes," sent abroad (outfit, passage-money, and all other expenses being borne by the Mission), or were relieved with money, clothes, tools, etc. Mr. Wheatley then read some touching letters from men and boys who had been helped into honest work on sea or land, and some of whom had been converted to God. Mr. Flowers spoke of his own early days, and his sympathy with the poor, not one of whom in his own neighbourhood he did not know as well as his own brothers and sisters. The Rev. George Playford, chaplain of Holloway Prison, spoke with indignation of the music-halls as sinks of iniquity, and said that a fourth of the prisoners attribute their fall to being drawn into them. Another pernicious influence was the fearful literature—foul, abominable, filthy—which teems from the press, and is a fruitful source of crime. The speaker spoke at some length, words full of sympathy and gospel truth. The Rev. Lloyd Jones, Chaplain of Newgate, followed with a few words of counsel and exhortation. The two men who stayed behind in February, 1877, and expressed their wish to lead a new life, then spoke. One of them is a missionary in the suburbs, and God has blessed him to the salvation of many souls. He meets the scoffers with the question, "Did you ever do anything to lift up a fallen man?" They are obliged to say, "No." It was the men who loved Jesus who had raised him up and helped him to earn an honest living. Others of the rescued men spoke.

THE National Council of the Congregational Churches of the United States was held in the city of St. Louis, towards the close of last year. The Rev. Henry M. Dexter, D.D., of Boston, was chosen Moderator. The Council was the fourth in the triennial series. One of the principal subjects which occupied the attention of the Council had reference to suggestions for a new statement or embodiment of the faith of the churches, to take the place of the Savoy Confession of 1658, and of others which, in many points, fail to express the living beliefs of to-day. After discussion, it was resolved that a committee or commission, consisting of twenty-five able, godly, and learned men should be appointed, who should be requested to prepare a Confession of Faith, not to be reported back to the Council, but to be reported to the churches for their careful consideration and adoption, if they should see fit to adopt it. In the course of the proceedings the Rev. A. Hannay, of London (Secretary of the Congregational Union of England and Wales), addressed the Council, and was received with great cordiality. Shortly after his return to London, Mr. Hannay was welcomed at a public meeting convened for that purpose at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, and gave an account of his visit to the Congregational Churches of the United States.

MISSIONARY prospects in Uganda, in Central Africa, are reported as not very promising. Dr. Emin-Bey writes to the "Mittheilungen" that the King Mtesa had held a great council, at which it was resolved to prohibit the English and French missionaries from teaching, and to punish with death any native of the country who listened to them. The Mohammedan religion was condemned at the same time, and ancient customs are to be adhered to. The assembled chiefs were of opinion that they required no religious teachers in Uganda, but guns, powder, and percussion-caps. One of the English missionaries wrote to Dr. Emin that the king refused to listen to anything they had to say. Mtesa had relapsed into his savagery, and sacrificed two hundred human beings on the grave of his ancestors. Dr. Emin, who had repeatedly visited Uganda, is about to write a paper on that country. The "Academy" learns from another source that King Mtesa, having been cured of some disorder by Father Lourdel, exhibited greater kindness to the Roman Catholic missionaries than before, and that they were able to baptise several adults.

WE regret to record the decease of the Rev. C. M. Birrell, one of the most able and most respected ministers of the Baptist denomination. He was for more than thirty years pastor of the congregation meeting at Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, but had long been compelled to relinquish that post by failing health. Mr. Birrell was gifted both as a preacher and writer. Prominent among his works are the "Life of the Rev. Richard Knill," and the "Life of Dr. Brock."

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

PASSAGES OF SPRING.

From the sod no crocus peeps,
And the snowdrop scarce is seen,
And the daffodil yet sleeps
In its radiant sheath of green;
Yet the naked groves among
Is an homeless music heard,
And a welcoming is sung,
Till the leafless boughs are stirred
With a spirit and a life
Which is floating all around.

PARABLES CONCERNING SPRING.

BY PROFESSOR GAUSSEN.

I.

"And with many such parables spake He the word unto them, as they were able to hear it. But without a parable spake He not unto them: and when they were alone, He expounded all things to his disciples."—Mark iv. 33, 34.

WHAT magnificent scenes are those of the spring-time! What a ravishing spectacle is that of the weeks which too soon pass away! Those days in which nature revives, in which life succeeding death penetrates everywhere; in which the Spirit of God, vivifying all things, makes itself felt at once in the fields, on the hills, in the recesses of the forests, in the depth of the valleys, and up to the tops of the mountains; in which millions of living beings burst forth every minute into the air, upon the earth, and in the waters that are under the earth; in which, on all sides, delicate plants, enriched with the brilliant colours of life, and coming forth from a soil formerly frozen, seem to open it by the sole attraction of their freshness and beauty!

What a privilege is yours, happy inhabitants of these rural districts, who live, who walk, who work beneath this beautiful vault of heaven, upon this carpet of flowers, in the midst of these fields and these hills, this foliage, and these orchards, where are made manifest with so much grace and magnificence the wisdom, the power, and the goodness of God the Creator!

Oh! what intelligent mind, what imagination among men would not be moved at a spectacle so grand, and not adore Him who gives life to all things, and before whom the whole army of heaven prostrates itself in reverence?

"Thy works beyond compare
The wond'ring nations see,
Admire Thy marvels great,
Though distant they may be.

From where the sun comes forth,
And brightness to us brings,
To regions where he sets,
Thy goodness Nature sings.

O'er all the grassy plains
The shepherds now rejoice,
And hills and slopes around
Break forth in cheerful voice."

Yes, without doubt, all men are moved at these great scenes of the creation, but they have for the Christian mind a language quite peculiar; they convey to the believer sensations which he alone can feel; they give him instruction, they reveal to him consolations, they procure for him joys which he alone can know.

These scenes of nature, even when not explained by the words of Christ, doubtless excite emotion. They may even affect to tears, but they do not change the heart; they do not change the desires, nor unite them to God. It is only the gospel of Christ which can work such miracles; and, as St. Paul said (1 Cor. i. 21), "the world by wisdom knew not God." It is only to the Christian that the scenes of nature and the language of the seasons, instead of being only beautiful poetry, and causing but vague emotions, become an instructive book, and, so to say, a voice from God, which edifies him, which instructs him, which consoles him, and which elevates him to eternal hopes. The believer, knowing that this beautiful world came forth from the same hand that gave him the Bible, and that it was created by Christ and for Christ (Col. i. 16), searches in it, and discovers in it every day new relations between the God of nature and the God of the gospel. He discovers in it, as in a beautiful picture, the truths which have caused the joy of his heart, and he regards it as a Divine but mysterious book, of which the book of the gospel has revealed to him the secrets, and made its language to be understood.

It is of this truth that I purpose to remind you now, my brethren. I wish to show you, by a small number of examples, how the inhabitant of the country, when he is really a Christian, may make use in turn of all the scenes of nature to remind himself of his Saviour, and of his hopes; and how this world becomes in his eyes a magnificent collection of parables of things invisible which are eternal. In a word, I propose to recall some of the parables of spring, if I may so speak; and it is with this thought that I have taken for my text those words by which St. Mark indicates the manner in which the Saviour gave his instructions, whilst He was yet on the earth. I shall apply them to the lessons which He does not cease to give us in nature. He taught many things by parables; He did not speak to the multitude without parables; but He explained everything to his disciples.

Yes, I wish to show you that if the book of nature is open to all men, the true disciple alone, "to whom his Master explains in private all these things," knows how to gather Divine instruction from them. Others perceive in them only magnificent pictures. And, just as a sensitive man, who had witnessed the return of the prodigal son to the house of his father, might have shed tears at the sight of this old man and his son, without however having at all found out that this touching scene was intended to present to us the image of mercies greater than paternal with which God our Saviour receives into his arms the penitent and praying sinner; so also men who contemplate the spectacle of the country and of spring, yet without having the living doctrine of Jesus Christ in their hearts, may admire with emotion the richness, the magnificence and the goodness of the God of nature; but they cannot go beyond this, in understanding in these scenes of spring the parables, and the mysterious sense which the God of grace has been pleased to conceal in them.

Oh, may I, then, by my suggestions help you to read anew the Bible in the admirable scenes of creation; may my words dispose you to approach continually your God by evangelical thoughts in the midst of these beautiful places where his goodness has caused you to live, and even in the course of those labours which remove so many others from peace and from the Lord! May these wondrous works of nature and their touching language speak to all your hearts; and may He who gives spiritual intelligence teach you every day more and more to acknowledge Him everywhere, to see Him everywhere, and hear Him everywhere!

And in the first place, it is important to remember here that at all times from the earliest days of the world the God of revelation has judged it proper to instruct us by figures, by types, by parables; and this for reasons which are easy to be understood.

If you call to remembrance his Divine dispensation in the Old Testament, you will everywhere find this figurative manner of revealing sacred truths. There are types and parables in all the ordinances of the Levitical worship, in all parts of the Temple, in the sacred Ark, and the Mercy-seat, in the distinction of things pure and impure, in the institution of sacrifices by blood, in the rite of the passover, and in circumcision, in the day of atonement, and in the cities of refuge. There are parables and types even in the real events and varied circumstances of the people of God; in the lives of the patriarchs and of the prophets, in the history of Joseph, in the captivity in Egypt, in the passage of the Red Sea, in the journey of the desert, in the conquest and possession of Canaan, in the shipwreck and deliverance of Jonah, in the healing of the people through the brazen serpent. "I have spoken parables by the mouth of the prophets," said the Eternal (Hosea xii. 10). And when the "Word made flesh" appeared on the earth, when the Saviour himself descended into the midst of men to instruct them, "He opened his mouth again in parables," according to the predictions of the prophet Asaph (Psa. lxxviii. 2). He did not speak to them without parables, said St. Mark, but apart, or privately, he explained everything to his disciples.

Well, my brethren, it is in the same manner still that this Divine Master has been pleased that all the works of creation, and all the scenes of the country shall serve to recall to you the truths of his word of life, and the things which appertain to our eternal peace.

If I were only to name the diverse parables that our Saviour in the gospels has drawn from the objects and labours of the country, what should I not have to tell you? A fig-tree, that brings forth no fruit, and that the curse of the Lord has made to wither even to the roots; another that for a long time has brought forth no fruit, and which its master spares for another year, at the request of the husbandman; a vine, tenderly cared for, and for which there is nothing that its master has not done; a vine-branch, which cannot bring forth fruit if it does not remain in the vine; a sheep that goes forth from the fold, that strays, that is lost, and that the Good Shepherd goes to seek until He has found it; the Good Shepherd who gives his life for his sheep, and whose sheep hear his voice; a man, who has put his hand to the plough, but who looks behind him; a sower, whose precious seed falls by the way-side, on rocky ground, among thorns, and upon good ground; reapers that represent the angels at the end of the world that gather in the harvest, and collect the tares in order to cast them into the furnace of fire.

But I leave for the present these instructions so rich and striking, and I now only propose to recall to your remembrance the two great doctrines of the parables of the spring-time, I mean the regeneration of the soul in this life, and the resurrection of the body on the last day. And first let us treat of the former subject.

What a mournful spectacle the country presented some weeks ago! A thick covering of snow, extending over the land, exhibited to our minds only a monotonous appearance of sterility and death; all the colours of life had disappeared; the singing of the birds had ceased, their voice was frozen silent in the cold; the mountains showed us only one vast icy range, which seemed to make eternal the winter of nature; the earth, benumbed and frozen, was like stone; and even if the spade of the labourer could have broken it, and covered it with the best of seed, it would have remained insensible, like a corpse at the earnest voice of a friend that calls it by its name and that cries to it in vain. A melancholy silence reigned over the plains; there was heard in our forests, despoiled of their foliage, only the friction of branches, and the rustling of withered leaves moved by the mournful sighing of the winds. Over this scene of distress the breath of the north raged with violence, pursued man even unto his retreat, chilled him at the side of his hearth, and seemed willing to extinguish even those remains of heat and of life that he had preserved. Around us, everything was motionless, everything seemed stricken by death; and man alone seemed, so to say, to be living in the midst of all these regions, only to assist at the death of creation.

But, in the midst of this distress of nature, above the rush of winds whose freezing blast and whose groans appeared at the same time to pity and threaten the earth, an object, a single object, still preserved for our eyes its original beauty. Above our heads, beyond our frosts and storms, the heaven had preserved its brightness and its purity. The stars were continuing their course with the same order and in the same majesty. We saw that the earth alone had suffered. The sun indeed was gone to vivify another hemisphere; he was casting on us only oblique rays, often intercepted ones, and nearly void of heat; he shone for us, but after long nights; and we might have said, that if he still shed on us his brightness, it was much less to warm us and to give us life, than to reveal to us the death of nature, and to teach us that winter had taken about us the place of the perpetual spring which, before the revolt and fall of man, Eden enjoyed. What a faithful image of the state of man since the fall! What a striking picture of the misery to which sin has reduced the soul; of its desolation, of its barrenness, coldness for God, and distance from the Sun of Righteousness!

Yes, winter is naturally in the heart of man as to the things of God; winter has entered into our souls; the word of God declares it to us on every page. And observe here, I shall not pretend to establish the truths of our faith by reasonings or by analogies; never shall I appeal for that but to the holy Bible.

If then I speak to you about the parables of nature, it is not to convince you, it is not to find in them new truths; it is to make more evident and striking to you those which God our Saviour has directly and clearly revealed to you in his word of life. It is to incline you, I say again, to reflect often in the midst of your fields, and among the scenes of the country, on the necessities of your souls and on things invisible, which are eternal. I would wish to teach you to read over, so to speak, your Bible in the pictures of creation.

Scripture declares it to us, the winter is come into our souls. "By one man," says St. Paul, "sin entered into the world and death by sin." "We were formerly," says he again, and speaking to true Christians, "dead in trespasses and sins;" we were "without strength:" we were "enemies of God;" at a distance from Him by our thoughts and our misdeeds; we were by nature children of wrath, even as others; incapable of all good works, because we did not love God, and because in the presence of God, who tries the reins and the consciences of men, without that love we are nothing.

Yes, tell it me rather yourselves, my dear brethren, has it not often befallen you, when thinking on these things, to say to yourselves: "My God, my God! why do I find myself so cold and languishing in Thy service? Why is it not always my greatest pleasure to speak about Thee, to be occupied for Thee, O my Creator, my Master, my Preserver, the God of all goodness? Why am I so soon tired of raising my heart to Thee, of hearing Thy word, of singing Thy praises? Why am I so often all on fire for the things of the world, and all in ice for those of heaven? Was it thus, then, that my soul came from the hands of a God who is all love? Is this then the heart that He made for me at first? Has He given me a feeling heart to be forgetful of Him so easily, this God of all mercy, the only source of all goodness, the author of every perfect gift? Did my soul then come forth from his hands covered with snow and ice! No, no, I see it, I feel it, winter has entered into my soul; a breath of death has penetrated it."

Poor human heart! see then what thou art in thy nature: at a distance from the Sun of Righteousness, without vital heat, like the snow which the frosts have hardened; cold and sterile as to the true ends of thy existence, and as to thy relations with thy God; tormented by the passions; without true peace in life, without solid hope in death; and, too often, like volcanic mountains, covered with snow on the side of heaven, and filled with fire on the side of earth.

Who then can be saved? asked the apostles of their Master. Our Saviour solemnly cast his looks around him upon each of them, and said to them, "With men it is impossible, but with God all things are possible" (Mark x. 27; Luke xviii. 27).

"With men impossible"! When the land was still buried under the snow, when the penetrating cold had frozen the depths of the soil, when the trees, stript of their foliage, were in appearance as dead as the wood which you cast into your fires; the land abandoned to its own strength, could it, I ask you, have broken those links, melted the frost, and taken to itself life again? Left to itself, was it not condemned to remain captive in the chains of an ever-increasing sterility?

Was not the omnipotence of God necessary to bring it out of this state of death? Did it not need that the sun of this world, approaching our hemisphere, should dart his rays upon it, and come to pour again over nature floods of life and of heat?

Well, such is also the winter of our souls. It cannot terminate by your own strength. Left to yourselves, you would become colder every day; and you cannot bring on yourselves the motion of life, nor the fruitfulness of the soul: "This is impossible with man," as our Saviour has said. But we know that He has also said, that nothing is impossible with God. No, no, there is nothing but the rising of this Sun of Righteousness (Malachi iv. 2) with healing in his wings, there is nothing but the sight and knowledge of the God-man crucified for us, which can make cease in us the reign of darkness. It is necessary, according to the expression of Zachariah, that the Dayspring from on high should visit us; to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, and to guide our feet into the way of peace (Luke i. 78, 79).

In order that a soul should rise from this death, it must receive, as an apostle has expressed it, "the light of the knowledge of the grace of God, in the person of Jesus Christ"; it must turn to Jesus, who is to his Church what the sun is to the world; it must see all Divine perfections in the Son of God dying for it; it must see its own misery, and recognise also the holiness, the purity, the justice of God, and, above all, that great compassion by which "He so loved the world that He gave his only-begotten Son for the world." For he who regards the Son, our Saviour has said, and who believes in Him, hath eternal life; he has passed from death to life. In a word, the soul must give itself up to this appeal: "All ye ends of the earth look to Me and be saved."

It is only then, it is then, that it "will bring forth fruit, like the palm-tree, and that it will grow like the cedar of Lebanon, being planted in the house of the Eternal, and flourishing in the courts of our God." It is then that "the desert and the dry places shall rejoice, that the solitary place shall be glad, and that it shall flourish like the rose."

A VOICE FROM BASUTOLAND.

WE have before us the official report of the proceedings of a "Pitso," or annual gathering of the Basutos and other native tribes in British Basutoland. This assembly, or "Folkmote," as we might call it, was the last before the outbreak of the Basuto war. It was held at Maseru on the 16th and 17th October, 1879. The number of natives present was probably eight thousand, the estimate of eyewitnesses varying from six to ten thousand, including all the chiefs and heads of tribes. The occasion was of unusual importance, the Colonial Secretary and Prime Minister of Cape Colony, the Hon. J. Gordon Spriggs, being there in his official capacity, along with Colonel Griffith, the Governor's agent and chief magistrate, five other magistrates of various districts, a large number of Europeans engaged in trade, and many farmers from the Free State. Mr. Rolland, inspector of native schools, acted as interpreter.

Most of the missionaries of the Paris Evangelical Society were present, and in connection with their presence the meeting has to us a significance far above any passing political interest. By the labours of these good men for more than forty years, the people of Basutoland, while only comparatively few are professed Christians, have been raised to a high level of intelligence and character, as the proceedings at this meeting will show. A large proportion of the youth of the land are being educated at Christian schools, with the consent of their parents. The native converts are numerous, and not only support their own stations, but contribute to mission-work beyond their border. When a large number of Basutos were at the diamond fields they built two churches and had native ministers. In Cape Colony they are among the most orderly workmen. In their own country they are industrious and eager for improvement. In one year they purchased three hundred ploughs to displace ruder tools of husbandry. That we should be at war with such people is a calamity which could only be the result of sad misunderstanding, if not of unfortunate mismanagement.

The proceedings opened by the Rev. A. Mabille, one of the missionaries, offering a short prayer. Colonel Griffith then saluted Letsie, the chief paramount, and the other chiefs and people, and introduced Mr. Spriggs as the Queen's representative and Colonial Secretary.

An address was then read, of which the following is a literal translation:

"To the Honourable J. Gordon Spriggs, Colonial Secretary.

"I, the Chief Letsie, together with my brothers and headmen of the Lesuto, have been informed by our honourable Governor, C. D. Griffith, C.M.G,, that you have the desire to visit our country and to investigate our affairs, and to see all that relates to us, and to be present at the annual national gathering. This has greatly rejoiced us. What especially rejoices us is that to-day, although we have formerly been visited by Governors, this is the first time we see the Prime Minister of the Government to which we are attached, and we therefore hope that when you have inspected all you desire to see and know, we shall have a faithful witness before all men, who will openly declare that we are truly the Queen's children.

"We could desire that you, sir, should travel through our country, and see our dwellings and our fields, how restricted we are, and the extent to which we have cultivated it under the peaceful protection of her Majesty. We are heartily thankful for this protection, and we desire that you should inform her Majesty and all her advisers, that the peace our chief Moshesh sought from her for us is acceptable, and we have no other desire but that this peace should be established, and that we should be governed by such men as our Governor, C. D. Griffith, who has been given to us, and in whom we have implicit confidence.

"That which has caused us some anxiety has been the little rebellion of Morosi, but that is a thing which will pass, and peace will again prevail in all the land. To-day we are troubled because the children of the Queen are dispossessed of their dwellings and lands by this disturbance of Morosi.

"There is another matter which we would take advantage of this letter to mention. It is that we rejoice greatly in seeing how much the Government cares for our nation by advancing it by means of schools, and we greatly desire that these schools may be increased on all sides, and filled with our children, and thus the nation may become wise.

"With much respect, sir, I remain, your faithful servant, (signed) Letsie."

The Colonial Secretary then delivered a long speech, thanking them for the address, and then stating in detail the policy of the Colonial Government, dwelling especially on the questions of revenue and taxation, education, and lastly disarmament. The increased taxation, in form of a hut-tax, he said, was necessary in order to obtain revenue for establishing a better police, for increasing education, and other purposes of government. The disarmament was called for in order to prevent outbreaks such as had caused trouble in other parts of South Africa, and especially such rebellions as that of the Chief Morosi. He then invited the chiefs to give their opinions, and to state them frankly. The points of the Secretary's speech which attracted most attention will appear from a few extracts from the native speeches.

SPEECH OF MABUSETSA.

"I am the son of Linguana, who was killed the other day, and I wish to speak before you. You say with reference to the hut-tax that you wish we should be protected and well governed by the Government, and yet you do not act up to your words. I was ordered by Mr. Griffith to go down with our men with my father to Morosi's mountain, and we went there; that was a very simple order, and it was very easy for us to obey it; but with regard to the hut-tax, all that I have got to say is that most of the people will be too poor to pay it; you might order us to pay two or three pounds instead of one pound, but we would not have money enough to pay it. That is all that I have to say."

SPEECH OF MPHUNGWA.

"I wish to say a word with regard to what the chief has said about the hut-tax. We have suffered and been impoverished by the war with the Free State, and we can only now say the same word that our father Moshesh said at the time when he requested the Government to take him under its protection. He said to Tsekelo, Go and represent to the Queen that our great difficulty will be because we have no longer got any garden ground, our country is too small. That was the first word that he spoke, that the people had not sufficient garden ground, and that word has remained true from that day to this. I am very glad that the Colonial Secretary is here to-day, so that we may repeat the word to him. We say that there are not sufficient gardens, that a great number of our people have grown up, and that there are not gardens enough for us, and that our cattle have no longer sufficient pasturage, and therefore I am very glad that the Colonial Secretary has come here, and I beg of him not to run away from this country, but to go through it and satisfy himself that we have not sufficient garden ground,* and that that will be the great difficulty in the way of our paying this tax."

SPEECH OF MATHLELEBE.

"When we were annexed to the Government we petitioned the Queen to be taken under her protection, and we were about to be annexed to the country of Natal, and there was a difficulty in our minds with regard to our annexation to Natal. We refused to be annexed to Natal because we knew that the Natal Government disarmed their natives, and we therefore elected to be annexed to the Cape, because we saw that they had a different policy in this respect, and we liked their treatment of the natives better."

Makotoko, a Christian native, Tsita Mofaka, a hereditary chief, and others spoke in similar strain, all professing strong loyalty to the Queen, and appealing to their conduct in the war with Morosi and Langalibalele, as proof of their readiness to use their arms only in defence or against the Queen's enemies. Against the Boers also they had fought, and were ready to fight, because they were rebels against the Queen as well as oppressors of the black people. One chief thus concluded his speech: "The reason why we refused to be subjects of the Free State was that we had no confidence in them, and we knew that by coming to the Queen's Government we should have full liberty. And now what would become of our great confidence in the justice of the Queen's Government if now we are to be disarmed, not because we have done any evil, but just because our colour is black? You do not point out any evil that we have done, but you say that we are black. The trust that Moshesh had in the Queen! He died trusting her; he used to say that the Queen was the sun of the world. We are not the first people who have been taken under the protection of the Queen; there are many slaves who have been rescued by her cruisers on the high seas from slavery, and what we poor blacks want at the hands of the Queen's Government is justice, and the justice we want is that no criminal should be killed unless he has had an opportunity of answering for himself, and unless his fault has been proved. We are highly delighted with the administration of justice in the Queen's dominions, and with the way in which your trials are conducted, and we wish to be like the English. Now I address myself to the Governor's agent. I say, sir, we will weep on your account to-day because you are the eye that has been looking at us all this time. Why did you not tell the head of the colony that to take away our arms would be to tear out our hearts from inside our bosoms. I do not say we will fight, but you are breaking our hearts. I ask you, Colonel Griffith, were you not asked about this disarmament; and if so, did you not tell the Government that this matter would crush our hearts? And if you were not asked, then why were you not consulted? I say to you, O chief, Prime Minister of the colony, you who hold such a high position, and to whom so much power has been committed, being now come to us, we pour our words into your ear; we know that what we have said to you is written down with a pen of steel, and will be truthfully transmitted to the Government. We do not resist the Government, but we wish to convey our tears, and to protest against being disarmed. I would say a great deal more, but there are a great many people who wish to speak, and so I say, may God save the Queen." (Cheers, and shouts of "God save the Queen.")

At the close of the first day's assembly, three cheers were given for the Queen, and three cheers for the Colonial Secretary. Next day the assembly met in a room, not in the open air, it being thought that with a smaller number the opinions of the leading men would be more surely obtained. The great gathering of the people on the previous day had shown their respect for the Government. The Colonial Secretary having again addressed the assembly, dwelt chiefly on the disarmament question: "It is because the Government thinks only of your good and advancement that it puts the question, whether it is not desirable for you, at the call of the Government, to give up your arms? The Government thinks it an indication of manhood for a child to go to school on a week-day and to church on Sunday, and when it has left school to go to work in the field or in the shop, to plough a good many acres of land and to get good crops, to wear decent clothes, and to endeavour to follow the example of the white people who are living amongst you; and above all, to live at peace with all; and it is because the Government desires to discourage the war-spirit, to take it out of you, and to put in its stead a spirit which shall induce you to live in the way I have just described, that it asks you now, in all kindness, whether you do not think it desirable in your own interest to give up your guns? The Government can protect you from your enemies; and if you should be required to help the Government it would at once call upon you to render your assistance, feeling sure that it would be cheerfully and faithfully rendered. The Government of the Queen is not despotic; and though it might put this act in force without asking you anything about it, it prefers to appeal to you now to listen to its words and to walk in the way which I have pointed out."

* All cultivated land they call garden.

Of the replies the two most remarkable were from George and Tsekelo Moshesh, sons of the old chief Moshesh, who had led his people to put themselves under British rule.

SPEECH OF GEORGE MOSHESH.

"The great matter which gave us joy yesterday was the word of the Government regarding education; because we are very fond of our children, and wish them to be educated, so that they may be like the white man; and therefore I say to you, the master of our peace, that it grieves us that laws may be made for us without our being consulted. Won't the Boers be glad to hear that these Kaffirs are going to have the guns taken away from them after all! I feel ashamed and grieved, because to-day I have been proved to be a liar, for I and others pushed matters forward at the time when we came under the Queen, and told the people that they must all consent to give themselves up to the English Government, who would allow them to keep their guns, and who were not like the Free State who were afraid of the guns; and it grieves me that I am to be disarmed without any battle, just as if we had been fighting the Queen, for this is treatment given to conquered enemies. I beseech you, Mr. Spriggs, our father, our Governor, the representative of the Queen, when you go away, tell the Queen, and say, 'Do not think that those people refuse to give up their guns because they have thews and sinews, and mean to resist your authority; it is their education which influences them. At their circumcision they were given a shield and an assegai, and were told never to part with it, and that if ever they came back from an expedition, and the shield and assegai were not found before their house they should die the death, and they have grown up with that idea; and therefore I pray that the God of peace and mercy may soften your hearts that you may not stab your child.' Let those rather be ashamed who are to-day rejoicing over us, but let us be glad that we are protected by the Queen. I heard Tsekelo yesterday speaking of Mr. Upington, and attributing to him the sentiment that the black people were the natural enemies of the white people, and that is a sentiment which I repudiate; I do not feel that sentiment in my own mind; I am black by colour, but my heart is exactly like the heart of a white man. I will not say that I love every white man, but some who are my friends I love just as truly as I do any black man. I say in the first place, we should be treated equally with the other subjects of the Queen; and in the second place, with regard to the stupid children who are clasping the knife in their hands, do not forget how ignorant they are, do not draw the knife roughly away, but let them calm down, teach them and educate them, and they will lay it down of their own accord."

SPEECH OF TSEKELO MOSHESH.

"We are glad to see you to-day as we were yesterday, and we are sorry to lose you. I wish you could stay a whole week with us to learn our sentiments. These people do not perhaps understand as clearly as I and George and some others, what the Prime Minister of the colony is—that you are the head of the Government. The two principal things you have brought forward are disarmament and the hut-tax. If the Government thinks that by taking away a few rotten guns it will prevent war, I do not agree with it; the real remedy is to take away all the causes of dissatisfaction that are likely to produce war, and to satisfy all grievances, and therefore I wish to point out that quarrels, and not the possession of guns, are the real causes of war, and quarrels break out not only between black and white, but between friends, and between even husbands and wives. There may be some black men foolish enough to believe that they can fight the white man. I believe Cetewayo thought this, but we know that it is simply folly. There is no native in South Africa who does not acknowledge the Queen as Sovereign. This I know, because ambassadors came to Moshesh from every country, and he used to say there was only one chief under the sun, and that was the Queen. Therefore I say these guns are no obstacles to her sovereignty, and if the fear of war is the only reason for disarmament, I would beg respectfully to say that a more powerful and a better method of preserving peace would be to take away all grievances from the hearts of the people. You hold our destinies; it is in your hands to see the removal of our grievances; we are all under the Queen, who delivers us from slavery, even the war in Zululand, which was not so much a war as a deliverance of the Zulu people from a state of slavery. As long as we are under the Government of the Queen we have no use for our guns, but the hearts of the people cling to them, and the real means of preserving peace is the removal of all grievances."

After other chiefs had spoken, the Colonial Secretary replied. He maintained that the possession of arms, as in the case of the Zulus and the Gaikas, made war probable. He pointed out the inconsistency of those speakers who wished to be directly under the Government of the Queen instead of the Colonial Government, yet refused to be connected with the colony of Natal, which is governed by the Queen in England direct. The Secretary concluded by saying that "the Government of the Queen in England approves of this disarmament policy, and not only the present Government, but the whole people of England approve of it."

This may be true, but reason and power may often be impotent against habit and sentiment, and the chiefs and people could not be induced to give up their arms peaceably. They were willing at the same time to be under the rule of the Queen, represented by a Commissioner such as Colonel Griffith, without being annexed either to Natal or the Cape Colony. And why not? Whatever may be the result of this contention, we have every confidence that, whether under Imperial or Colonial government, the Basutos will be a loyal and prosperous people, provided peace be restored, and the Christian influences already in operation are extended. We invite our readers to give support to the Paris Evangelical Society, whose missionaries have made this part of Africa their field of labour.

THE ADVENTURES OF RUPERT LONG.

BY THE REV. H. J. BROWNE, B.A.

CHAPTER V.—SIGNOR VIRALLA.

THE way lay along one of those interminably straight French roads, shaded on either side by rows of tall poplars. Rupert's companion, as soon as they had left the town behind them, quickened his horses' pace, and rapidly outstripped the long line of lumbering vehicles. Hiram Wilkes, puffing away at a cigar, seemed little inclined for conversation, and Rupert had now plenty of time to take a leisurely view of the country, which improved as they went along, and began to undulate into those beautiful hills and valleys for which "la belle Normandie" is so justly famed. Vast forests fringed the upper parts of the hills, in which the lad had often been told the wild boar, and even the wolf still lurked. Now and then a ruined castle varied the scene.

But besides viewing the country, Rupert had now time for reflection. The events of the last few days seemed to him like a dream. He almost started with surprise when he began to realise his present position, and thought of the strange company he was in, and once more conscience began to whisper that the step he had taken was a wrong one.

The company were to stop that day at Clèves for an evening performance, going on to Rouen on the following day. By degrees the wearied and panting horses drew their heavy loads to the spot which Hiram Wilkes had selected, and as if by magic, a large and handsome pavilion was speedily raised which flaunted the tricolor and stars and stripes from its lofty summit. The usual bustle and excitement of such an arrival soon spread its influence through the little town, and once more the band was issuing forth its more than hearty invitations to the populace to enter to the strains of the "Pompier de Nanterre."

Rupert's duties were at present to be chiefly those of an assistant until he had become more acquainted with his special responsibilities. First at the entrance, assisting in taking the tickets, and afterwards in the arena watching the performers, the lad was to learn experience as speedily as he could.

The place was very crowded that night. The white caps and blouses had mustered in their hundreds, and the enthusiasm increased as each performer seemed to outdo his predecessor in feats of agility and daring. Signor Viralla flew round the arena with an almost incredible swiftness, and Tom White's jokes were never more cordially received.

The Wizard of the Rocky Mountains had now made his appearance with his performing bears, and as this was considered to be the pièce de résistance of the whole performance, the excitement began to reach its climax. Rupert, in spite of his uneasy feelings and the natural misgivings which had taken possession of his mind since he entered upon his new position, could not but help sharing in the general excitement. The antics of the five performing bears were really very wonderful as well as amusing, and when the Wizard of the Rocky Mountains finished off with his grand tableau, with each foot upon a recumbent monster and the rest grouped around him in striking attitudes, the whole audience rose to their feet amidst thunders of applause.

It was at this moment that a slight commotion might have been seen at the entrance of the circus: the crowd in that direction parted quickly asunder as if in sudden trepidation, when, with a prolonged howl of delight, a short rope twisted round his neck, his shaggy coat all covered with mud, and in spite of all the efforts of the assistants to arrest his progress, the faithful Bruno rushed frantically forward into his master's arms.

"I say, Johnson," said Tom White to Rupert as they were leaving the circus for the evening, addressing him by the name which the lad, not wishing his own to be known, had chosen on joining the company, "our governor says you are to mess with me and Signor Viralla to-night. You can let the dog follow you; we'll find a shakedown for him somewhere. What a point he did make, to be sure, rushing in in that excited manner. 'I've a very good mind, Tom,' says our governor, 'to give them another evening here in consequence of that incident. And mind you,' he says, 'it isn't outside the regions of possibility, that animal coming on some day as the Dog of Montargis.' Those were his very words."

Rupert followed his companion up a ladder leading into a somewhat dingy caravan, with alacrity, for the lad was very hungry.

There they found Signor Viralla in his ordinary garments, smoking a short pipe, and warming himself over a small stove, upon which simmered an iron pot containing some savoury mixture.

"Wilkes says that the lad's to stop with us to-night, Bill," said the clown in a somewhat deprecating tone, as if he were rather doubtful as to what welcome he might meet with, for it was well known that Signor Viralla's temper was not of the best description.

Signor Viralla, however, vouchsafed only in reply to give Rupert a strange and piercing look which lasted several moments in duration. This the clown was fain to take as an assent, and the party then commenced to discuss the contents of the iron pot, Bruno watching every movement from his corner with hungry eyes.

"Your dog 's very hungry," said the good-natured Tom White, throwing a piece of meat to Bruno, which he had fished out of the iron pot. "I suppose he followed you from Dieppe. Have you left many friends behind you there?"

Rupert had already endeavoured by adopting another name on his joining the circus to cut off all connection with his former life and associations, for he was ashamed of the career into which he had now drifted, and felt it would be sacrilege to associate his mother's name with his present surroundings. He therefore merely replied that he had left Dieppe because most of his friends had quitted the place, and because he had found it difficult to get any employment there.

"I daresay you weren't sorry to get away from that tyrannical old gendarme too," said Tom White, laughing. "How he did grab hold of you the other night, to be sure. I think you said your father's name was Johnson; what could he have been about to let you get into trouble?"

A GOOD SAMARITAN.

Rupert had never vouchsafed to his questioner this piece of information, and he resisted the clown's manifest endeavours to unravel his history by a brief reply, which let no further light upon the subject.

The party now relapsed into silence, the two men taking vigorously to smoking, making only a few occasional remarks bearing reference to their calling, when the necessary relighting or refilling of their pipes seemed to offer an opportunity.

It seemed a strange company. A dim light hanging from a nail in the side of the caravan scarcely lighted up the gloomy interior. The deep shadows cast upon the faces of the two men seemed to give a peculiarly sinister expression to the dark features of Signor Viralla. The presence of Bruno, in a dim corner, could only be known by his snoring. Presently the two men laid their pipes aside and prepared to lie down on the rugs and old mattresses which formed their couches.

Rupert, before lying down for the night, divested himself of his upper garments, and quietly unfastened his bundle. The sight of the kind clergyman's Bible suggested to him the duty of evening devotions, but his courage failed in such a company. Taking up, however, his mother's photograph, he gazed at it fondly for a moment, and breathed a prayer, which she had taught him. The action was not unnoticed by the wakeful eyes of the two men.

"Hullo, Johnson," said the inquisitive Tom White, stretching out his hand to catch hold of the photograph; "is that the portrait of your sweetheart? Let's have a look at her lovely features."

"No," said Rupert hastily, springing forward to withdraw the likeness, and replacing it in his bundle—"no," he said, as if such a touch carried with it contamination, "it is my mother."

But weariness at length brought repose to all the sleepers, if indeed the fitful fancies and pictures which were passing through Rupert's brain could be called repose. The events of the past few days, and especially of this last eventful one, seemed to take possession of his whole imagination, and were being enacted before him once more. Again he saw the lights moving about in the early morning, the horses prancing and neighing, and the long procession wending its way up the Route de Rouen. Again he was seated by the side of Hiram Wilkes, rolling past the tall poplars, which seemed as if they would never end. Again he was standing in the circus arena, gazing at the wide circles of faces rising up to the very roof of the building. Again the panting charger was flying past him, and on its back, with swaying body and compressed lips, and sinister expression, was the lithe form of Signor Viralla.

A low growl from Bruno seemed to arouse the sleeping lad to consciousness. The dog was evidently dreaming, and pursuing some foe in his sleep, but still Rupert, while he kept motionless from that fear which one so often experiences on awaking in a strange place, certainly thought he heard somebody moving in the dimly-lighted caravan. One of the sleepers had stealthily risen from his couch, and was unfastening Rupert's bundle which lay near him. The lad feared even to open his eyes, almost to breathe, so timid had his strange surroundings and the consciousness that he had cast in his lot with the lawless and ungodly made him. Still he could not but reflect that there was little, very little, of any value in his bundle, and that it must be motives of curiosity rather than of avarice, which had prompted this midnight examination of his little property. Rupert then remembered the questions which Tom White had asked him, and the clown's curiosity, which the lad had endeavoured to check, and he ventured to turn his head slightly towards the silent examiner of his bundle, who had now retreated to the other side of the caravan, and was standing under the lantern which was hanging there. The dim light cast a ghastly hue upon the man's features, but enabled Rupert at once to recognise them, which, to his surprise he found to be, not those of the inquisitive Tom White, but of the silent and gloomy Signor Viralla, who was gazing intently at the little portrait of Rupert's mother.

CHAPTER VI.—THE ABBÉ BURELLE.

In a small country village in one of the fruitful wine districts of France, lives the Abbé Burelle. The surrounding scenery is picturesque and beautiful, but the village itself is remote and insignificant, and it is the wonder of many an English tourist, who, attracted by the good curé's widespread reputation for learning, pays a visit to his humble residence, why so eminent an ecclesiastic should occupy so obscure a position. A few score cottages nestling under the hill side upon which the humble village church stands, contain the abbé's flock. Three small rooms under a thatched roof, surrounded by a little garden, in which there are more vegetables than flowers, and which opens by a low wooden door into the village churchyard, form the extent of the abbé's own private dominions. The front door of this humble mansion opens into the central room, which is the kitchen, in which Mademoiselle Victorine, the curé's aged housekeeper, with her pans and casseroles, reigns supreme. On the one side of this kitchen you enter the abbé's salon, where he receives his visitors; on the other side his bed-room, the walls of which are lined with books almost from the floor to the ceiling. A little outhouse at the other end of the garden contains another sleeping apartment, in which an occasional wayfarer finds a bed and welcome, and wonders no doubt at the numerous quaint old volumes which are piled up even there.

The Abbé Burelle, as we have stated, is a man well and widely known for his remarkable learning and for extreme earnestness in his religious convictions, and yet the Abbé Burelle remains unnoticed and unpromoted by his ecclesiastical superiors. The reason of this, although a mystery to his humble and affectionate flock, is perfectly well understood by persons of education. The village curé's religious opinions are considered by his superiors to be of an extremely objectionable and dangerous character. He is known openly to disapprove of the doctrine that the Pope is infallible and can do no wrong, and he has been even heard to make the incautious remark that at the present time there was amongst Catholics far too much reverence for the Virgin Mary, and far too little for the Lord Jesus Christ. Can it be wondered at, then, that the Abbé Burelle, although beloved by his people, receives but few favours from bishops or cardinals?

Although his locks are sprinkled with gray, and there are lines of care or sorrow on his face, the Abbé Burelle is tall, erect, and handsome, and there is about him that air of grace and dignity for which French ecclesiastics are so often justly noticed.

The Abbé Burelle was not always intended for the sacred calling. He had originally been a pupil in a military academy, and had after that been lieutenant in an infantry regiment. The reason why François Burelle had made such a remarkable change in his life and occupation none but those nearest and dearest to him knew.

Years ago, they could have told you, François, who even as a young officer had grave and literary tastes and spent much of his leisure time in study, had been quartered at a seaport town of northern France. At that time he had become acquainted with a fair young Englishwoman, upon whom and upon whose orphan child he had been the means of bestowing many delicate acts of kindness. Respectful sympathy and admiration had by degrees ripened into love, but this, owing to the difference in their religion and to other scruples connected with a painful past, the object of his affections had been unable to return. François, while he could not banish this tender attachment from his heart, had submitted to what seemed to be unalterable, but he had reached a turning-point in his life. A gay and frivolous career had never been in accordance with his tastes and feelings, and he had quitted the army for a life of self-denial and of usefulness according to the light which he then possessed.

Such was the Abbé Burelle. Few who saw him under the humble roofs of his poor parishioners of the little village of Martin Eglise could have guessed at this romance of former days.

Several months had elapsed since the events related in our last chapter. It was an unusually hot summer and the sun was beating down mercilessly upon the high road passing through the village, as the Abbé Burelle one sultry afternoon prepared to pay a pastoral visit to a parishioner, who lived at some little distance from his residence. The way lay up the hill-side upon which the village church stands. The diligence had passed about an hour ago, having waited a few minutes at the "Maison d'Or," the village inn, for refreshment for the travellers, and for the assistance of two additional horses to pull its cumbrous load up the long and dusty ascent which lay before it. The Abbé Burelle climbed patiently up this same ascent, lost, as was often his custom, in deep thought. He had scarcely, however, climbed half the distance, when his attention was suddenly arrested by a somewhat unusual spectacle. Leaning against a large stone on the way-side, his head lying back, and in a fainting condition, was the prostrate form of a fair-haired youth. His clothes were torn and dusty, and his poor shoes bore evident signs of long and weary travel. A small bundle had fallen from his back when the lad had sat down to rest, but this was guarded jealously by a rough and shaggy dog, who seemed scarcely less weary than his master, and whose tongue hung far out from his thirsty jaws.

Such a sight was sure to attract the immediate attention of the benevolent abbé. Approaching the recumbent form of the prostrate youth, he perceived at once that extreme exhaustion, the result no doubt of long travel and of the overpowering heat of the sun, had caused the poor traveller to faint away. The dog looked anxiously up, but offered no resistance, as the curé unfastened the clothing round the lad's neck, and began to fan his hot face. Not many yards from the place was a familiar spring, which the overshadowing foliage had protected from the sun, and from which the kind abbé now procured a few drops of water in his hands to dash into the traveller's face. Gradually the lad revived sufficiently to open his blue eyes, and gaze up at the good Samaritan who was bending over him. Their glances met, and it was with a strange start, as if almost of recognition, that the abbé scanned the youth's features. "Monsieur is very weary with his journey," said he kindly, "and the sun is so hot, what wonder that he should faint away?"

"Monsieur Picard," he cried to a man in the usual blue shirt of the French peasant, who was passing by, "let us succour this poor traveller, let us convey him to the rest and refreshment which he needs."

The youth had again closed his eyes, but the strong arms of the two men were able to carry rather than support him down the hill, into the village below. The dog, who at first seemed slightly inclined to dispute the desirability of these proceedings, seemed suddenly to understand their import, and followed slowly after the procession, a red-cheeked and bright-eyed lad, who was evidently Monsieur Picard's son, taking up the traveller's bundle and carrying it for him.

The little company turned into the churchyard, studded all over with its small wooden crosses, and through this passed into the good curé's own private domain. Here they were met by Mademoiselle Victorine, who had seen them through her kitchen window, and bustled out to render what assistance she could. The fainting lad was soon laid upon the bed in the little outhouse in the garden, but as he did not revive under the vigorous treatment of the good Victorine, Monsieur Picard's rosy-cheeked boy was sent off in haste for the village doctor. That worthy happened to be at home, and speedily came at the curé's request, for the wish of the Abbé Burelle was law in the village of Martin Eglise.

But even under so skilful a charge as that of the village Æsculapius the lad was not so soon to recover. He was in a violent fever, brought on, the doctor said, by over-exhaustion, and that had to take its course.

Thus for nearly a week the lad lay in a half delirious state, carefully tended by Victorine, and often visited by the kind curé, who seemed more and more interested in him, and who would frequently sit by his bedside and watch his flushed features with an increasing interest.

The fever at length subsided, and then the patient was able to exchange a few words with his nurse, and also to look anxiously about for his faithful dog, who had scarcely left the room during his illness, and who now leapt up upon the bed with frantic joy in answer to his master's feeble invitation and loving caresses.

"Monsieur has been very ill," said the watchful Victorine, endeavouring to check this over-excitement, "and must keep quiet. Is there anything that he requires?" With that the attentive nurse conveyed to his lips some cooling drink; there were no hands, the villagers of Martin Eglise well knew, so skilful in the concoction of cooling draughts for fevers as those of Mademoiselle Victorine. The lad took the cup in his trembling hands and drank it with avidity, but the tears began to flow down his cheeks as he tried to frame some words of gratitude.

"Oh, madame, how good you are to me, how can I ever thank you enough!" said the boy, fairly losing all self-command and bursting into sobs.

"Silence, mon ami," said Victorine, laying her hand upon his lips; "keep tranquil, and do not hinder your recovery; besides," she added, "it is Monsieur le Curé whom you have to thank, and you can do that to him very soon, for the doctor says that you are much better."

The lad was fain to submit, but added a petition that Victorine would kindly reach him his bundle which he now saw resting on a chair close to his bed. It had remained unopened, but Rupert (for the reader has of course already divined that it is none other than he) felt in it for his Bible, and was able to read a few words of its large and familiar print without much effort. As he laid the book aside his mother's photograph fell out of it, and taking it up in his feeble hands he gazed long at it. As he did so his mind wandered back to the past, and he began for the first time to collect his thoughts, and to realise his present position.

The strange circus life, of which we have had a glimpse in the last chapter, was soon found by poor Rupert to be anything but a pleasant or desirable one. The lad had had his strong misgivings when he took that hasty step of joining the company at Dieppe, and he soon learnt that almost any career would be preferable to that which he had drifted into. To a thoughtless crowd of pleasure-seekers there may appear to be something attractive or at least exciting about the wandering vagabond life of a travelling circus, but it took only a few days of experience to convince Rupert of the wretchedness of such an existence. To see these same performers after the glare and excitement of the public exhibition and to mix with them in their daily life was enough to shock the feelings of anyone who, like Rupert, had been brought up to regular and respectable habits, and the poor lad grew more and more miserable as all his surroundings became more and more repulsive to him. Happily he was saved from copying any of the bad examples which he daily had to witness by reason of that very isolation and misery which he felt amongst his strange companions. Still he felt that even to live in such company was to be separated from all that was good and noble, and the lad had begun even then to long for better things, and now and then to steal a few solitary moments for reading his Bible.

It was not long before Rupert became convinced that, whatever might be the consequences, his duty was to retrace his footsteps, and to quit for ever such scenes as these. Merely to escape from his companions would of course not be difficult, but what to do upon taking that step was a matter of no small perplexity. The company had been travelling southwards for the last few weeks, and they were now several hundreds of miles from Dieppe, the only town in France which Rupert knew. His idea was to make his way on foot again to that place, and then if possible procure a passage over to England, and try and find out the Collette family in London, when he might be able to return to his old occupation. Rupert had earned a small sum of money during the last few months, but the lad had no idea whether that were sufficient to answer his purpose, still he determined to make the attempt and to spend as little as he could upon the way.

It was a beautiful summer morning when Rupert with his bundle and followed by the faithful Bruno, stole quietly out of the caravan, and hastily left his sleeping companions behind him. The journey was a long and difficult one which he was about to undertake, but he commenced it with a lightened heart, for he began to feel that God's blessing would go with him now that he had quitted the companionship of those who were living without Him. Bruno, too, seemed to share in his master's improved spirits, and joyously sniffed the fresh breezes of early dawn.

The first few days were pleasant enough as the lad and his humble companion traversed the lovely scenes surrounding them. Their wants were very simple, and the shelter of a tree formed a sufficient resting-place by day and night. Still the journey was a very long one, the sun grew hotter and hotter, and the roads more dusty every day. With all his economy, Rupert's small stock of money was swiftly dwindling away. The effect of this was to make him redouble his efforts, and to press forward more rapidly, but soon his feet became blistered and sore, his strength began to fail and illness threatened to put a stop to his journey. In a weak and fevered condition, the lad struggled manfully on for a few days longer, but all his endeavours were destined to come to a speedy end. Tottering to the side of the road, Rupert had unloosed his burden and sat down for a little rest; the panting Bruno had thrown himself at his feet, looking up lovingly into his master's worn face. The glaring sun suddenly seemed to vanish away from the lad's eyes and in its place came total darkness. Rupert had fainted away, and his journey had come to an end. Happy for him that he was to be found and rescued by so good a Samaritan as the Abbé Burelle.

THE GREEK CHURCH IN RUSSIA AND SIBERIA.

BY THE REV. HENRY LANSDELL, F.R.G.S.

IV.—THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF THE PEOPLE.

IT now only remains that something be said upon the religious life of the people. On the dark side of the Russian character are two sins which it shall not be mine to bring against them, but which I will quote from their own authorities. One of the governors of Siberia, in an official report concerning the morality of his province, writes thus: "The chief causes of crime are gambling and drunkenness." I was told by a young nobleman that there are clubs in St. Petersburg where gambling is carried on to a frightful extent. It is to be seen, however, everywhere, chiefly in the form of card-playing; and Siberia is worse than Russia. My fellow-passengers on the river played by day, and not unfrequently quarrelled by night. Even the prisoners, who have no money to lose, gamble away their food, and then sometimes complain that they are badly fed! But worse than the gambling is the drunkenness which meets one, especially on festivals, and is a most fruitful cause of crime. I can present only rough estimates. A man in Siberia, through whose hands thousands of exiles pass yearly, who had books of private statistics, and whose figures were worthy of notice, expressed an opinion that of the twenty thousand exiles, or rather less, sent yearly into Siberia, half were sent through drunkenness. On one occasion, in a prison, being shown into a room occupied solely by murderers, I was informed that most of them had committed their crimes when intoxicated. I cannot but think that the evil habits of gambling, drunkenness, and idleness are in part to be traced to the very large number of holydays in the Russian calendar, on many of which they abstain from work more completely than on Sundays. They fast long and rigorously, and then at the close break out in excess.

Notwithstanding all this, however, which among them passes not only for less sin, but for less shame than with us, there is much to praise in the character of the Russian people. Let us first take some of their virtues which all can admire. Our Lord, in portraying the character of the righteous, says, they fed the hungry, gave drink to the thirsty; took the stranger in; the naked they clothed, and those sick and in prison they visited. And the Russians do these things—some of them to an eminent degree. The Siberian peasantry, ere they retire to rest, place food outside the window for any chance hungry traveller, often an escaped exile, who may happen to pass in the night. Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, in his excellent work, says that, of all countries in Europe, Russia easily bears off the palm for hospitality, and I would add that I know no country in the world where a stranger is so readily taken in and ministered to as in Siberia; whilst, as for kindness to prisoners, it may perhaps surprise some to learn that an exile in the mines may receive visits from his friends twenty times as often as a convict in England. Outside the prison doors in Russia are boxes to receive offerings for those confined within, and at Easter the prisoners, I am told, sometimes have more eggs brought than they can eat, whilst every considerable prison in Siberia has a committee of outsiders who look after the prisoners' welfare. Besides this, it must be acknowledged that the Russians are in a sense a religious people. They have a zeal of God, albeit that we should think it not according to knowledge. One sees this not only in the large numbers both of men and women who attend the churches, but in the tens of thousands who yearly go on pilgrimage to sacred places. The monks of Troitza sometimes have in summer, on a feast day, a thousand guests. Some of course are idle wanderers, going from place to place to get food; but many walk hundreds of miles—nay, thousands—to redeem a vow or offer a prayer for something specially desired. One of the seven spiritual works of mercy with them is, "To pray for others to God." I suppose it was this led some of the pilgrims at Troitza, when books were given them, to say, "Thank you, sir, for giving us holy books: we and our children will pray for you, and also our children's children." Going to the White Sea, also, many asked my name, that they might pray for me, and one woman said she would buy a sacramental loaf at Solovetsk and have my name commemorated in the liturgy. But in Siberia I met with a more practical form of their liking for good things. I had occasion to send a waggon load of books and tracts a distance of two thousand miles by steamer; and the owner, knowing that they were for distribution in the prisons and elsewhere, would take nothing for carriage, and enjoined upon his captain to pay every attention to "Mr. Missionary." On three other boats a separate cabin was given me at reduced rates, and my load of books not charged for.

But this may be said to be all negative, and much of it belonging to the past. Let me, then, adduce a few considerations, which seem to me to bring the Greek Church nearer to ourselves in two most vital points, and to afford grounds of hope that purer and better days may yet be hers.

First, notice the attitude of the Russian Church to the Holy Scriptures. She does not forbid them, or hide them from the people, and in her "Treatise on the Duty of Parish Priests," a book by two Russian bishops, which all candidates for Orders are required to have read, and to show their acquaintance with, before being ordained, there is no uncertain sound as to the theory of the Russian Church concerning the source whence her priests should primarily derive their teaching.

But further let me mention the central sun round which they say this teaching should revolve, the reading of which, unless I am mistaken, will surprise not a few. The paragraph is too long to quote, but it ends thus: "In every case, I say, according to circumstances, he (the priest) can implant, and is in duty bound to implant, the knowledge of Christ Jesus; and so all instruction, and every particular instruction, should be grounded on Christ; for all that can be either written or said in reference to the faith and to everlasting happiness, if it be not grounded on faith in Christ, is unfruitful, and can never save."

Could anything, then, in theory be more satisfactory than this? But let me mention one thing more, as a proof that we hold very much more of the truth in common with the Russian Church than many are aware of. An extensive work is done in Russia by the Religious Tract Society. They sold about a million of tracts from 1875 to 1878. Now in Russia, as is well known, every book, every pamphlet, every leaflet, before it can be published and circulated, must receive the approval of the censor (I had to submit to him a proof even of my Russian visiting-card); consequently, if the doctrine of what is printed, whether political or religious, be objectionable, its publication is forbidden. Further, it is pretty well known what kind of doctrine, and what kind only, the committee of the Religious Tract Society approve. Now if these two things be put together, it surely calls for our deepest thanksgiving that we hold at least some very precious truths in common with them, and that we are not quite so nearly at their antipodes as is sometimes ignorantly and harshly supposed.

One of the crying wants of the Russian Church is that of preaching. This ordinance is at a very low ebb. I remember, on my first visit to the Northern capital, asking an English friend where on the morrow I could hear a Russian sermon; to which he surprised me by replying, that since the morrow was not a festival, he did not suppose there would be a sermon preached in the whole of St.

Petersburg! Whether he was right I cannot say; but on subsequent inquiry I have found that in many churches not more than three or four sermons a year are preached. "How often in the year does your father preach?" I asked of a priest's son. "About five or six times," was the reply. A country priest in Siberia, in answer to my question, told me that he gave the people instruction for five or six minutes after the service on Sunday, but that it was complained of as "too long." Thus I perceived that complaints of long sermons are not confined to England; but also I came to the conclusion, in this case at all events, that the fault did not lie with the people, but with the preacher; for in the neighbouring parish was a man who, strange to relate, made it a rule to read a sermon every Sunday, though the sermons were not of his own composing. But this is the only man in the Russian Empire I have heard of doing this. There may, of course, be others; but I believe it is quite the exception. Nor is the way by any means clear and easy, even if a man wishes to preach his own sermons. There are among the Church books certain homilies which may be read to the people, composed by eminent prelates, and couched in grandiloquent language; but if their general character be like the two I have read, I can hardly imagine the reading of them by the priest to be highly conducive to edification. One of my friends, speaking of a Russian sermon she heard, said it was on the difference between old pictures and new ones, and dissuading the people from dissent. She ventured to speak to the priest on the subject, and to suggest his composing his own sermons from the Bible. But he said he could not: and this with many priests is doubtless the case. But even where a priest can do so, he may write his sermon, but before he preaches it, it must go to the consistory of his ecclesiastical superior to be approved. It is the prime duty of the consistory to keep the diocese free from heresy; and in so doing they seem to keep out of the pulpits, not only the bad, but the good too; for one has only to conceive the difficulties, first, of a Russian priest finding time to prepare sermons at all; then to send them, it may be, hundreds of miles to the consistory; then to await their leisure, not to say supineness, in returning them, etc.; and it will be clear that the office of preaching could not be in circumstances much more unfavourable than it now is in Russia and Siberia.

The great need, however, of the Russian Church is a religion of the heart, and not merely of the letter; in other words, a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit, to quicken its many forms and abundant ceremonies. Mr. Wallace goes so far as to say that to the Russian peasant, what we call the "inner life" is a thing unknown, and I am afraid it is only too true. Of course my being unable to speak the language renders me almost unable to judge; but in any conversations I have had through an interpreter, or with Russians who can speak French or English, I do not remember to have met with anything that leads me to question the general accuracy of Mr. Wallace's remark. I trust it may be otherwise, and can heartily pray that the time may speedily come when the excellent teachings on the Scriptures and on Christ, to be found in some of her books may become to the Russian Church a bright and a living reality.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

MARCH 13.

THE SINNER'S FRIEND. LUKE VII. 36–50.

GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE XIX. 10.—'For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.'

CONNECTION.—This beautiful incident (narrated only by Luke) plainly belongs to Christ's Galilæan ministry; almost immediately following His interview with the disciples of John. One brief discourse only had intervened (Matt. xi. 20–30), closing with the invitation, 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' These words sink deep into one heart at least, and its first result is that the 'woman who was a sinner' came to Jesus.

It is hardly necessary to say that this incident is entirely different from that at the supper in Bethany a year and a half afterwards, as recorded by the other three evangelists (Matt. xxvi. 6-13; Mark xiv. 3-9; John xii. 2-8). The only points of resemblance are in the name of the host (Simon, one of the commonest of Jewish names) and in the fact of the anointing. All else is different.

I. THE UNBIDDEN GUEST.—Read vers. 36–39. One of the Pharisees—for his name see ver. 40. The city was probably Nain, that being the last place mentioned, ver. 11. Simon, no doubt, was one of the principal inhabitants, and with some kindliness, not without curiosity, mingled with a sense of patronage, he invites to his table this young Nazarene prophet, of whom he has heard so much, and who has recently wrought so great a wonder at the city gates. Not yet had the Pharisees as a class rejected Jesus. He accepts the invitation, not coveting such entertainment, but as an opportunity of doing good. How He was received by His host, we see farther on. Some, no doubt, of the principal inhabitants had been invited to meet Him. Sat down, literally, lay down. [Meat here, as always in our Bible, means food generally.] The higher class of Jews had adopted the Roman custom of reclining at the table, on couches along three sides of a square, with the unsandalled feet turned outwards. The hall was open, so that it was possible for any one to enter and pass along between the back of the couches and the wall. A woman, not named; a sinner, notoriously leading an immoral life.*

Ordinary editions of the English Bible have the name of Mary Magdalene in the heading of this chapter, and the tradition has been rendered so familiar through painting, sculpture and poetry, that it is difficult to break the association. The weight of evidence is, however, decisively against this view, and still more against the notion (also strongly defended by many Romanist writers) that this sinful woman, 'the Magdalene,' was the same with the saintly Mary of Bethany! † We distinguish unhesitatingly between all three—Mary, one of the family that Jesus loved; Mary of Magdalene, 'out of whom went seven devils,' ch. viii. 2; and this unnamed fallen woman of Nain, so graciously restored by the Saviour's love.

* Some texts make this emphatic: a woman who was a sinner in the city.

† See the quaint story given by John Bunyan in his Jerusalem Sinner Saved. On the evidence pro and con, consult Smith's Dict. Bible, art. 'Mary Magdalene.' Of modern evangelical commentators, Hengstenberg and Lange stand almost Meekly has she stolen in, uninvited, but unforbidden. She seeks but one Guest; when she has found Him, she cannot, dares not speak to Him. Tears are often more eloquent than words. At first she stood,—then bending down, prepares to anoint His feet with the ointment 'which she had bought, probably for so different a purpose!' But even while she was opening the alabaster box, and bowing over His feet, intent upon her task of love, her hot, fast-falling tears bedewed them, and for the moment hindered her purpose. Softly she wiped the tears away with the long dishevelled hairs of her head, left loose in token of her shame and grief. Then she as silently applied the cooling ointment, and tenderly kissed His feet again and again (for all this the word implies). And Jesus was reclining silently there, receiving the tribute of love, saying not a word until the Pharisee spoke!

II. The Pharisee's Thought and Christ's Parable.—Read vers. 39–43. The Pharisee is true to the narrow sanctimoniousness of his class; 'Stand by thyself, come not near to me, for I am holier than thou!' He takes for granted that every one who claimed the character of prophet must judge by the same rule, and concludes therefore that Jesus did not know. His presumed ignorance therefore, rather than His allowance of the woman's touch, proves Him, in the Pharisee's estimate, no prophet. Thus is Simon doubly wrong. Jesus answered—'He heard the Pharisee thinking' (Augustine), comp. Matt. ix. 4. Simon, appealed to thus directly, does not forget his courtesy, even to One whom he was just setting down as a pretender; the word Master is an unconscious testimony to the power of Christ's word and look. The parable or apologue that follows was quite after the method of Jewish teachers, and would rouse the interest of listeners who did not dream of the application. A creditor, literally, a money-lender. It is the proportion, not the actual amount, which is important for the purpose of the parable. See a very different proportion, Matt. xviii. 21–35 (in one case, both debts due to God; in the other to God and man respectively). Note the points of comparison; in our obligation to God (His claim upon us of obedience: sin therefore is as it were a failure to pay, hence a debt (Matt. vi. 12), our absolute destitution, nothing to pay, and the entire freedom of forgiveness; frankly, freely. The difference in the moral character of sinners is also to be noted; especially the differing sense of sin in those who thiuk themselves forgiven; as the degree of love must depend on their estimate of the amount of indebtedness. This Simon acknowledges, with a slight touch of surprise, as shown in his answer, I suppose.

III. Application of the Parable.—Read vers. 44–47. Seest thou this woman? A different word from saw in ver. 39—'Dost thou mark her well?' 'Now note the contrast, in the welcome given to Me, a guest!' The acts of courtesy detailed in what follows were usual in the welcome of any distinguished and honoured visitor. Simon no doubt thought he had done a great thing in inviting the Peasant-prophet at all, giving Him a place at his table among his dignified associates—but did not suppose it necessary to do more than this. It was really that poor weeping, trembling woman who 'did the honours of Simon's house.' Note the contrasts that follow in enumerating the acts of loving service—the water and the tears—the kiss of welcome, and the kisses on the feet—the anointing of the head with oil (a customary act; the cheaper offering) and that of the feet with ointment (an extraordinary mark of homage, and the costlier tribute). Hence the inference, what? Plainly that her many sins had been forgiven. This is shown by the greatness of her love: whereas Simon's loving little (evinced in his want of hospitality) proves that in his own estimate he had but small need of forgiveness.

It is very important to the interpretation of our Lord's words, to observe the exact character of His inference, as many readers have fallen into the error of supposing that He speaks of love as the ground of pardon; 'forgiven because of the greatness of her love.' So Hartley Coleridge on the narrative:

> 'And He wiped off the soiling of despair
> From her sweet soul, because she loved so much.'

The parable ought to have made such exposition impossible. The 'creditor' forgave the 'debtors,' not because they loved, or because of anything but his own free favour; and then, the degree of their love was a sign of the greatness of the debt that had been cancelled. So here. Her sins—the many—have been forgiven, and this we may know, for she loved much. Grammatical students may note the two different meanings of the particle for, as introducing a cause or a consequence. So we may say, 'I was cured, for I took the medicine;' or 'I was cured, for I could attend to my work as usual.' Were it necessary to argue further that our Lord's words must be taken in the latter sense, it would be plain from His conclusion: to whom little is forgiven the same loveth little. On the other supposition He must have said, 'He who loveth little, to him little is forgiven.' What He teaches therefore most certainly is not, love the ground of forgiveness, but forgiveness the motive of love.

IV. Words of Jesus to the Penitent.—Read vers. 48–50. Now, for the first time, He speaks to her. With what wonder and joy, mingled with shame, she must have listened to the foregoing dialogue, we may well suppose. Thy sins are (literally, have been) forgiven. It was really so before—though she did not know it, dared not imagine it. She came to win a gift that was already hers! God welcomes the first movement of the soul towards Him. So the prodigal was pardoned before he could ask for pardon. The attention of the guests was now thoroughly aroused. Who is this?—words, we may fain hope, not of scepticism or contempt, but of dawning conviction. Or, perhaps, it was an unbelieving murmur, but Jesus did not now stay to answer or rebuke: His business was with the penitent alone. Thy faith hath saved thee—words so often heard by those who were cured of their diseases,* but now applied to the deeper malady of the soul. Faith, i.e., trust, the clinging to Christ, not her tears, not her offerings. To say faith saves is only another way of saying Christ saves. The efficacy is not in the act of trusting, but in that which is trusted. Go in peace, literally, into peace, into that state of happiness and rest of spirit which the sense of forgiveness can impart.

And so did Jesus prepare the way by His several acts of love for the great declaration afterwards embodied in immortal words in our Golden Text. As the Son of Man He is the Sinner's Friend; taking upon Him our nature, with its burden of guilt and woe, that He might put it all away. Simon's question, whether He were a Prophet, had to do with but a part of His work. As Prophet, Jesus declared what as Saviour He performed. He came to seek as well as to save; and was seeking the lost even when they seemed to be seeking Him. Illustrate from this penitent woman. Christ had sought her. His love had found her, even when she knew it not. Christ's love had reached her, and its silent attraction drew her to Himself. Are we lost? He is seeking us.

THE GLOW-WORM AND THE STAR.

"TWINKLE, twinkle, little star," lisped a glow-worm from the midst of a bed of ferns and moss that grew at the edge of a wood.

It was a glorious night, and as the glow-worm gazed upward at the star-lit heaven above, she repeated once more the words which she had often heard the children repeat as they passed on their way to and from school hard by.

"I am not little," replied the star, to whom had come up through infinity of space the sound of the glow-worm's tiny voice, though she could not see the faintest glimmer of the speaker's form in the world so far below. "I am not little," she repeated, looking smilingly down from her exalted position.

"Are you not?" said the glow-worm. "You look small, almost as small as—myself."

The star laughed, a soft silvery laugh. "Things are not always what they seem," she said with another twinkle of her diamond eye.

The glow-worm was silenced, but not convinced. For days she had lived in the happy delusion that she was like the star she had admired so much, which shone night after night just above her head.

"At least we both shine," she said at last, giving utterance to the only consolatory thought that came to her relief.

"Yes, indeed; you in your place, I in mine," replied the star. "The only difference is that you shine up from the darkness below; I shine down from the darkness above."

"I wish that I could shine up there where you are," sighed the glow-worm.

The star smiled at the thought of that insignificant atom being seen among the starry splendours of the night. "I think you are better where you are," she remarked, as soon as she could command her voice sufficiently to speak. "Don't you know that many of us stars fall from our exalted stations, while—

'He that is down need fear no fall'?"

"Like me!" said the glow-worm with a sudden feeling of thankfulness that there was no chance of her suddenly falling from her nook of safety.

At that moment the moon, which had been hidden for a little while by a passing cloud, burst forth in her full splendour, lighting every object within reach of her silvery fingers, forming a strange contrast to the dark shadows which these illumined objects cast around.

The poor little glow-worm was nearly eclipsed by the wondrous brightness, and glanced round at the very small space which it was possible for her to light. "I cast no shadow," she sighed sadly.

"Don't regret that, pray!" said the star, looking down from her calm shadowless height. "There are countless numbers who would give anything to be able to say as much."

"I have often observed," said the moon, "that it is the things that do not shine themselves that make the shadows;" and as she spoke her smiling face was troubled for a moment, and she looked rather crossly on the earth who was just then darkening nearly a third of her surface.

"But you make many things to shine, who but for you would not shine at all. For instance, there is yon school-house whose face looks as white as yours in the light, but which appears dark enough at night when you are out of the way. Or yonder giant oak, whose every leaf now seems tipped with light, how dark and sombre she looks except you or the sun are shining."

"Yes," said the moon slowly as if weighing the matter in her mind as she spoke; "yes, I do make things shine. Everything that turns towards me shines in my reflected light. It is only the side that turns away from the light that is in shadow itself or casts a shadow."

The quick tread of an approaching passer-by silenced the answer that was trembling on the glow-worm's lips. It was only the elderly schoolmistress, who was hurrying to the village to buy some medicine for her sick child at home. She did not notice the glorious moon (except that she was glad of its rays to guide her on her way), for her sorrowful eyes, eyes dimmed with weeping and watching, were turned on the ground where her own shadow ran rapidly along on the path before her. Perhaps the cares and troubles of life had made her blind to the beauties of nature, as well as to the glories of the "better things than these," for she took no heed of the dew-laden grass that she brushed with her feet, scattering as she did so thousands of crystal gems from each tiny blade. But, just as she was passing it, her eye fell on the little glow-worm who was shining out close to her feet as bright as ever, despite the almost eclipsing glory of the "night lights" of the sky.

"How beautiful!" she murmured, pausing a moment in her hurried walk, as in her anxious heart was lit an answering glow from the glow-worm's tiny spark.

Perhaps that feeble light had brought to her mind some faint glimmering remembrance of words she had learnt in girlhood, till now forgotten, of a better "Light that shineth in a dark place, till the day dawn." She had not noticed them when she was walking in the sunshine of prosperity, but they had been ready all the while "waiting in calm shadow" till the dark nights of adversity should reveal their loveliness.

The glow-worm never regretted after that she was only a tiny light on earth instead of a glorious star in heaven, for she said to herself, "I can do something here that maybe I could not do if I were up there."

THE ADVENTURES OF RUPERT LONG.

BY THE REV. H. J. BROWNE, B.A.

CHAPTER VII.—THE PILGRIMS OF THE SACRED HEART.

WITH a sense of rest and security under the good Abbé's roof, Rupert had gradually sunk into a peaceful slumber. By God's blessing and under the kind and tender care which he had met with, there was every prospect of a speedy convalescence. It was very pleasant for the lad now to look back upon his weary wanderings and to feel that he had found so quiet and peaceful a refuge. Rupert had retraced his history up to that calm resting-place, and had then fallen to sleep, with his Bible open upon the bed and his mother's photograph in his hand.

Presently the door was gently opened by the curé, who had come to see how the patient progressed. It was a pleasant sight to see this grave and dignified Frenchman in his cassock and bands, his sombrero in his hand, bending tenderly over the sleeping form of the fair young English lad.

Truly this good Abbé's life would have adorned a clearer faith and more Scriptural creed than that to which, for want of fuller light, he still held allegiance, but who could tell what brighter days might yet be in store for him?

"Ah, he sleeps," said the Abbé softly, as he looked down upon the lad's face with that glance of strange interest with which he had so often gazed at Rupert before—a look which seemed to be something more than one of mere compassion for a homeless wayfarer whom he had rescued from death.

"He sleeps," said the Abbé; "it is well; the fever is gone, and now he will only require the good Victorine's nourishing food."

Saying this, the curé's hand sought the pulse of the sleeping lad, and as it did so his eye fell upon the open Bible.

"A book!" he said; "monsieur is a student, then, like myself. Ha! the Holy Bible," he exclaimed, as he took the book in his hands with no unpleased expression. "What a people these English are. It is their companion, their guide-book, wherever they go. Would that France were guided more by that sacred light!"

With the interest of a student he turned over for a few moments the sacred pages, when the inscription at the commencement suddenly arrested his attention. "Rupert Long!" he exclaimed with surprise; "what a strange coincidence—the resemblance too; but surely it cannot be. Yes," he said, as he suddenly snatched up the photograph which had fallen from the sleeper's hand, "this is Mary's picture, and he is Mary's son!"

Thus the old memories had come back to François Burelle—the soldier's life at Dieppe, the fair Englishwoman and her child, his true and faithful love, and the sad parting. He sighed, the good Abbé, but there was no bitterness in that sigh, as he gazed once more at the face of Mary Long and on that of her sleeping son.

In a few days Rupert was sufficiently recovered to be able to sit for a little at the churchyard gate which opened out into the public road. He had not been long there when suddenly there appeared in the distance a most unusual spectacle. A large concourse of people was evidently approaching the village. As they drew nearer he could perceive that it was a long procession, and that various flags or banners were being carried in it. Presently the sound of many voices reached his ears, chanting a hymn which the lad thought he had heard before in the cathedral at Dieppe.

As the procession began to enter the village, the few women and children and old men who were not at work in the vineyards, came out of their houses and knelt by the wayside. Even to Rupert, who had occasionally seen religious processions passing out of the old church of St. Jacques and through the narrow streets of Dieppe, what he now beheld was a strange and unusual sight. In the front walked a number of little boys in short surplices over scarlet cassocks, one of them bearing a tall metal cross. After these came a number of priests in their vestments, and these again were followed by many shorn monks dressed in white, brown or grey, with ropes round their waists. Immediately following these were men and women, the men, some of them, with red crosses on their breasts, and the women attired in black. Most of the women carried baskets, which looked as if they contained provisions, and seemed as if they were intended for a journey. But what struck Rupert most of all, was the number of cripples and sick people that seemed to be amongst them. Some of them were carried on chairs, and others supported on the arms of their friends. As the procession passed through the village the hymn "Ave Maris Stella" and then the "Magnificat" was chanted by many lips.

Rupert was so lost in wonder at this unusual spectacle in a remote country place, that he did not perceive the curé's footsteps behind him.

"Ah, mon ami," said the curé, noticing his wondering surprise, "you are looking at the pilgrims. France is still Catholic and religious in spite of Republicans and Communists. These are good people who love to serve God and pray for the Pope. May the time soon come," he added, looking up to heaven, "when under our beloved king, Henri Cinq, France and even Paris shall return to the true fold. But you are English, and a Protestant, monsieur," he continued, looking at Rupert and smiling, "and do not understand these things."

"But, Monsieur l'Abbé," answered Rupert respectfully, "if one might be so bold as to ask, what is the meaning of a pilgrimage, and where are these pilgrims going?"

"These are good people," replied the curé, "who are going to the railway-station at T—— for a long journey. They are going to Paray-le-Monial."

"Ah, Paray-le-Monial," said Rupert, who thought he remembered having seen the name on the doors of St. Jacques; "is not that thought to be a very holy place?"

"Yes," said the curé gravely, "people do consider it to be a very holy place."

"And why so, Monsieur l'Abbé, if one might dare to ask?"

"Nearly two hundred years ago," replied the curé, "there lived at Paray-le-Monial a pious woman named Marie Alcoque. She would spend whole days and nights in prayer before the altar, and after praying a great deal, and fasting a great deal, at length she sees a vision. It is the Saviour of the world who appears to her. He is sad and preoccupied with an overwhelming sorrow. He displays to her his heart. It is vast and like a consuming fire. This poor daughter of the Church appears to be as a little speck as compared to it. She loses herself in it, and seems to be consumed and swallowed up. He speaks to her. They are words of sorrow. 'My heart has bled for the world,' He says; 'what has it done for Me?' This is why these good people are going to Paray-le-Monial," added the Abbé; "they go to worship the Sacred Heart."

"The Sacred Heart," said Rupert; "does that mean the heart of Christ, Monsieur l'Abbé? I suppose it must," continued the lad, "because the clergyman who came to see us at Dieppe spoke so much about it, and said it was a meek and lowly heart, and so full of love for the weary and heavy laden. My mother said the thought comforted her so, and before she died——"

The Abbé Burelle gave a start, and a look of pain passed over his face, in spite of the self-command to which that face was accustomed, and it was difficult to conceal his agitation from the lad, as he faltered out, "And is your mother dead?"

"Yes, monsieur," replied Rupert; "that is why I left Dieppe, but I could not bear that circus life, and I wandered here."

"And when," continued the Abbé, without appearing to notice Rupert's last words, "and when did your mother die?"

"She died some months ago."

"And was she happy?" asked the curé, in faltering tones.

"Oh, yes, monsieur," replied the lad; "we were very poor and had seen better days, but still my mother was happy."

"And what was it that made her so happy? She was all alone and far away from her friends in England, was she not?"

"Yes," said the lad, "but she always was cheerful, and told me to trust in God; still I think she was far more happy after the good clergyman had been to see her and comfort her."

"And how did he comfort her?" enquired the Abbé, with a brighter look.

"He told her, Monsieur le Curé, that although she was far away from home, the Lord Jesus was as near to her there as anywhere else. He said we did not need to go and seek for Jesus anywhere, because He was always near, and that He says to us when we are sick or unhappy, 'Come and find rest.' But monsieur," continued the lad, "I cannot tell you all he said, only he gave me this Bible, and I marked the place where he had been reading to my mother."

"Let me see it," said the Abbé, stretching forth his hand once more to examine Rupert's Bible, and then he read in musical and plaintive tones, translating the English words into those of his own language as he went along—

"'Venez à moi, vous toutes qui êtes travaillés et chargés, et je vous soulagerai. Chargez-vous de mon joug, et apprenez de moi, que je suis doux et humble de cœur, et vous trouverez le repos de vos âmes.' (St. Matt. xi. 28–30). Yes," said the abbé thoughtfully, when he had read the words, "that is the best meditation of the Sacred Heart."

"But, monsieur," enquired Rupert, in hesitating tones, "do you think it would have been better for my mother if we could have taken her to Paray-le-Monial, like those sick people they have been carrying by?"

"I do not know," said the Abbé gravely, after a long pause. "You see, Monsieur Rupert, she found rest without going there."

CHAPTER VIII.—MILOR ANGLAIS.

The days passed pleasantly away under the kind Abbé's roof. Rupert soon grew strong and well again, but when he suggested that he should once more resume his journey, the curé seemed little inclined to part with his guest. An almost paternal affection was that which the Abbé Burelle seemed to have acquired for this youth, thrown upon his kindness and hospitality by so strange an accident. Thus the lad began to look upon this humble presbytère almost as his home, and it was not long before he seemed to find a place in the affections of the somewhat despotic, but no less kind-hearted Mademoiselle Victorine.

There were many ways in which Rupert could be of use to the Abbé, and on the other hand great and varied was the information with which this learned ecclesiastic began to imbue his companion's mind. To impart some of his learning to others was the good curé's delight, and in Rupert he found a most ready and intelligent scholar. Never, however, did he seek to confuse the few simple religious truths which the lad seemed to have learned from his mother and his Bible; on the contrary, the humble-minded priest and his companion might be often seen studying that English Bible together.

Thus, as we have said, the days passed pleasantly away; they might have indeed gone on so for an indefinite period, had it not been for an occurrence which came to change their noiseless tenour.

One morning a travelling-carriage, which had been lumbering up the hill-side, suddenly stopped before the little churchyard gate. A very grave-looking gentleman, dressed in deep mourning, put his head out of the window and beckoned to Rupert, who was diligently working in the Abbé's garden.

"Is the Abbé Burelle at home?" enquired the stranger, who, while he was evidently an Englishman, spoke in the purest French.

"Yes, sir," said Rupert respectfully, for he was impressed by the stranger's dignified demeanour, even more than by the postillion and horses, and the valet seated in the rumble behind. "Yes, sir," said Rupert, "the Abbé Burelle is at home; shall I tell him that you wish to speak with him?"

"Thank you," said the gentleman, "but I will get out. Spencer," he said to the valet, "will you let down the steps."

Scarcely, however, had the stranger alighted, when the front door opened and the Abbé Burelle appeared. "Milor Summerhaze," said the curé with dignified politeness, raising his broad-brimmed hat from his head, and coming forward with graceful cordiality, "I received your lordship's letter some weeks ago, and shall be delighted to guide you to those traces of the Roman occupation of which you spoke. The encampment above our village is a grand vestige of those ancient times. Did not Cæsar say of us that we were a nation 'Novarum rerum avida,' a nation desirous of new things?—alas, it is too true. Still, Milor, it is you and I who love to seek out the ancient things, and you will find within my humble roof an ancient simplicity."

The grave stranger smiled pleasantly at the Abbé's courteous welcome, as he followed (Rupert thought, with feeble steps) the good curé into his humble abode.

A few minutes after, Mademoiselle Victorine bustled out in no ordinary state of excitement. "Tenez, Monsieur Rupert," said the excited housekeeper, "one would have thought that Monsieur l'Abbé would have remembered that it is Friday, and that one cannot make a repast for a great English milor out of nothing. Hasten, Monsieur Rupert, and let us get some turnips, and carrots, and onions for the potage. One shakes one's head behind the English milor, but no; Monsieur le Curé takes no notice, and will ask him to stop to dinner. Is not that what you say in English, Monsieur Rupert?"

"'To stop to dinner,'—that is English," said the nobleman's valet, who had approached the garden-gate, and was leaning over it on both his arms, watching the excitement of Victorine and Rupert; "yes, that is English, certainly, and a good specimen of the English language too, but I suppose it means that he is going to be some time in this outlandish place, looking after old Roman encampments. What is the use of my lord having a title and plenty of money, if he spends his life in this way? Why, he might be stopping to dinner where he likes, and see how he wastes his time. Come," he said to the postillion, "we may as well be putting up the horses at once, and I must try and find a bed for his lordship at that miserable Maison d'Or."

The English nobleman seemed perfectly satisfied with Victorine's efforts in the way of dinner. The maigre soup seemed to suit his tastes very well; if, indeed, he knew that it was maigre soup which he was eating. The Abbé Burelle's books and prints, and, above all, the Abbé Burelle's conversation, seemed to absorb his notice.

As Mr. Spencer, the valet, had gloomily prognosticated, Lord Summerhaze did stop some time at the outlandish little village of Martin Eglise. The tastes of the English nobleman and the French curé coincided in so many respects that the former seemed in no way inclined to quit the place. The Roman encampment took some days to explore, and there were not a few long rambles to other places of interest in the neighbourhood. Once or twice Rupert was Lord Summerhaze's companion, and although the lad thought his lordship a very grave man, and at times somewhat melancholy, yet at others there was some pleasant conversation, and gradually the visitor began to take an interest in the lad and evidently liked to have him with him.

One day Rupert noticed that the nobleman and the curé in the course of their conversation would direct frequent looks of interest towards him, and he felt that he was the subject of their thoughts. It proved to be so, for when Lord Summerhaze had retired to his bed at the inn, the Abbé Burelle called Rupert into his bedroom and began to speak to him with some emotion.

"Mon cher Rupert," said the kind priest, "I think I have found for you a good situation. During your stay with me I have learnt to love you as a son, and there are reasons which I cannot now tell you of, why I am specially interested in your welfare. I should like you to stay with me always, but it is not for your good. It is better that you should be amongst people of your own nation and of your mother's religion. Besides," added the Abbé, smiling, "the village of Martin Eglise is not a place for a lad of spirit and intelligence to make his way in the world. Lord Summerhaze is in want of a young companion to read to him occasionally and act as his amanuensis. He has taken a fancy to you, Rupert, and has promised to be a friend to you. You must go with him, mon ami, although it is with sorrow that I bid you to do so."

"Oh, Monsieur l'Abbé, how good you are!" exclaimed Rupert, with tears in his eyes. "Can I ever forget your kindness? How gladly I would stay here if I could be of any use to you. I can never, never forget all that you have done for me, but, monsieur, I will do whatever you desire me, and if you bid me to go with Lord Summerhaze I will do so."

"Yes, my son," said the Abbé gently, "in this you must obey me. Write to me whenever you can, Rupert, and I will not forget you." So saying, the Abbé bade Rupert good-night, and the lad retired to his little chamber with a sorrowful heart.

Two days after the foregoing conversation, the travelling-carriage of Lord Summerhaze drew up at the little churchyard gate.

The good Victorine, who had been bustling about all the morning, getting ready for the lad's departure, now showed that she was only a woman after all, by bursting into tears, as Rupert, accompanied by the kind Abbé, passed for the last time the threshold of their little home and walked with slow and lingering steps to the churchyard gate, where the carriage stood. The curé himself seemed scarcely less affected than his faithful housekeeper, but restrained his emotion to give his young companion a few farewell words of counsel. To Rupert, it was indeed a sad parting from these true friends, and the sobs would come in spite of all the lad's brave efforts to restrain them. Farewell, thou peaceful little spot, farewell, thou quiet little village of Martin Eglise, and farewell, Monsieur le Curé and good Victorine! Rupert Long can scarcely see you through his tears, as the carriage swiftly bears him away from you, who are waving your hands to him from the little churchyard gate.

Lord Summerhaze was not given to talking a great deal except upon topics in which he was specially interested, and much of the first part of the journey was passed in silence, for his young attendant did not venture to engage in conversation, unless first addressed by the nobleman. But Rupert's eyes were ever open to the different scenes of interest on the way, and also to give frequent encouraging glances at the faithful Bruno, who by Lord Summerhaze's kind permission (the dog's history having been told him) was to accompany them on their journey.

The lad's mind, too, had plenty of topics for reflection, whether he thought of the past or looked forward into the future, for was he not on his way to dear old England, and who could tell how soon he might meet with his old friends the Collettes and Christine again?

Thus our traveller has plenty to think about as the carriage rolls swiftly on along the smiling vales and through the fruitful orchards of Normandy, towards Rupert's old home at Dieppe.

"IS THE ABBÉ BURELLE AT HOME?"

And Lord Summerhaze, what topics are filling his mind as he leans forward in his carriage and watches the milestones swiftly flying by? Rupert thinks he notices that at each stage of the journey his companion's face grows sadder and his lips more compressed. Surely there must be some cause why so rich and high-born a nobleman should look so sad, but what the cause may be the lad is at a loss to divine.

But now the country begins to be almost familiar to Rupert, as they draw near to Dieppe, and he gazes eagerly on some familiar landmark or reminiscence of his long country rambles. It seems, too, that Lord Summerhaze is equally interested with the objects on the roadside; for the carriage has scarcely climbed halfway up a very long hill which Rupert well remembers as not being far from Dieppe, when the vehicle suddenly stops, and in accordance with a silent nod from the nobleman, Spencer, who has come to the carriage-door, lets down the steps and assists his master to alight. Rupert notices that Lord Summerhaze has taken with him a small box out of his carriage and that he seems to totter very feebly as he walks towards a little simple wooden cross which stands by the wayside. Not a word is spoken. Spencer, who seems to understand his lordship's moods, falls back behind the carriage but Rupert can just see through the open door the struggle on the nobleman's face as he takes out of the box a wreath of immortelles and hangs it on the little wooden cross. They do not stay many minutes; Lord Summerhaze takes his seat once more in the carriage, and in half an hour's time they are driving through the streets of Dieppe.

That night they are to cross over to England, and Rupert finds no opportunity for even a hasty visit to the cemetery above the town. The lights are beginning to gleam in the harbour, and cast a weird reflection on the dense volume of smoke which is already ascending from the steamer's funnel, as the lad follows his patron across the narrow plank which leads to the vessel.

"Well, Mr. Long," said Spencer, who was quietly puffing a cigar upon the deck, now that his master had gone below—"well, Mr. Long, I think we shall have a fine passage, but the accommodation of these steamers is terribly defective. I assure you there is scarcely a thing to be had worth touching down below. My lord never seems to care about these things, but really the captain ought to be reprimanded. The eating and drinking, Mr. Long, is very defective."

"Is it?" said Rupert absently, who was gazing back upon the lights of Dieppe; "but what is it, Mr. Spencer," said the lad turning to his companion, "that makes Lord Summerhaze so sad?"

"Ah, Mr. Long, you wonder at that, do you? You noticed, perhaps, that little occurrence by the roadside?"

"Yes," said Rupert eagerly, "I did, and wondered what it meant."

"Well, Mr. Long, it is a sad story, but still, as we have nothing else to do, I will tell it you."

"Years ago," continued the valet, "we were at Fecamp. A very uninteresting place, Mr. Long, I can assure you—the Benedictine, which the monks manufacture there, however, is worth one's notice; but when people go and put it on the same level as Grand Chartreuse, why then, you know, they make a mistake—well, years ago, as I said, we were at Fecamp. My lord was there to see the church, which to him is interesting. He was there with his only daughter Lady Isabella. She was certainly, Mr. Long, a very beautiful young lady, and it was no wonder that my lord adored her, for she was as good as she was beautiful. But while we were there, Lady Isabella fell ill. There was no doctor in the town, at least of any skill, but we hoped that she would recover in a few days with care and nursing. But instead of that she got worse; fever set in, and she grew delirious. My lord was frantic and seemed beside himself. He knew of a good doctor at Dieppe, but there was no railway or telegraph, and he feared that Lady Isabella might be past his skill before the doctor could arrive. In a fit of desperation, he sent me to order the carriage. The young lady was carried into it. We drove on for miles and miles, and they never seemed to come to an end, my lord holding his daughter all this weary journey in his arms. At last, Mr Long, when we had reached that place on the hill-side where we stopped to-day, I was ordered to get down and hold a light, while my lord examined his daughter's face (he had felt her hand grow cold), but she was dead, and all that my master could do was to carry the precious remains into Dieppe and across these waters to her grave in England. That is the story, Mr. Long. I think I will say good-night," said Spencer throwing the end of his cigar into the foaming waters.

Rupert had enough to think about that night, as he paced to and fro on the deck, and watched the stars peer through the clouds and then again fade from sight. The waves were his familiar friends, and there was a pleasure in hearing their voice through the gloom. They reminded him of his old home, he thought of all that had happened since he left it, and wondered what might next befall him. And then the strange history which he had just heard! It would have puzzled him to put his meditations into words, but it seemed as if there was trouble and mystery everywhere, and he breathed a prayer that God might be his guide wherever he went.

Grief.

GRIEF, to human joy allied
By ties which none may rend apart,
The world is wide, and men abide
On sea, on shore, in crowded mart;
But where is he who doth not hide
Some shaft of thine within his heart?

One groaning beareth; one will school
His face that none the secret spy;
Each is thy tool; no partial rule
Insatiate grief may satisfy;
King, clown, philosopher and fool,
All, all! must know thee ere they die.

O Grief, against thy might displayed,
Nor strength nor weakness shall avail;
For matron staid, and blooming maid,
Thou hast a stroke which will not fail;
While none the less thy subtle raid
Can pierce the warrior's coat of mail.

And yet thy sting was impotent,
When man looked upward, free from stain;
Made innocent, he was not meant
To bear the burden of thy pain;
Thou art the med'cine, heaven sent,
To fit his soul for heaven again. S. E. G.

God's Leading.

FATHER, perplexed I stand, I know not where to turn;
I cannot see Thy leading hand; Thy loving face looks stern,
My heart is sad and sore opprest;
O do Thou for me what is best.

O make a way for me, and let me surely know
That Thou art marking out the path by which I have to go.
The way which Thou dost choose is best,
And leadeth to Thy promised rest.

I dare not choose my way, my dim eyes cannot see
Which path would lead astray, and which would lead to Thee,
But choose Thou for me which is best,
Then rough or smooth, it must be blest.

O lead me safe to Thee, through trouble, care and pain,
So Thou dost choose for me, I will not dare complain;
He whom the Lord corrects is blest;
Thy loving leading is the best.

MODEL PRAYERS.

III.

"Turn Thou me, and I shall be turned; for Thou art the Lord my God."—Jer. xxxi. 18.

WE have here another prayer that we may safely use and copy, for we find that it was heard and answered. The same speaker who says, "Turn Thou me" (v. 18) says immediately after, "After that I was turned" (v. 19).

What is the meaning of the petition? It is a very humble one. It means, "Turn Thou my will, for I cannot turn it of myself." Oh how much is needed to bring down man's pride to acknowledge that he cannot even will what is right without God's help!

Reader, have you ever yet been brought to this humbling confession? If you have been taught by the Holy Spirit, you will not deny that your will needs renewing grace. The Lord "alone can order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men." It is often through much painful discipline that this lesson is learned. We begin, perhaps, with a strong determination to do all that our conscience tells us we ought; and it may only be after many repeated failures that we at length sorrowfully admit that we cannot keep our firmest resolutions.

Is it so with you? Do you feel as if you had tried and failed so often that it is useless to try again? Then begin lower than you have ever yet begun. Begin with going to God in prayer. Use the very words here taught us. Ask God himself to "turn" you away from all evil and towards all that is good. Ask Him so to turn your will, your affections, your whole being, that you may not even desire to go wrong.

Notice two things in the model prayer we are now considering. 1. It is a prayer of faith: "Turn Thou me, and I shall be turned." Do not go, as it were, to try the experiment of asking God to help, while you yet have misgivings that you will do no better than before. Did not God create you, body and soul? Has not He who gave you your will power to control it? And is not His whole word full of assurances that He never did, and never will, refuse to help any poor soul that humbly cries to Him for help, through the Mediator whom He has provided? Remember St James's direction to one who prays: "Let him ask in faith."

2. Notice the concluding words of the prayer, for they will help to strengthen faith: "For Thou art the Lord my God." As I said just now, remember that He to whom you pray is your Creator. He is absolute in power, the Lord God Almighty, the Maker of all, the ruler of all. But observe especially this title, "The Lord my God." Can you address the Lord thus? Many can speak of "Providence," "the Almighty," or even of "our Saviour," who yet shrink from saying, "My God," or "My Saviour." Yet it is only when we can say, "Jesus Christ loved me, and gave Himself for me," that we are really believing the Gospel. If there is any lingering desire to keep back something that comes between the soul and God, so that when God says, "Repent, and turn" (Ezekiel xviii. 30), you feel, I cannot turn, I cannot make myself give up all for Christ, then go and say to God: "Lord, turn Thou me, and I shall be turned. I desire to turn, but I am weak and helpless, and I want my very will to be strengthened and turned wholly to Thee." And ask Him to enable you so to come in the name of His dear Son, that you may say and feel: "Thou art the Lord my God."

Sabbath Thoughts.

OPPORTUNITY.

"As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men."—Gal. vi. 10.

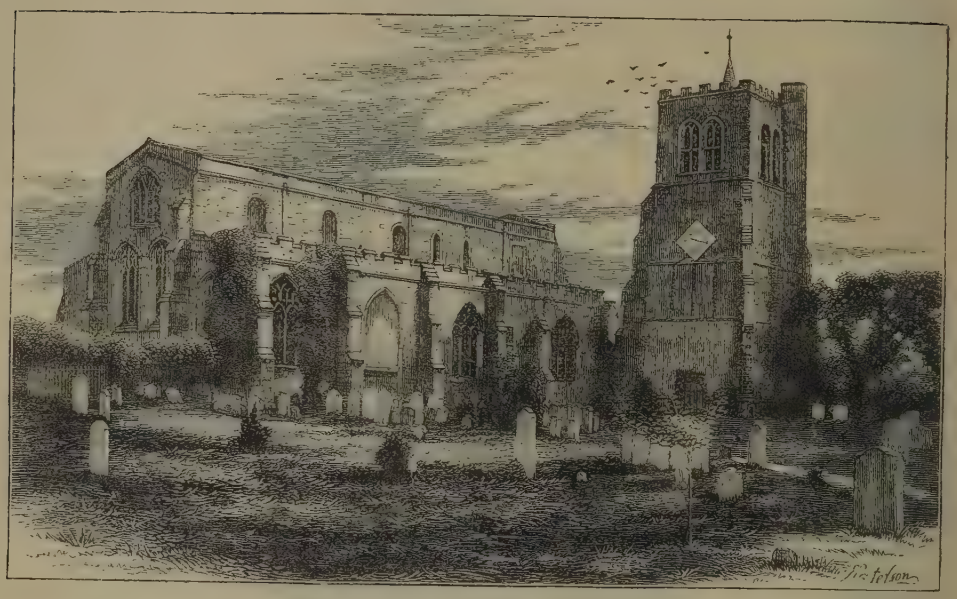
OBSERVE that St. Paul in these words stirs up his own soul as well as the souls of others: "let us do good unto all men"—not "go ye and do good." If zeal like his required to be stimulated, how much more does ours? Like a good officer, he leads and animates his men in the charge, and by his example as well as his words arouses them to action. But, observe, it is to wise and well-timed action that he calls them. "As we have therefore opportunity," we are to act; neither holding back through slothfulness, nor rushing forward through impatience when there is no need of our services. We ought to be very thankful when God honours us by granting us opportunities; we ought to watch for them and to pray for them, still seeking grace to use them aright, so that we may succeed in really doing "good," which is not so easily done as some people think.

Alas, the thought of lost opportunities may well humble us! Too often can we recall times when the hour came but not the man; when a kind word might have been said which we did not say; when help might have been given which we did not give. These thoughts, while they make more precious to us the Blood that cleanses from all sin, should also make more precious the opportunities which in God's great mercy may yet be given, and may yet through His grace be rightly improved.

The covetous man seeks opportunities of gaining riches; the ambitious man seeks opportunities of self-advancement; let it be our care as followers of Jesus Christ to seek opportunities of copying His example by doing good unto all within our reach for His sake and to His glory.

"Go, then, fill up with useful deeds
Thy threescore years and ten,
Till He who bade thee rise and work
Bids Thee lie down again."

A BUNYAN MEMORIAL.



ELSTOW CHURCH PREVIOUS TO RESTORATION

THE ancient parish church of Elstow is associated with the early life of John Bunyan. The quaint Tudor pulpit; the pew where tradition says that he sat; the grand old tower, with its belfry-chamber and its porch, where he stood trembling lest "the steeple" should fall on his head; the ancient walls and doors remain as they were in Bunyan's time. But the edifice has long been in an unsafe state, and in the beginning of last year, 1880, it was found necessary to rebuild parts of the walls and to replace the woodwork. The oak beams of the roof had done duty for three and a half centuries.

The happy thought occurred of utilising the old material for helping the restoration. The roof-beams of most churches would fetch merely the price of firewood, but those of Elstow had a value far above their intrinsic worth. Of the multitudes of pilgrims who visit the scenes made memorable by the "Immortal Dreamer," many would gladly possess some relic of the place. It was decided to publish an edition of the "Pilgrim," and to work up the best portions of the wood in the binding. The idea has been admirably carried out.* The boards of the book contain on either side a piece of the oak (six inches by four) warranted to be taken from the beams of the roof. It makes an elegant binding, and the outside has the additional attraction of an inlaid photograph copy of the best portrait of Bunyan, the original pencil-sketch by his friend R. White, which is preserved in the British Museum.

While this is the special feature of the volume, the edition is itself worthy of commendation. There is a good memoir, with bibliographical notice of early editions. The memoir is illustrated by views of various memorials, including facsimile autographs. The two parts of the "Pilgrim" have each twelve new illustrations, by W. Gunston, well designed, and in a style harmonising with the character of the edition. The book is sure to be popular, not in England only, but in America and wherever the English language is spoken and its literature prized. The likelihood is that the demand for it will be so large as to enhance the value, for the oak boards are not capable of the miraculous multiplication suggested by many historical relics.

The village lies a mile and a half south of Bedford, and still preserves its seventeenth-century features. The quaint, overhanging houses, and the venerable trees at the lower end of the village street, remain much as they were when Bunyan paced its spacious thoroughfare round to the green, where stood the ancient church and the still more antique-looking Moot House. This latter, apparently rickety, but still substantial brick and oak structure was, in Bunyan's day, and down until recently, the village hall, the word "moot" being probably a corruption of the old Saxon "Witenagemote," the palaver-house of Elstow. Here, in the large upper room, the romps and dances were carried on which Bunyan found it so hard to give up, and on the two annual fair days, for which a charter was granted by William the Conqueror, the Moot House was the scene of very considerable business. It is now used as a Sunday-school in connection with Bunyan Meeting, Bedford. The fairs are still held in May and November, and are well attended by cattle-dealers; but they are no longer the occasions of revels and riot. On the green is the stump of an ancient market-cross, the steps of which could doubtless testify to the jovial words, and perhaps in later years the earnest pleadings of Bunyan. At the side of the green is the church.

"They stepped to it, and read the writing."

The church was originally the chapel in a convent of Benedictine nuns, founded by Judith, niece of the Conquerer and widow of Waltheof, Earl of Huntingdon. The chapter-house, with its finely-groined roof, still remains, and is the vestry of the restored church. The great tower, Bunyan's "steeple-house," was built before the Reformation. It is one of the thirty towers in England that stand quite apart from the church. It is about twenty-two feet from the building. It is massive, and with four stages, each smaller than the base, giving an appearance of great stability. The bells are five in number —treble, second, third, fourth, and tenor. Tradition says that Bunyan used to ring the fourth bell. The Norman north door of the church, the newly-exposed west door with the wicket-gate, and the belfry-door, remain as they were in Bunyan's time.

"So they came up to each other, and after a short salutation, Mr. Hold-the-world propounded the question to Christian and his fellow."

The church was originally dedicated to St. Mary and St. Helena. Hence Helena stowe, corrupted into Eln'stow and Elstow.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD.

BY GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., CANON OF CANTERBURY.

RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT GREEKS.

II.

THE Olympian circle, as already explained,[1] consisted of six male and six female deities. In our former paper on the religion of the Greeks, we had described three of the males. We now resume our brief portraiture with an account of the god of war.

ARES.

It has been well said that Ares is "the impersonation of a passion." That combative propensity, which man possesses in common with a large number of animals, was regarded by the Greeks, not only as a divine thing, but as a thing of such lofty divinity that its representative must have a place among the deities of the first class or order. The propensity itself was viewed as common to man with the gods, and as having led to "wars in heaven," wherein all the greater deities had borne their part. Now that peace was established in the Olympian abode, it found a vent on earth, and caused the participation of the gods in the wars carried on among mortals. Ares was made the son of Zeus and Hera, the king and queen of heaven. He was represented as tall, handsome, and active, but as cruel, lawless, and greedy of blood. The finer elements of the warlike spirit are not his. He is a divine Ajax,[2] rather than a divine Achilles; and the position which he occupies in the Olympian circle is low. Apollo and Athené are both entitled to give him their orders; and Athené scolds him, strikes him senseless, and wounds him through the spear of Diomed.[3] His worship is thought to have been derived from Thrace and to have been introduced into Greece only a little before the time of Homer.[4] It was at no time very widely spread, or very much affected by any Grecian tribe or state, the conception being altogether too coarse to attract the sympathies of a refined people.

HEPHÆSTUS.

Hephæstus is the god of fire, and especially of fire in connection with smelting and metallurgy. He dwells in Lemnos, where he habitually forges thunderbolts for Zeus, and occasionally produces fabrics in metal of elaborate and exquisite construction. Among the most marvellous of his works are the automatic tripods of Olympus and the bronze maidens, whom he has formed to be his attendants on account of his lameness. He is the armourer of heaven, and provides the gods generally with the weapons which they use in warfare. The peculiarity of his lameness is strange and abnormal, since the Greeks hate deformity, and represent their deities generally as possessed of perfect physical beauty. It has been accounted for on the supposition that he is a Grecised Phthah,[1] introduced from Egypt, directly or indirectly,[2] and that his deformity is a modification of Phthah's presentment as a pigmy with the lower limbs misshapen. But the features common to Hephæstus with Phthah are few; the name Hephæstus is probably of pure Greek etymology, connected with φάος and φαίνω; and, on the whole, there would seem to be no evidence that Hephæstus is a foreign god more than any other. Rather, it is characteristic of the many-sidedness of the Greeks, and consequent upon the anthropomorphism which makes the Olympic community a reflection of earthly things, that there should be even in this august conclave something provocative of laughter, a discord to break the monotony of the harmony, an element of grotesqueness and monstrosity. Hephæstus in the Olympic halls is like the jester at the court of a mediæval monarch, a something to lighten the seriousness of existence, to provoke occasionally a burst of that "inextinguishable laughter," without which life in so sublime an atmosphere would be intolerable. The marriage of Hephæstus to Aphrodité is conceived in the same spirit. There was a keen sense of humour in the countrymen of Aristophanes; and the combination of the clumsy, lame, and begrimed smith with the Queen of Beauty and of Love pleased their sense of the ludicrous, and was the fertile source of many an amusing legend. "The Lay of the Net," wherewith Demodocus entertains both gods and men,[3] is a sufficient specimen of this class of lively myth, and shows that the comic features of ill-assorted marriage, on which modern playwrights have traded so freely, were fully appreciated by the Greeks, and were supposed well-suited to provoke the gods to merriment. The modern moralist will regret this unworthy representation of divine beings;[4] but it is quite in accord with the general character of the Greek religion, which reflected back upon deity all that was weak, as well as all that was strong, in man.

HERMES.

Hermes is the impersonation of commercial dealings, and hence a god who gives wealth and increase, a god of inventive power, and a god of tricks and thievery. He is "the Olympian man of business,"[1] and therefore employed in embassies and commissions, and even sometimes in the simple carrying of messages. As δώτωρ ἐάων,[2] "the giver of comforts," he secures his votaries all manner of worldly prosperity. He is industrious and inventive, constructs the seven-stringed lyre before he is a day old,[3] afterwards invents the pan's-pipes, and ultimately becomes a god of wisdom and learning generally. His thievishness must be taken to show that commercial fraud is pretty well as ancient as commerce itself, and that "the good old times" were not, as sometimes represented, an age of innocence. It has been said that he is more human than any other Olympian god; and that "he represents, so to speak, the utilitarian side of the human mind,"[4] being active, energetic, fruitful in resource, a keen bargainer, a bold story-teller, and a clever thief. His admission into the number of the Olympians is the strongest possible indication of the inferiority of the moral standard among them. The special regard paid to him by the Athenians is, however, perhaps the mere consequence of their addiction to the pursuits of commerce.

Hermes is commonly represented as a youth just attaining to manhood. The wings which adorn his head and ankles indicate the celerity of his movements. His caduceus is perhaps the golden rod of wealth given to him by Apollo in exchange for the lyre. It represents also the staff commonly borne by heralds, and in this point of view had white ribands attached to it, which in later times became serpents. Sometimes he holds a purse in his hand, to mark his power of bestowing riches.

The six female deities were Hera, Athené, Artemis, Aphrodité, Hestia, and Demeter.

HERA.

The anthropomorphism which was so main an element in the Greek religion made it requisite that motherhood, as well as fatherhood, should be enthroned in the Olympic sphere, that Zeus should have his consort, heaven its queen, and women their representative in the highest celestial position. Hera was, perhaps, originally Era, "the Earth;"[5] but this idea was soon lost sight of, and in Greek mythology, from first to last, she is quite other than the principle of mundane fecundity, quite a different being from the oriental earth-goddess, called indifferently Cybelé, Dindymené, Magna Mater, Rhea, Beltis, Mylitta, etc. Hera is, primarily, the wife of Zeus, the queen of the Olympic court, the mistress of heaven. She is "a reflected image of Zeus,"[6] and exercises all her husband's prerogatives, thunders, shakes Olympus, makes Iris her messenger, gives her orders to the Winds and the Sun, confers valour, and the like. As the personification of maternity, she presides over childbirth; and the Eileithyiæ, her daughters, act as her ministers. She does not present to us an elevated idea of female perfection, since, despite her exalted rank, she is subject to numerous feminine infirmities. Mr. Grote notes that she is "proud, jealous, and bitter;"[1] Mr. Gladstone observes that she is passionate, wanting in moral elevation, cruel, vindictive, and unscrupulous.[2] Her mythological presentation was certainly not of a nature to improve the character of those women who might take her for their model; since, although she was possessed of certain great qualities, passion, fervour, strong affection, self-command, courage, acuteness, yet she was, on the whole, wanting in the main elements of female excellence, gentleness, softness, tenderness, patience, submission to wrong, self-renunciation, reticence. She was a proud, grand, haughty, powerful queen; not a kind, helpful, persuasive, loving woman. The mythology of Greece is in few points less satisfactory than in the type of female character which it exhibits at the head of its Pantheon.

ATHENÉ.

If Hera is below the level of female excellence which we might have expected refined heathens to have represented in a chief goddess, Athené is above the level. She has a character which is without a flaw. Originally, as it would seem, a conscious impersonation of the divine wisdom, and therefore fabled to have sprung full-grown from the head of Zeus, she became a distinct and substantive deity at a very early date, and was recognised as the "goddess of wisdom, war, polity, and industrial art."[3] Homer places hér, together with Zeus and Apollo, on a higher platform of divinity than the other deities,[4] and makes her even oppose Zeus when he is in the wrong, thwart him, and vindicate right and truth in his despite.[5] It has been said that she is "without feminine sympathies—the type of composed, majestic, and unrelenting force;"[6] and this is so far true that she has certainly little softness, absolutely no weakness, and not many distinctly feminine characteristics. But she was recognised, like her Egyptian counterpart, Neith, as the goddess of good housewifery, "patronising handicraft, and expert at the loom and spindle,"[7] no less than as the wise directress of statesmen and warriors. Undoubtedly, the atmosphere in which she moved was too cold, calm, and clear for her ever to have attracted to herself any very large share of human sympathy; but she exercised an elevating influence on the nobler spirits of both sexes, as combining the three attributes of purity, strength, and wisdom in the highest possible degree, and so furnishing at once a model for imitation, and a support and stay for feeble souls in the spirit world, where they had otherwise little on which they could place any firm reliance. The universally-received myth of Mentor and Telemachus acted as a strong reinforcement to the power of conscience, which the young Greek felt might be the voice of Athené speaking within him, advising him for his true good, and pointing out to him the path of honour and duty. Athené's special connection with Athens and Attica added much to her importance in the Greek religious system, since it brought the best minds and most generous natures of Hellas peculiarly under the influence of a thoroughly high and noble religious conception.

ARTEMIS.

Artemis is altogether a shadowy divinity. She is a "pale reflection of her brother,"[1] Phœbus Apollo, whose attributes she reproduces in a subdued form, being, like him, majestic, pure, chaste, a minister of death, and a dexterous archer. Nothing is peculiar to her except her presidency over hunting, which determined her general presentation to the eye by the Greek artists. She embodied and personified that passion for the chase which was common to the Hellenes with most energetic races. It was supposed that she dwelt mainly upon earth, haunting the forests and the mountains, dressed as a huntress, and accompanied by her favourite hounds. Her connection with the moon was an after-thought in the Greek mythology, as was that of Apollo with the sun. It arose mainly from the fact that hunters, to be successful, had to commence their operations by night, and needed the light of the moon in order to make their arrangements.

The Artemis of Ephesus was the embodiment of a different idea.[2] She took the place of the great Asiatic Nature-goddess—Cybelé, Rhea, Magna Mater, Beltis, Mylitta—and had nothing in common with the Artemis of Hellas proper but the name. "Her image, shaped like a mummy, was of black wood; the upper part of the body was ornamented with the breasts of animals, the lower with figures of them."[3] She was a mere impersonation of the principle of fecundity in nature—"a Pantheistic deity, with more of an Asiatic than Hellenic character."[4]

APHRODITÉ.

Aphrodité is the antithesis, and in some sort the complement, to Athené. She is the impersonation of all that is soft and weak and erring in female nature, as Athené is of all that is high and pure and strong. Goddess of beauty and love, not, however, of love in its more elevated form, but rather of sensual desire, she was received by the Greeks probably from an Asiatic source, but so transmuted and Hellenised as to have become, when we first meet with her, a completely national divinity.[5] Hellenic in the whole character of her beauty, she is well described by a living English poet[6] in a passage which is eminently classical:

> "Idalian Aphrodité beautiful,
> Fresh as the foam, new bathed in Paphian wells,
> With rosy slender fingers backward drew
> From her warm brow and bosom her deep hair
> Ambrosial, golden round her lucid throat
> And shoulder: from the violets her light foot
> Shone rosy-white, and o'er her rounded form,
> Between the shadows of the vine-branches,
> Floated the golden sunlight as she moved."

Nothing so lovely in form and colour and texture and combination of rare charm, graced the splendid chambers of the Olympian court—nothing so ravishing had ever presented itself to the vision of painter or poet. But the beauty was altogether physical, sensuous, divorced alike from moral goodness and mental power. Silly and childish, easily tricked and imposed upon, Aphrodité is mentally contemptible, while morally she is odious. Tyrannical over the weak, cowardly before the strong, frail herself and the persistent stirrer up of frailty in others, lazy, deceitful, treacherous, selfish, shrinking from the least touch of pain, she repels the moral sentiment with a force almost equal to that wherewith she attracts the lower animal nature. Hence the Greek cannot speak of her without the most violent conflict of feeling. He is drawn to her, but he detests her; he is fascinated, yet revolted; he admires, yet he despises and condemns, and his condemnation, on the whole, outweighs his admiration. He calls her

> "A goddess verily of many names—
> Not Cypris only, but dark Hades, too,
> And Force resistless, and mad, frantic Rage,
> And sheer untempered Craving, and shrill Grief."[1]

He allows, but he rebels against her power over him; he protests even when he surrenders himself; and hence, on the whole, Aphrodité exercises a less corrupting influence in Greece than might have been anticipated. That the pantheon should contain a goddess of the kind was of course to some extent debasing. Bad men could justify themselves by the divine example, and plead powerlessness to resist a divine impulse. But their conscience was not satisfied; they felt they sinned against their higher nature; and thus, after all, the moral standard was not very seriously affected by the existence of the Cyprian goddess among the Olympic deities.

HESTIA.

Hestia is still more shadowy than Artemis. She is, in part, the feminine counterpart of Hephæstus, the goddess of Fire; but she is principally the impersonation of the second character of each hearth and home, whether domestic, tribal, or national. Hestia presided over the private hearths and homesteads of all Greeks, over the Prytaneia of cities, and over the altars kept ablaze in the temples which were centres of confederacies. She invested them with a sacred character, watched over them, protected them. Her personality was but slightly developed. Still she seems to have been regarded as possessing, to a remarkable extent, the qualities of holiness and purity; and thus to have practically maintained in Greek domestic life a high and pure standard, such as has scarcely been much exceeded among Christians. She was fabled to have vowed perpetual virginity; and it is clear that, together with Athené and Artemis, she upheld among the

[5] Mr. Gladstone takes a different view. He regards the Aphrodité of Homer as scarcely a Greek divinity ("Homer and the Homeric Age," vol. ii. pp. 244–5). But to me it seems, that, even in Homer, her character is as thoroughly Greek as her name.
[6] See Tennyson's "Œnone," ll. 170–178.

[1] Sophocl. Fragm. xxiii. (Ed. Brunck).

Greeks the idea of virginal purity as a transcendental phase of life, a moral perfection, whereto the best and purest might not only aspire, but attain, as the result of earnest endeavour.

DEMETER.

De-meter, the "Earth-Mother," was an original Greek conception, corresponding to one common among the Oriental nations, the conception personified by Maut in Egypt, Beltis or Mylitta in Babylon, Cybelé in Phrygia, etc. The earth on which man lives, and from which he derives the food that sustains him, was viewed as a kind and bountiful parent—the nurse, the feeder, the supporter, the sustainer of mankind. Personified as a goddess, she demanded the worship and gratitude of all, and was hence a universal deity, though specially honoured in certain places. In the Greek religion Demeter was closely connected with agriculture, since the earth in Greece did not support men without toil. She made the Greeks acquainted with the growing of cereals, the operations of tillage, and bread-making. Moreover, as agriculture was "the foundation of all social and political ordinances, and inseparably connected with the introduction of peaceable and orderly ways of life, Demeter, under her title of Thesmophoros, was the ennobler of mankind, the founder of civilisation and lawgiving." (Döllinger.) She was thus more in Greece than she was in Asia. Her position in the greatest of the mysteries — the Eleusinian — was probably owing to this double function, this combination of a Nature-goddess with a deity of law and order, the power that led man on from the simple nomadic condition to all the refinements and complications of advanced political life.

"These were the prime in order and in might;
The rest were long to tell, though far renown'd,
Th' Ionian gods, of Javan's issue held
Gods, yet confess'd later than heav'n and earth,
Their boasted parents: Titan, Heav'n's first born,
With his enormous brood, and birthright seiz'd
By younger Saturn; he from mightier Jove,
His own and Reah's son, like measure found;
So Jove usurping reign'd: these first in Crete
And Ida known; thence on the snowy top
Of cold Olympus rul'd the middle air,
Their highest heav'n; or on the Delphian cliff,
Or in Dodona, and through all the bounds
Of Doric land; or who with Saturn old
Fled over Adria to th' Hesperian fields,
And o'er the Celtic roam'd the utmost isles.
* * * * *
Nor had they yet among the sons of Eve
Got them new names; till wand'ring o'er the earth,
Through God's high sufferance for the trial of man,
By falsities and lies the greatest part
Of mankind they corrupted to forsake
God their Creator, and th' invisible
Glory of Him that made them to transform
Oft to the image of a brute, adorn'd
With gay religions full of pomp and gold,
And devils to adore for deities:
Then they were known to men by various names,
And various idols through the heathen world."—

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

MARCH 20.

THE DAUGHTER OF JAIRUS. LUKE VIII. 41-56.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 54.—'And He put them all out, and took her by the hand, and called, saying, Maid, arise.'

CONNECTION.—There are two separate references, which determine the place of this miracle in the narrative. Matthew (ix. 18) expressly says that it was at the close of the discourse at the feast in his own house, that the appeal was made to Christ to come to the house of Jairus. This is, of course, decisive. With equal clearness, again, Mark and Luke assign the miracle to the time when Jesus had recrossed the lake to Capernaum, after the stilling of the storm and the cure of the Gadarene demoniac. See vers. 40, 41, and Mark v. 21, 22. Luke, it is true, has related Matthew's feast considerably earlier (ch. v. 29), but no doubt the correct explanation is that the feast is there described (so in Matt. and Mark) to bring it into connection with the narrative of Levi's call; a considerable interval having in fact elapsed. Since the meal in Simon's house, considered in the last of these 'Studies,' the great series of Parables, beginning with that of the Sower, had been delivered before the Saviour crossed the lake to the eastern side. See the earlier part of this chapter.

I. THE APPEAL OF JAIRUS.—Read vers. 41, 42. Both Mark and Luke give the father's name, so marking the specialty of the miracle, as well as authenticating it in that neighbourhood —Jairus is the Heb. Jair (Judges x. 3–5). The Synagogue at Capernaum has become doubly interesting to us, from the circumstances of its erection by the Roman centurion (ch. vii. 5, read the synagogue) and from this miracle.* A ruler. The rulers are also called elders, as in ch. vii. 3. Jairus, in that capacity, would have accompanied the deputation to entreat Christ's help for the centurion—but now he comes for himself, an almost broken-hearted father! Compare the different evangelists for the description of his impassioned gestures, his faltering words, 'My little daughter lieth at the point of death!' (Mark). 'My daughter is even now dead!' (Matt.) One only daughter: a heightening touch of pathos. So the widow's only son (vii. 12) and the only brother in the home at Bethany (John xi. 5). Besought Him that He would come. Here was strong faith. 'Lay Thy hands upon her, and she shall live!' (Matt., Mark). Yet the faith of the heathen soldier had been stronger still: 'Say in a word, and my servant shall be healed.' Christ listened at once to the affecting appeal, rose from Matthew's table and went forth. The people thronged Him. Jairus, from his office, would be well known and popular; a multitude of guests had been listening to Christ's words; the population were thoroughly aroused by the wonders He had wrought; when He had landed, a little time before, 'they were all waiting for Him.' All this made the miracle that followed more signal, and its evidence more conclusive.

II. AN INTERRUPTION ON THE WAY.—Read vers. 43–48. The miracle that intervened is itself most deserving of study, and full of teaching as to the power of faith and the grace of Jesus; but it must now be passed over rapidly, or regarded simply as an episode on our Lord's way to the house, appearing to interrupt Him, calling away His attention from the agonised father who stood by! How precious was every moment! And when Jesus 'turned Him about in the press' (Matt., Mark) interrogating the crowd, talking with His disciples, listening to the explanation of the trembling woman whose touch of faith had brought her healing, we think chiefly of the eager impatience with which Jairus must have thought of his little daughter who 'lay a-dying'! Yet there is no word of any such feeling. Faith, though tried by apparent delay, can wait Christ's time; and this deed of love upon the way might after all serve to encourage the parent's fainting heart. The twelve years of this poor woman's malady may be mentioned by the sacred writers on account of the coincidence with the age of Jairus' daughter. As long as the child had lived, so long had the woman suffered!

* Some shattered relics discovered by travellers at Tell Hûm are in all probability the ruins of this building. There are pedestals of columns and Roman capitals, on one of which is engraved the pot of manna. See description and engraving in Sunday at Home, 1868, p. 281; also Edersheim's Sketches of Jewish Life, p. 257 (R.T.S.)

> Note here a hint characteristic of the writer as a physician. Mark says she 'had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse.' But Luke writes only that she could not be healed. To a professional eye, the case was beyond cure.

III. The Death-chamber.—Read vers. 49–53. Thy daughter is dead. It seemed, then, as if Jesus was too late! Oh, that interruption by the way! The friends of Jairus, at least, plainly thought that all was over now, past remedy. (Had they not heard of the miracle at the gate of Nain?) Trouble not the Master—very expressive in the original—do not worry Him. It is to Jairus that they speak, confirming the worst fears that he had brokenly expressed when He first fell at Jesus' feet. Christ overhears, and hastens to reassure the bereaved father in words which have ever since been a source of strength to mourners, standing as on the threshold of a great sorrow, side by side with Jesus: Be not afraid, only believe. So they enter the house. But the crowd must remain outside, not that the miracle may be wrought in secrecy, but for the sake of silence and reverence in the chamber of death. Only His three most favoured disciples and the parents of the child might now draw near. There was need that such silence should be imposed: for already the house was full of 'tumult' (Mark), the 'minstrels' (Matt.) or flute-players, hired for such occasions, mingling their professional wailings with the sincerer tears of true mourners.

> For reference to such kind of mourning, see Jer. ix. 17 (2 Chron. xxxv. 25); Sunday at Home, 1859, p. 775; Thomson's Land and the Book. The word bewailed means literally, 'were beating their breasts.'

Christ's word of majesty stills the tumult for a moment. 'Why make ye this ado?' (Mark). Weep not!—in a different tone from that in which He had addressed the widow of Nain, ch. vii. 13. She is not dead, but sleepeth. Some have strangely supposed that these words are to be taken of a literal, physical fact, that death was but apparent, and the miracle therefore only one in seeming. The bystanders could have contradicted this, knowing that she was dead! And thus their scorn and bitter laughter confirm to us the reality of the wonder. What Our Lord means is what He meant in the case of Lazarus, 'our friend sleepeth,' John xi. 2. In one sense the death of God's children always is a sleep, 1 Thess. iv. 13, 14. There shall be an awaking in the end. But here there is the further assurance that the awaking is to be immediate.

IV. The Maiden Raised.—Read vers. 54–56. His time of power had come! First, the silence and solemnity of the hour must be inviolate. He put them all out—still no doubt laughing him to scorn—but what of that? His words were not now for them. So they stand around the couch, those six persons, where the little girl is lying pale and still. What hushed expectation, as He took her by the hand, in outward token of His deed of power. Two words only did He speak: St. Mark has preserved them to us in the language in which they were uttered,*

'Talitha cumi . . . . My lamb—my pet lamb, arise!'

Never did Jesus speak more gently—never with mightier power. And as He utters the words, the soft hues of life flush back into the sweet child's face, she opens her eyes . . . . her spirit came again. Nor life only, but health and strength. She does not simply look up, once more a pale invalid, to recover by slow degrees—but she is strong. She arose straightway, 'and walked' (Mark). And then He who had supernaturally restored her life sends her back to natural means for its sustenance. He commanded to give her meat ('food'), at once betokening the completeness of her recovery, defining the limits of the miracle, and showing His gentle care for the child; for 'He was a loving man, genial in His feelings, full of human sympathies, fond of young folks. He would enter at once into the circle of the little damsel's reawakened consciousness, and understand how sweet to her young fresh appetite, after the long abstinence to which she had been subjected in her illness, would be "something to eat." Even the child's mother was not so motherly as Jesus.'—Dr. James Morison. He will not supersede ordinary means where these are sufficient. (So in the case of Lazarus (John xi. 44), Christ calls him from the grave, but the attendants must loose the grave clothes.) The astonishment, joy, thankfulness, of that happy home we can well imagine: but why the injunction to tell no man? See for the general reasons of this command, International Lesson, Feb. 27 ("Sunday at Home," Feb. 19). Christ would still be known in His chief character as the giver of spiritual life, and not even by marvels such as this would He have men's attention distracted from that highest work.

> There may also have been a special reason in this child's case. Jesus 'would not have this young and happy life burdened with the weight of such a mystery; if possible, the girl herself was not to know it. The widow's son at Nain might bear the burden, and meet the curious eyes bent upon him, and answer as he could the eager questions asked about that other life, of which he had caught a glimpse. But this child, just on the verge of happy girlhood, must be spared it all. "She is not dead, but sleepeth," He said; and He called her back to her place on earth, as one who had only been wrapt in a deeper slumber than usual.'†

Questions.

1. What was the office and function of the rulers of the synagogue?

2. On what occasions were Peter, James, and John called to special companionship with Our Lord?

3. Enumerate the cases in which the very expressions used by Christ are given in the original Hebrew (or Syro-Chaldaic); by what evangelist, and from the recollection of which of the apostles.

4. Illustrate the different manifestations of faith, in connection with the several miracles wrought by Christ in Capernaum.

5. Mention Our Lord's three raisings from the dead, with the circumstances peculiar to each. How have these been used to illustrate the impartation of spiritual life?

* The word Talitha is from the Heb. Taleh, 'a lamb.' So Isa. lxv. 25, etc.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HOUSE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SQUIRE BENTLEY'S TREAT."

CHAPTER I.

THE Sunday afternoon lesson was at an end. Mr. Norman, as he closed his book, looked gravely round at the young group before him. With the exception of a little niece, then staying in his house on a visit, the class consisted only of his own children. An hour of a Sunday afternoon devoted to reading and studying the Bible was an established rule in the household. The lesson that day had been upon Solomon's choice, and as Mr. Norman glanced at the young faces around him, the thought passed through his mind of the individual life fast coming to each, and of the special blessings that might seem most desirable in connection with their future lot. The thought prompted the question, "Children, if, like Solomon, you might have some great desire granted, what would be your particular request?"

The answer did not come very promptly; young hearts in the first hazy, happy glow of early life, know but little of distinct hopes or definite purposes. Then William, the eldest son, thinking some answer was required of them, replied, "Father, we could none of us wish a better wish than Solomon's."

"No," said Mr. Norman, "and there is a heavenly wisdom which all may possess, which is truly the foundation of all other blessings."

Harry, an impetuous lad of ten years old, was the next speaker: "Yes, father, I understand what you mean; but I believe William will be wise in every sense, clever, and fond of study and books. But if I might have what I most wish, I should like to do something great, some good or difficult deed, which people should remember long years afterwards."

"You would live just for fame, Harry."

Harry's face flushed. "Oh no, father, not that exactly, but I do like enterprise and adventure, even danger; you know I do. I think I ought to be a soldier."

Mr. Norman smiled back into the young, enthusiastic face. He knew well, that with the ardent, enterprising spirit, beat a generous kindly heart, qualities that might one day develope into more than ordinary nobility of character.

Harry turned to his cousin Dora. "Come, Dora, what would you say?"

Dora was a year younger than Harry. She looked up shyly, as she answered gravely, "I haven't thought much about it. I don't fancy I could be very wise, or brave either. I think, though, I should like to do something very useful, and help people very much some day."

Harry impulsively pushed back his clustering brown curls. "I have it, Dora; you ought to be a nurse, and go out to the wars with me; you would make a famous hand attending the sick and wounded."

"The people you had helped to bruise and destroy."

"Oh, father, how gravely you look at things—but still, you are quite right," and Harry sat back in his chair, and a look of sudden solemnity flitted across his face. The expression was but momentary, his usual vivacity instantly returned. "Now let one of the others speak," he said. But the others referred to consisted only of the junior members of the family, John, Herbert, and Frank. Mr. Norman passed them over in silence, as too young for opinion. Yet there was one more who had not spoken; but no one thought of referring so practical a question to her, one of the little band yet so painfully apart from them all, and separated from their pleasures and pursuits.

Millicent, Mr. Norman's eldest child, had never taken her place, or acted her part in the little family group. That Sunday afternoon, she reclined on a chair adopted to her use, wheeled close to her father's side. Every feature of her delicate face spoke of long-continued pain. A fall in early childhood had been followed by a serious weakness; she could never be upright and strong, like others, and the sense of her trial smote acutely upon her naturally sensitive spirit. Millicent was not patient, and her cross pressed heavily. Her eager, passionate nature fretted continually against the deformed helpless frame. She could never fill her place in life like other girls, she told herself; her parents could never take joy and pride in her; others might be happy and glad, but she must always be isolated, shut out from their pleasures and enjoyments. She caught a gleam of a beautiful world around, and felt herself as debarred from all its joys as a bird imprisoned in a cage, which catches a whiff of sweet woods and winds, and sees a free heaven above, where it can never soar, because of its iron bars which close it round on every side.

Mr. Norman glanced at her face, and as quickly looked away again. A young life whose possibilities were so limited, what desires were open to her, it seemed only mockery to ask. But Millicent had caught the glimmer of interrogation in her father's eyes. Clasping suddenly her thin hands, her dark eyes pathetic in their intensity of desire, she said, "Oh, I would give the whole wide world to be beautiful!"

Dead silence followed the unexpected outburst. Quick tears of sympathy sprang to Harry's eyes, and a look of unspeakable pain passed over Mr. Norman's face, as, after a moment's pause, he said, "Oh Millicent, to me, to all of us who love you, you are that already, my child!" He spoke gently, but Millicent detected the ring of anguish in her father's voice. Laying her head on his shoulder, she hid her face from sight, already she was ashamed of her hasty, impulsive utterance.

"Was I very wrong?" she said in a low tone.

"Your words were hasty words; but the spirit in which you meet your trial is wrong, dear Millicent."

The girl's hands tightened in their clasp, as in the same low voice she said, "Yes, father, I know it; but my lot is hard."

Millicent did not realise that her complaining spirit also made their lot hard for those who loved her best. Mr. Norman's face was very sad, as, softly stroking her hair, he said gently, "Poor Millicent, poor child, may God give you grace to bear it."

Millicent remained silent, and, at a gesture from Mr. Norman, the other children quietly quitted the room.

But some one else, of whose presence she had not been aware, had heard Millicent's passionate exclamation. A lady had pushed open a door at the other end of the room, and Millicent's words had arrested her steps. She had stood a silent listener and spectator of the little scene that had followed. It was Mrs. Grantley, Dora's mother, who had accompanied her little daughter on her visit. She had intended entering the room for the purpose of obtaining a book, but Millicent's words had caused her to stop suddenly on the threshold. At Mr. Norman's mute command to the children she quietly withdrew. But the words had stirred a thrill of sympathy in her heart for the afflicted child, and for the fond parents, upon whom the trial must also inevitably fall. And with the feeling came also the desire to help or ease in some way the heavy burden. The opportunity speedily arrived.

The evening came on wet and stormy, and only Mr. Norman and his two sons ventured to church. Mrs. Norman was suffering from headache, and remained in her own room. The three younger children and Dora gathered round Mrs. Grantley. Millicent lay on her couch by the window, pale and listless; the inert, weary look upon her face was pitiful. She held a book in her hand, but the reading was plainly only a pretence.

Dora suggested that someone should read aloud.

"We have nothing fresh," said Frank. "We have read all our stories through. Aunt Grantley, I wish you would tell us something."

"Oh, yes; mother tells splendid stories," said Dora.

With the exception of Millicent, the request became unanimous.

"Would you like it, dear?" Dora asked gently.

"Just as Aunt Grantley pleases," was the laconic reply.

But the next moment Millicent blushed at her discourtesy. Raising herself slightly, "If you will be good enough to tell the children a story, I am sure I shall like to listen," she said, and then leaned back again with the same air of listless languor.

The story could have no possible interest for her; but the children interpreted her response according to their own eager spirit, and sat silent for their aunt to begin.

ON THE TRACK OF THE STORM.

III.—THE WINDS.

THE March winds are regarded by us as the variable benefactions of spring. We are apt to call them capricious—which is altogether a mistake on our part, for there is nothing more capricious in the movement of a wind than there is in the movement of a world, and the one and the other both illustrate the reign of law. And if spring be a pleasant time in the scenes it presents and the hopes it inspires, it may be said to be greatly due to the fact that in this season the benevolent Disposer of Nature is "walking on the wings of the wind." The wind brings the warming beam and the cleansing shower; it is the wind which wakens at once the young bud and the young bird, and calls up all Nature's busy labourers, the insect in the grass, the rook in the old tree, and all the countless races who seem at this season to realise the dawn of a new day in nature, and to wake up to a life of labour and of love.

There can be no doubt that something is communicated by these March winds to the atmosphere which gives its velvety coat to the peach, as well as its delicious taste to the strawberry; depend upon it, the March wind helps to perfume the rose, to scent the lily, and to give flavour to the pear and the apple.

And how does it all come about? It seems to make real the wonderful ways of the old fable of the ancients who regarded Apollo as the Sun and Mercury as his messenger. The March winds are the messengers of the Sun; they are the great awakeners, but then, that is because they bear warmth upon their breezes. The winds, indeed, as naturally as any other of the innumerable works and ways of Nature, furnish us with a view of the ways of the Great King.

Perhaps it is not quite easy to realise what the winds do for us. The old Eastern tales tell what many have thought to be a charming story of Gulnare, the Queen of the Under-Sea folk. Down at the bottom of the sea there were people who were never wetted by the water, could see as well as we can see, and had their own wonderful language, and could transport themselves at will from place to place. We are like them: we live at the bottom of an aerial ocean—the atmosphere around us reaching up, at a rough calculation, about forty-five miles. We move, in fact, to use a humorous but patent illustration, like gold-fish in a transparent glass vase. But this aerial ocean is to a remarkable degree at once permeable by the sun's rays and yet very little disturbed by their direct action. And yet "those rays," says Dr. Tyndall, "when they fall upon the earth heat its surface, and when they fall upon the ocean provoke evaporation; the air in contact with the surface shares its heat, is expanded, and ascends into the upper regions of the atmosphere; while the vapour from the ocean also ascends, because of its lightness, carrying, no doubt, air along with it; where the rays fall vertically on the earth—that is to say between the tropics—there the heating of the surface is greatest." And here we have a very compact and lucid explanation of the cause of winds, of their more temperate play in our climate, and of their wild and terrible display in tropical scenes.

For as to what the winds can do, and the different ways in which they can disport themselves in other regions, we have no space for description. The tremendous hurricanes and tornadoes of the West Indies, the poisonous sirocco, or the sand blast of Arabia, the seasonable monsoon of India, the hot harmattan of Africa, or the water-spout of the ocean; these and many other modes of atmospheric action caused by the wind do not fall within the limits of a short paper designed more especially to call attention to the more friendly and benevolent movements of the air.

But even storms are friendly; they are followed, as has so often been noticed, by a sensible improvement in the air and increased comfort; as some one has said, something has been going wrong in Nature's household, and these are the besoms to clear and to cleanse. A storm will frequently check a pestilence which all human skill was quite unequal to prevent; cholera epidemics, it has been noticed, have usually been attended by a great stillness in the atmosphere, by which no doubt the indication was given of the concentration of the poison. Dr. Child says, "On the banks of the La Plata, in South America, there is a wind which comes charged with the germs of intermittent fever from the marshes lying to the north. The wretched inhabitants droop and sicken, and shiver into their graves; suddenly a hurricane sweeps across the Pampas from the cold summits of the Andes in the south-west, and in a few days the seeds of the disease are roughly yet effectually expelled by its searching force." And our March winds perform in a more gentle manner very much the same kindly service for us; their work has been very truly, as well as delicately and poetically, described by Longfellow:

"A wind came up out of the sea,
And said, 'O mists, make room for me!'

It hailed the ships, and cried, 'Sail on,
Ye mariners, the night is gone!'

And hurried landward far away,
Crying, 'Awake! it is the Day!'

It said unto the forest, 'Shout!
Hang all your leafy banners out!'

It touched the wood-bird's folded wing,
And said, 'O bird, awake and sing!'

And o'er the farms, 'O chanticleer,
Your clarion blow, the day is near!'

It whispered to the fields of corn,
'Bow down, and hail the coming morn!'

It shouted through the belfry-tower,
'Awake, O bell! proclaim the hour!'

It crossed the churchyard with a sigh,
And said, 'Not yet; in quiet lie.'"

Such is that wind which is, however, the pleasant and refreshing gale of life; and there are seasons in the history of the soul when, becalmed and stagnant, it sighs for such impulses, and sings:

"Celestial breeze, no longer stay."

Unsubstantial, immaterial, it is not therefore wonderful that in the early and primitive ideas of all nations the winds should present an analogy to the mind of spiritual being and existence; for it is to be remembered, that what we speak of frequently as wind is air, the atmosphere round us in a state of agitation by the subtle power of motion; the motion itself is quite beyond our comprehension, although we apprehend its cause. And so, among the myths of the old American Indians, God was personified in the wind, and in many instances there was an identification of the Divinity with the Wind. The priests of the old Esquimaux prayed to Sillam Innua, the Owner of the Winds, as the highest existence, and the abode of the dead they called Sillam Aipane, the "House of the Winds." Men who have devoted their lives almost to the study of the ancient peoples of the American continent, say that there is scarce a nation on that continent but possesses some vague tradition of an origin from Four Brothers, sometimes spoken of as the four rain-bringers, four men who came from the four corners of the earth, and brought with them the sacred fire, and pointed out to men the sacred plants, all evidently in allusion to the winds. It is not so with the American Indians alone. That of which we speak as wind has in many languages, and among many peoples, been the nearest approach to the representation of the innermost springs and fountains of life; the motions of the air have been associated in thought and in language with the idea of God and the movements of the human soul. The word spiritual is derived from the Latin spirare to blow, or to breathe; in Latin, again, if we look for the derivation of the word animus, the mind, or anima, the soul, they evidently come from the Greek anemos, signifying the wind, and aēmi, to blow; so with many other words. In Greek, the words for soul, or spirit, psuche, pneuma, thumos, are all derived directly from words signifying the wind, or the breath. It is so also in Hebrew: the word ruach is the word which in the Old Testament is translated, according to the context, sometimes by "wind," sometimes by "spirit," sometimes by "breath." Thus, as it has been truly said, in so many languages, etymologically certainly, ghosts and gusts, breaths and breezes, the Great Spirit, and the great wind, are one and the same; and from this point of view our Lord's words to Nicodemus acquire a singular significance.

A SHIPWRECK

Nicodemus sought our Lord by night; they were sitting alone together. It is not unnatural to imagine the night wind was heard sighing past their habitation. "Thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit," or, the Divine breath. There was a pointed analogy which the word suggested, whether our Lord was speaking in the Greek, as we possess his words, or, which is more likely to such a visitor, in the Hebrew. And thus, very truly, a gentle and almost forgotten poet sings:

"Ye viewless minstrels of the sky!
I marvel not, in times gone by,
That ye were deified;
For even in this later day,
To me oft has your power or play,
Unearthly thoughts supplied.

Awful your power! when by your might
You heave the wild waves, crested white,
Like mountains in your wrath;
Ploughing between them valleys deep,
Which, to the seaman roused from sleep,
Yawn like death's opening path!

Still, thoughts like these are but of earth,
And you can give far loftier birth:
Ye come—we know not whence!
Ye go—can mortals trace your flight?
All imperceptible to sight
Though audible to sense.

The sun, his rise and set we know;
The sea, we mark its ebb and flow;
The moon, her wax and wane;
The stars, man knows their courses well;
The comet's vagrant path can tell;
But you his search disdain.

But ah, to me when fancy stirs
My thoughts ye seem heaven's messengers,
Who leave no path untrod;
And when, as now at midnight's hour,
I hear your voice in all your power,
It seems the voice of God."

So that the winds, as we have said, immaterial in their origin and source, really become, and have been regarded in all ages, as illustrating the ways of the King "who maketh the winds His messengers."

"As fickle as the wind," "as free as the wind," are terms which poets have been fond of using; even Tennyson has, in some of his early verses, ascribed to the winds this imaginary freedom:

"The winds, as at their hour of birth,
Leaning upon the ridged sea,
Breathed low around the rolling earth,
With mellow preludes, 'We are free!'
The streams through many a lilied row,
Down carolling to the crispèd sea,
Low tinkled with a bell-like flow
Atween the blossoms, 'We are free!'"

Very pretty, very poetical, but, nevertheless not true: the streams move beneath the law of the wind, and the winds are themselves quite beneath the influence of a law of motion arising from the variations of heat created by the far-distant sun.

Some of the noblest passages of Scripture evidently suggest that the winds, as they are amongst the most magnificent, so also they are amongst the most mysterious of the ways of God: "He bringeth the wind out of His treasures." "He holdeth the winds in His fist."

It may be said, notwithstanding what we have known here occasionally of "the wind and tempest roaring high," we in these latitudes are ignorant of the great and tremendous force of the wind; it is within the tropics that we become aware of the great terrors of the storm-power. And perhaps, this, without much scientific information, may demonstrate how much we are indebted to the sun for the variations of wind and weather. As the equator lies beneath the vertical rays of the sun twice a year at the two equinoxes—and the same holds good of all the places within the equatorial zone—but in such a manner that the periods are always approaching together, until they fall coincident under the tropics which are only warmed by the vertical rays of the sun once in the year, namely the Tropic of Cancer at the time of our longest day, and the Tropic of Capricorn on our shortest day—and as the sun which comes twice a year to be directly over this region, never goes far enough away from it, or, rather, it from the sun, to allow of any cooling; so are caused those great electrical disturbances, from which are born the tremendous and rending storms, although, in general, from the ascent, and exceeding rarity of the air, there is an absence of wind. In German legends we read of a cavern in which an old creature, Dame Holle, sits and brews the weather. The region of calms and storms we have described is an actual Dame Holle's Hole; it has been truly said all the weather in the whole world is manufactured there. But this is widely different from the Finland, Lapland, and Breton witches, who drove a profitable trade by the sale of favourable winds to superstitious sailors!

At once among the most beautiful, benevolent and useful of these phenomena of physical geography, we like to think of the trade winds. The Irish humourist, Samuel Lover, tells the story of the Irish navigator, Barney O'Rheadon, who was paid for piloting the ship into Cork which showed him the way home from Bengal; but this is not a more singular story than one which was originally published in a volume entitled "Four Months in the West Indies." The writer, in giving a description of the island of St. Vincent, mentions that a little sloop, so insignificant that its private signal was unknown to any even of the merchants there, sailed into harbour one morning, and immediately attracted the notice of a surrounding crowd. It was, in fact, a little fishing-smack always employed in cruising along the coast of Scotland, carrying herrings and other fish to Leith, Edinburgh, or Glasgow; its commander knew little of navigation beyond that which enabled him to keep his dead reckoning, and to take the sun with his quadrant at noonday. But he had been in the habit of seeing large vessels from the West Indies load and unload in the several ports of Scotland, he heard that sugar was a very profitable cargo, and he determined by way of speculation, on making a trip to St. Vincent and returning with a few hogsheads of that commodity. And this was the history of the appearance of the little smack in the port that morning; the hardy Scotchman freighted his vessel, made sail, crossed the Bay of Biscay, in a wild gale, got into the "trades" and scudded along before the wind at the rate of seven knots an hour, trusting to his dead reckoning all the way. He spoke no vessel during the whole voyage, and never once saw land until the morning of the thirty-fifth day, when he descried St. Vincent right a-head, and ran in under a light breeze along the windward coast. But such a vessel, and so manned, could hardly have performed the voyage thus described, had it not been aided by the current of the trade winds. And what then must be the advantage of such a wind, when instead of helping the owner of a little fishing-smack to perform such an enterprise, it helps forward the mighty fleets of great empires? Perhaps even the name of Columbus could not have been mentioned in this connection as having obtained such a sovereignty over the seas had he not been assisted by the "trades," which preserve so wondrous a calm that, far out at sea even, a candle burns without flickering. Well may those winds deserve the designation of the "trades," when we contemplate them in the mighty facilities which they afford to commerce. How remarkable that ceaseless breeze, which seems to hurry the vessel hopelessly along the mysterious sea, and which yet so far from being fraught with danger, is a very "wind of God" urging the vessel on in the way of safety.

And although the notice must be so slight of the great things effected by the winds, it is impossible not to mention the wonderful current of the Gulf Stream, the grandest and most beneficent, it has been called, of all purely geographical phenomena; the principal cause of the superiority of the climates of Western Europe over those of Eastern America and Eastern Asia. It seems curious to read that the contrast between Northern Europe and the Eastern coast of America caused Halley to imagine that the North Pole of the earth had shifted, that it was formerly situated somewhere near Behrings Straits, and that the intense cold observed in those regions is really the cold of the ancient pole which had not been entirely subdued since the axis changed its direction; "but now we know," says Dr. Tyndall, "that the Gulf Stream, and the diffusion of heat by winds and vapours, are the real causes of European mildness; on the western coast of America, between the Rocky Mountains and the ocean, we find a European climate."

Our artist has caught and presented the impressions of scenes which may be beheld nearer home, but the rush of wind throughout the forest, where the prostrate trees give the evidence of its tyrannic sway, will remind the reader of a story told by the great American ornithologist and traveller, Audubon, who relates a scene his eyes beheld, illustrating the almost unimaginable power of the wind. When travelling in one of the great American forests he heard the roar and rush of the wind, and seeing the trees bend and sway directly in his path, he sought shelter, and stood a silent witness of the effects of a hurricane confined to a narrow space, which yet was so powerful that the giants of the forest crashed and fell; so it continued for miles, and when it at length passed out of sight, the forest presented the appearance as of some mighty power, which having swept through, left destruction in its track. An instance like this reminds us of the grand words of the old Psalmist: "The voice of the Lord is powerful; the voice of the Lord is full of majesty. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars; yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. The voice of the Lord discovereth the forest." One might think that the Psalmist himself had seen some such spectacle.

The suggestion of this paper is, however, of the more bland and balmy influences which are around us now. The March winds do not always leave very gentle impressions, yet the proverb says, "March comes in like a lion and goes out like a lamb," which is only another way of reminding us that "March winds and April showers bring forth May flowers." As we have seen, the wind derives its energy and activity from the sun, so there is truth in the words—

"The Sunbeam to the South Wind said,
'There's work for us to do:
To plough the ground, to knead the bread,
They need both me and you!
I spread my light along the sky;
You blow the mists away
To let the fields and orchards lie
All open to the day.
For sower's seed and reaper's bread
Depend on me and you!'
So the Sunbeam to the South Wind said,
'There's work for us to do!'

'The misty season breaks at last;
The clouds hung low and long;
The trees were shiv'ring in the blast;
We heard no blithe bird's song;
But sprouting seeds and budding trees
Have felt our coming wing;
And garden flow'rs peep to the breeze;
I hear the blackbird sing!
But sower's seed and reaper's bread
Depend on me and you!'
So the Sunbeam to the South Wind said,
'There's work for us to do.'

'And when the milk is in the corn,
The apple in the tree;
And lab'rers wake on harvest morn,
They'll all bless you and me,
They'll look above with hearts of love
To God, the Lord of all!
And hail the prime of that sweet time
Of mischief's-master's fall;
But the sower's seed and reaper's bread
Depend on me and you!'
So the Sunbeam to the South Wind said,
'There's work for us to do!'"

THE ADVENTURES OF RUPERT LONG.

CHAPTER IX.—A PLEASANT RECOGNITION.

A NEW life now commenced for Rupert in the London residence of Lord Summerhaze. He could not but feel strange at first amidst his new surroundings, but the nobleman led a very quiet existence, and made the young man feel at home far sooner than he had expected. The mornings were generally spent in his lordship's library, and in the afternoon he was at liberty to wander about the great metropolis, in search of whatever information or amusement he might desire. The reader will not be surprised to hear that Rupert's first thoughts turned towards his old friends the Collettes, but unfortunately he was not in possession of their address. They had, indeed, written once or perhaps twice, soon after their arrival in London, to Rupert's mother; but this was now some years ago, and the letters had been lost, nor had the lad remembered to question his mother as to their exact whereabouts. To secure any tidings of this family was now therefore a matter of the utmost difficulty. Little had Rupert dreamed, in his French home, what a labyrinth the great capital of his native country would prove to be. Inquiries were indeed made, and, by his lordship's advice, the "Directory" consulted, but the name of Jean Collette, ivory-carver, did not appear in its pages.

Lord Summerhaze's health, which had for some years been failing, now became a matter of anxiety, and Rupert's attendance and companionship grew more and more necessary to the infirm nobleman. He was one of those characters in which an outward exterior of coldness covers over deep and noble feelings, and the respect which the young man so naturally felt for his patron soon ripened into affection.

Thus the days passed by profitably enough, and both in social, moral and intellectual respects, Rupert was making good progress towards a useful manhood.

A year had nearly elapsed since Rupert had first become an inmate of Lord Summerhaze's mansion in Berkeley Square, when, one Sunday afternoon, he sallied forth in search of some more quiet and unobtrusive place of worship than the fashionable churches which the denizens of that locality are wont to attend.

The young man's footsteps seemed to lead him in the direction of the city, and he carried under his arm that now well-worn Bible into the pages of which we have occasionally had a glance.

Rupert had not quite reached the city, when a number of people carrying, like himself, Bibles or Prayer-books, passing down a side street, seemed to invite him to follow them. The loud clanging of some fine-toned church-bells seemed also to add a welcome.

The church was not a particularly handsome one as regards architectural characteristics, but it was large and comfortable and cheerful, and the congregation, who were now almost filling the sacred edifice, seemed as if they took an interest in the place and in the service which was about to commence. An inscription at the entrance gave the acceptable information that every seat was free, and the young man took his place without that unpleasant feeling of strangeness and of not being welcome, which pew doors and pew openers have the misfortune to engender.

There was evident earnestness amongst the congregation, and the preacher seemed to be in sympathy with his hearers, speaking to them as from heart to heart. But what struck Rupert more especially, was the number of young men in the congregation, who were evidently listening to the preacher with intelligent interest.

As the organ struck up the concluding voluntary, and Rupert was making his way out of the church, a pleasant-looking gentleman looked kindly at him, glancing at the same time at the book in his hand.

"You are a stranger here, sir, I think," said the gentleman politely, as the two descended the church steps together. "How do you like our church and the service?"

Rupert was not slow to express the gratification which the earnestness of the congregation and the plain and simple sermon had afforded him.

"I think, sir," said the young man modestly, "that it is very pleasant for a stranger like me to feel that one is welcome, and it seems that other young men think so too, for there were a great many there."

"Yes," said the gentleman with a pleased look, "I entirely agree with you. We are proud of our church being free to all, and we think a good deal of our young men too. I scarcely like to intrude upon your time or plans," added the stranger courteously, "but I am just on my way to a friendly meeting of some of these young men. We admit visitors, and if you would like to be present, it will give us all much pleasure."

Rupert was so taken with the gentleman's kindly and courteous manner that, having consulted his watch, and having found that there were yet several hours before he would be required by Lord Summerhaze, he willingly accepted the stranger's invitation, and followed him up some stairs into a large room, where a goodly number of young men had already assembled. Signing to Rupert to take a seat beside him, the gentleman took his place at the end of a large table, and opened the meeting by giving out a hymn and then engaging in a short prayer. An animated discussion over an interesting passage of Scripture then followed, which, while it was marked by the greatest liberty and freedom from formality, was so skilfully guided by the president as to be altogether devoid of any want of reverence or order.

A spirit of sympathy and brotherhood seemed to lend a charm to the whole, and Rupert thought that he had never spent so pleasant an afternoon.

The proceedings, which had barely lasted an hour, were brought to a close by another brief prayer by the president, who concluded with an announcement, which seemed to afford no small satisfaction to his audience, that on the following Sunday a visit and short address by their regular minister were to be expected, who, the president informed Rupert, was about to return after a somewhat lengthy absence.

With a ready promise to be present on the following Sunday, if possible, the young man hurried back to his patron's residence. Lord Summerhaze seemed pleased with the account which Rupert gave of his afternoon's adventure, and even entered with some interest into a further discussion of the subject which had been under consideration.

The world seemed to have lost its charms for this sick nobleman, and it was with touching humility that he seemed from time to time to be feeling after truths which as yet he scarcely understood.

The next Sunday afternoon the invalid was not so well as usual, and Rupert was unable to attend the service which had so attracted him a week before, but Lord Summerhaze insisted on his being present at the meeting, both for his own sake, and also with a view to a further account from Rupert of the subject under consideration.

The young man thought the nobleman looked paler and weaker than usual as he left him lying on his library sofa, now and then gazing up silently at a portrait of his only daughter which hung above him.

The room was unusually full on this especial Sunday afternoon, and Mr. Raymond, the president, had already taken his seat when Rupert arrived. He met with several friendly looks of welcome, as he took his place on one of the few seats which were still vacant.

All was evident excitement and expectation. A beloved minister, who had been a long time away, from ill health, had returned and was about to look them in the face once more and speak words of encouragement and counsel.

As the clock struck the hour there was silence in the room, which seemed to deepen as familiar footsteps were heard ascending the stairs; in another moment the door opened and this minister stood amongst them again, with his old familiar look and voice—but what was Rupert's surprise, to recognise in them the same look and voice that had so cheered his mother's last hours on her dying bed at Dieppe! Rupert involuntarily started from his seat at the clergyman's first appearance, but the action was unnoticed by the rest, so absorbed were they in the feelings of the moment.

Waving to them his hand in greeting the pastor began to address them in words of quiet thankfulness, touching lightly on his past illness, telling them of the foreign land that he had visited, but assuring them that throughout all his long absence he had never forgotten them. He then spoke of those mysterious providences which all Christians must expect, and of those long and trying hindrances to their plans and labours which they must sometimes be called upon to meet with. "But," he added, "we shall have been taught but in vain, if we do not learn that all these apparent hindrances are really helping us. 'Our times are in His hand.' And even when separated from our work and usefulness, it may be," he continued, "that God may have blessed some little seed dropped by us on the wayside."

The clergyman looked towards the table for a Bible, to read to them some passages of Scripture specially bearing on this subject. Owing to the unusual crush, which occupied the attendant, the books had not as usual been laid upon the table, but Rupert had with him the old gift and he held it out to the clergyman.

The minister almost unconsciously took in his hands the volume that had been his own, and read the words of Isaiah, "Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters."

It may be that the old volume felt familiar to his touch, for his fingers felt unconsciously for the title-page. His eye falling upon the fly-leaf, he started back in surprise. "What!" he said, "my own handwriting," and then, as if trying to summon up some past reminiscences, he read slowly to himself, "'Rupert Long. The gift of a friend.' Surely," he continued, "this cannot be the same Bible that I——"

"Yes, sir," said Rupert quietly, "it is the same Bible that you gave me by my mother's bedside at Dieppe, and I thank you for what it has done for her and me."

CHAPTER X.—WHERE IS CHRISTINE?

Lord Summerhaze was still lying upon his sofa in the library when Rupert returned, but he roused himself up a little, when at his request the young man gave him some account of the meeting, and of the remarkable recognition which had taken place there. The story of the clergyman's visit to Rupert's mother had not been heard by his lordship, and he seemed to listen to it with an uncommon interest, as it was told to him by his young companion, this Sunday evening. The very words which the clergyman used had to be repeated to the nobleman, who seemed to experience no small pleasure in hearing them. "And this, my lord," said Rupert, "is the Bible which the clergyman gave me, and which I have kept ever since."

Lord Summerhaze silently took the Bible out of Rupert's hand, and gazed at it with interest, glancing at the inscription and reading over several times the invitation to the weary and heavy laden, which he saw marked in it. In a few minutes more he was being assisted by Spencer to undress, but after he had laid down to rest, he called for Rupert to his bedside, and said, "Do you think that clergyman would come and see me, if you asked him?"

"I am sure he would, my lord, with the greatest pleasure," answered Rupert; "and if your lordship likes, I will go and ask him to-morrow."

Accordingly, on the next day, in compliance with Rupert's request, Mr. Gray, the clergyman, visited Lord Summerhaze, which he continued to do until that nobleman's death, and was the means of shedding much light and comfort on his closing hours.

This solemn event caused no small change in the ordinary routine of Rupert's life, making a deep impression on the young man's mind, and not a few long rambles in the parks were taken by him, in company with Bruno, where he could ponder over past events and try to make some plans for the future.

When the deceased nobleman's affairs were wound up, and his will read, it was found that his young companion had not been forgotten, for a moderate, but sufficient, legacy had been left him, sufficient at least to relieve him of all over-anxiety as regarded his progress in life.

By Mr. Gray's advice the young man now became a systematic student, and for that purpose entered the University of London, with a view, if, after due preparation, he should be considered fitted for so important a calling, of finally entering the sacred ministry.

AN INQUIRY.

Thus a new era in Rupert's life had begun—a life which companionship with the learned Abbé Barelle, and afterwards with the scarcely less studious Lord Summerhaze, had rendered him peculiarly desirous of leading.

The days were beginning again to resume their aspect of ordinary routine, when an occurrence took place which seemed not unlikely to assume no small importance in his future history.

It so happened that on one sunny afternoon, Rupert was passing along that ever-thronging stream of traffic and of pleasure, Oxford Street. The fineness of the day had drawn forth an unusual crowd of pedestrians, many of whom were lounging at the more attractive shop windows, in eager admiration of the various goods so enticingly displayed.

Rupert had made his way down about half the length of this important thoroughfare, when some slight impediment in his course caused him to glance for a moment almost unconsciously at the window of a dealer of various curiosities and articles of vertu.

One or two idlers were admiring an unusually beautifully-carved ivory figure displayed in the window. It represented the fair and patient Penelope, weaving her interminable thread. Rupert's experienced eye at once caught at the exquisitely artistic treatment of the subject, which rendered the ornament of no small value. But it was not that which made the young man's face to flush so suddenly and his heart to beat so rapidly. It took but a second glance to assure Rupert that there was but one hand that could have carved that figure, and that was the hand of Jean Collette; and that there was but one face from which those delicate features had been depicted, and that was the face of Christine.

With breathless anxiety Rupert hurried into the interior and rapped on the counter to attract the attention of an old gentleman in spectacles and a velvet cap, who was deliberately dusting some very rare and precious china at the other end of the shop.

But inquiries about such artistic objects of luxury were not to be made with such undue precipitation. Customers at such emporiums are not generally in a hurry, and are wont to spend a long time and talk a great deal over their purchases. Thus it was that considerable time elapsed before the old man could be made to understand the purport of Rupert's inquiries. Vendors, moreover, of this description are wont to be somewhat suspicious.

"If you don't wish to purchase the article," said the old man querulously, "why are you so anxious to know where I got it from?"

Rupert explained, as well as he could, that he believed the figure was the work of an old friend of his, and that he was especially anxious to hear of his whereabouts.

"Well," said the old man, turning over the leaves of a very shabby and blotted account-book, "as far as that goes, I don't know who carved that figure; but," added he, "I know the gentleman retired from business at whose sale I bought it, and if you happen to be passing this way to-morrow, perhaps I may be able to tell you what you want to know."

The next day, Rupert, as soon as he was liberated from his morning's studies, hurried back to the shop to obtain if possible the information he required.

"It wasn't a man at all, as sold that figure to my friend," said the old gentleman, with the same uncommunicative manner as on the previous day; "it was a young lady. She seemed in want of money, and my friend bought it cheap; but that hasn't anything to do with the price I ask for it. It's worth the money any day."

Rupert once more assured the old gentleman that it was from no commercial motives that he made these inquiries, and added, with a beating heart:

"Do you think, sir, your friend could kindly give me any information about this young lady?"

"Well, I don't know," said the old man, putting on his spectacles in a very deliberate manner; "but here's a piece of paper that the young lady left with my friend when he bought the carving, in case he might want anything of the same kind again," and then he read, with some hesitation, an address which was written on it in a female hand: "Jean Collette, ivory-carver, No. 7, Lorraine Street, Soho."

"Sir, have the kindness to give me that paper," said Rupert, taking it eagerly from the old man's hands, and darting out into the street.

The next minute he was impetuously inquiring of a policeman, who looked at that moment as if he did not take any very particular interest in anything, which was the shortest way to No. 7, Lorraine Street, Soho.

The house was a large and gloomy one, evidently inhabited by a considerable number of families, who lived on étages, just as Rupert remembered to be the custom at Dieppe and other French towns.

In answer to his first inquiring knock on the ground-floor a somewhat irritable shoemaker, who had got off his bench to open the door, hastily replied that he knew nothing whatever about the party mentioned, but that there was a Frenchman upstairs who might know. For his part, he had had quite enough to do with these foreign chaps.

On the second floor Rupert met with a somewhat more courteous reception. A little man of the regulation French type, shaven whiskers, close-cropped hair, and fierce moustache, in his shirt-sleeves and a white apron, who at that moment was feeding a rather dirty baby out of an old jam-pot, politely replied that Monsieur Jean Collette had certainly lived there, but that "He is dead, it is twelve months;" and that "cette belle brunette, mademoiselle, his niece, is gone he knows not where."

All further inquiries were fruitless in eliciting any further information. The Collettes had kept much to themselves, and had made no friends, and it was with a heavy heart that Rupert found himself listlessly passing along the squalid streets of that semi-foreign region.

"Ah, poor Christine," said the young man to himself, "what a sad, sad history yours must have been."

A RECOGNITION.

The street which he was now traversing led him into Soho Square, through which he was about to make his way back into Oxford Street, with the despairing conviction that all further inquiries would be next to useless, when his eye accidentally lighted on an inscription over the entrance to the Soho Bazaar. That inscription informed the general public that there was to be found within a registry office for governesses.

As if by a sudden inspiration, the young man quickly arrested his footsteps, and hesitated for a moment and then passed through the glass doors of that far-famed emporium. The registry office was upon the upper floor, when Rupert, having hurried up the stairs, found a clerical-looking gentleman in a black coat and white tie, seated behind a screen, at a square table covered all over with papers and bundles of letters. "Could this gentleman kindly inform the inquirer, Mr. Rupert Long, whether a young lady of the name of Collette had sought for any situation during the last twelve months?"

The sober-looking gentleman stared at the young man's impetuosity, and seemed as little willing to give the information as the vendor of old curiosities. Rupert's earnestness and honest features, however, ultimately won the day, and to his extreme amazement and delight the sober gentleman, after carefully examining a long register of applicants for situations, did actually discover the name that the young man so longed to hear.

"'Collette, Christine,'" read the gentleman gravely. "'French Protestant—native place, Dieppe, France—received as a companion by Miss Ricketts, No. 18, Tabor Crescent, Kensington.'"

The young man's first impulse upon regaining the open street was to call for a cab and drive off impetuously to No. 18, Tabor Crescent, but he suddenly remembered that it was now growing late—Oxford Street was beginning to glitter with its thousand lights—and that it would never do for a stranger like himself to invade the mansion of the rich and probably stately Miss Ricketts, at such an hour.

The next afternoon, however, found Rupert sallying forth on his fresh voyage of discovery. Considering the possibility of so soon seeing Christine, it was quite out of the question but that Bruno should accompany him on his errand; indeed, that faithful companion seemed unconsciously to have imbibed an additional amount of exuberant joyousness. To have lost Bruno even in London would have been a matter of no small difficulty, considering his wonderful immunity in following his master even when horses' hoofs and carriage-wheels threatened to annihilate him at every moment. Once or twice, indeed, the two companions had missed one another, when Bruno, depending too much upon his own powers, had loitered too long in discursive conversations with butchers' dogs, but even then the master on his return would find his companion comfortably coiled up before the kitchen-fire, or, if the area gate happened to be closed, patiently seated upon the door-step and manifesting no unusual signs of excitement beyond a faint wagging of his tail.

Rupert's way to-day lay along that resort of wealth and fashion, Rotten Row, but the young man was far too much preoccupied with his own thoughts and anticipations to take much, if, indeed, any notice of the gay scenes around him. Presently this glittering spectacle was left behind, and Rupert began to find himself almost alone as he drew near the farther end of the park. How much longer he would have remained absorbed in his own thoughts, it is difficult to state, had not Bruno's remarkable conduct at this particular moment arrested his attention. Abruptly relinquishing the company of three other dogs, upon whom he seemed to have been making a scarcely favourable impression, the animal commenced a rapid trot forward, then a sudden pause, and then, what, in spite of all Rupert's frantic calls to desist, appeared to be a determined attack upon an extremely graceful-looking young lady, who was walking in front of them. To hurry up with the purpose of making an apology, or if necessary, to come to the young lady's assistance, was the work of a moment, but this was immediately followed by a similar pause to that which Bruno had just made, and then in another instant the exclamations, "Christine!" "Rupert!" had come from the lips of each.

It is indeed difficult for the faithful historian to give any exact account of the hurried words of recognition or of greeting which followed these, or to state how Bruno complicated the whole scene with his frantic behaviour, first bestowing his most boisterous caresses upon Christine, and then returning to heap the same upon his master, either in congratulation or through fear of his attentions to another being misunderstood.

The two companions of early days, after the first excitement of their meeting, had seated themselves on a pleasant bench which stood invitingly near them, this lovely autumn afternoon.

They had much to say to one another, for Christine's story had to be told—a story which spoke of much sorrow and privation, and of an uncle's death-bed in a foreign land, but also of many mercies and of a happy home under the roof of "the kindest and dearest old lady in the world," Christine assured Rupert.

Then Rupert had to tell his eventful history, or at least as much of it as he had time for, and then the two had to point out the wonderful changes in each other's appearances which they almost thought might have prevented a recognition if it had not been for Bruno (whose excitement, the reader is requested to remember, has scarcely in any degree abated, and who still frantically wags his tail in approbation of the whole affair). If the truth must be told, Christine thinks that Rupert has grown very handsome, but Rupert says that in all his wanderings he has never seen anything to equal the brown hair, brown eyes and graceful form of the little Dieppe maiden, and then he tells Christine—— But the two have been talking for an hour together, and Christine starts up with a flush upon her face, and looks at her watch and says that Miss Ricketts will be wondering what has become of her all this time, and that she must run home, but that Rupert must come and see them very, very soon, and bring Bruno with him.

As she trips away the first great problem of Bruno's life presents itself. Has the dog a mistress or a master? He first runs for a few yards after the young lady, and then runs back, in sudden remorse to pacify his master. Rupert finds for the first time that he has really some difficulty in getting his old companion to follow him, but he laughs to himself in a joyous way as he thinks how very inconvenient it would be for Bruno to have always to obey a divided authority.

MY BOYHOOD IN THE EAST.

CHAPTER III.—MY CANNIBAL FRIEND.

PULO PENANG.

I HAVE spoken of Penang as an emporium of trade. Its soil and that of the opposite province is so rich and varied that there is no tropical produce which cannot be raised in abundance. Among its productions may be specified rice, pepper, coffee, sugar, tapioca, cloves, nutmegs, cotton, twelve kinds of bamboo, twenty-two of ratan, one hundred and twenty-eight of trees for building and other useful purposes, besides barks and juices for tanning and colouring, while the fruits are so numerous and superb—that the island may well be called the finest orchard in the world. Besides this, being the first port reached from India proper, in sailing to the Archipelago and China, it is a centre at which traders of all the surrounding regions meet with their multifarious merchandise. Hence, Sir George Leith (quoted in Thornton's Gazetteer) remarks: "There is not probably in any part of the world so small a space in which so many different people are assembled together, or so great a variety of languages spoken." As soon, therefore, as the visitor lands he finds himself amid a motley assemblage and hears a very Babel of tongues. Brown Malays, yellow Chinamen, black Madrassees, dusky Klings (Tamilians), curly-headed negroes, swarthy Arabians, pale-faced Bugis (from Celebes) are about him, with here and there the Eurasian and the Circassian.

Born in the midst of them, speaking Malay better than English, and taught in the common free school, I was welcome everywhere and formed intimacies many and various. My nurse, a dear old woman who had been servant in the household of the eminent Dr. Milne of Malacca, worshipped her troublesome protégé, excused every fault, sheltered him from punishment, pleaded for every indulgence. Can I ever forget her climbing for a ball that had lodged on the top of an "almirah" (wardrobe), falling and bringing down upon her the entire fabric and lying senseless on the ground with a bleeding wound on her forehead, and my cries of woe and torrents of tears as I knelt down and passionately kissed her? And there was the Parsi convict, a fair man of broad forehead, with letters branded on it which I believe formed the word "murder," who had in a paroxysm of fury knocked down and killed his brother. He was the keeper of the "Mission Chapel"—washing its floor, trimming the lamps, weeding the walks around—faithful to every duty, but of few words and yet fewer smiles. He would speak to me of his home at Bombay, and repeat verses of prayer to the rising and setting sun, and tell me of the divinity there is in fire and flame. One night he came, sobbing to my mother's window, and entreated forgiveness for his faults, and she bade him ask forgiveness of God, pleased to find such deep concern in the impassive man. The next morning he was missing, and after much search, was found in an outhouse dead, with the chapel-keys in his breast, and a cup of poison at his side! But of all my friendships the dearest and longest was with a Báttak slave.

The Báttaks are an aboriginal race occupying the mountainous region of central Sumatra. While all the surrounding Malayan tribes have become Mohammedan, and thus come more or less within the frontiers of civilisation, they have retained their gloomy superstitions and savage customs. There is no doubt of their cannibalism. Madame Pfeiffer is, I believe, the only European visitor who came back from them. Again and again have Roman Catholic and Protestant missionaries been murdered and to have failed, how may this be accounted for? Or did he ask the question (ch. vii. 19), only for the sake of his disciples? Christ's testimony to John—its several points? To his personal character, his prophetic commission, his relation to the Old Covenant and the New? Show that John's disciples continued, to some extent, as a separate sect after the full revelation of the Gospel. Was this according to his own wish? How did 'John's baptism' differ from the baptism of the New Covenant? (Acts xix. 4.) What was the end of John's own life?

V. CHRIST'S EARLY WORK—TEACHING AND MIRACLES.—The Lessons of the quarter cover the whole of what we may term the First Period of Christ's public work. That work, for convenience, may be thus divided:*

1. The year of obscurity, of which we should know nothing but for John's gospel. Luke passes it over entirely; it is to be placed between vers. 13 and 14 of ch. iv.—'Jesus returned'—i. e., after His stay in Judæa. Such a ministry, it should be noted, is clearly indicated in ch. xiii. 34: 'O Jerusalem . . . . how often would I have gathered thy children together!' See also Matt. xxiii. 37—the same words in a different connection.

2. The year of public favour, which began with His return to Galilee, and during which the centre of His work was Capernaum. Throughout this period His words and works were incessant—crowds followed Him from place to place; He was popular and beloved. The Lessons which belong to this part of His ministry (Feb. 20, 27, Mar. 13, 20), bring into one view many of its chief features in regard both to TEACHING and MIRACLES. The key-note of the teaching is mercy and forgiveness. What passage from Old Testament prophecy does He take as His text; and how does He express the same thought afterwards to John's messengers? Show from these Lessons how He connects the forgiveness of sins with miracles of healing; how it is connected with faith, penitence, and love. What characteristics of His preaching seem most to have moved the admiration of His hearers? For what great purposes were His miracles wrought? (Show that they were both evidences and signs.) In the miracles considered in these Lessons, show the place and power of faith, as well as the various ways in which faith was displayed. How do His miracles illustrate His love? Give illustrations of His great tenderness, as shown in these particular miracles.

3. The year of opposition. This is reserved for the next quarter's series of Lessons, and belongs to the Second great division of His ministry—that which began from Cæsarea Philippi and was heralded by His Transfiguration. Some signs, however, of that opposition were already given from the first.

VI. EARLY SIGNS OF CHRIST'S REJECTION.—Refer here, first, to the refusal of His own fellow-townsmen to listen to Him, and their attempted assault upon His person. What were their motives? Then, secondly, how did the people of Capernaum 'reason' against His claims (ch. v. 21)? And thirdly, on what ground did Simon the Pharisee condemn Him? The three together well illustrate the hostile feelings, now beginning to be stirred, which afterwards took form and led the people to cast Him off.

1. His lowly origin. See also John i. 46; Mark vi. 1–6; His subsequent visit to Nazareth.

2. His Divine claims. He 'blasphemeth!' was the outcry of men who pretended to be jealous for God's honour. Compare John x. 30–33.

3. His fellowship with the poor, the outcast, and the sinful. See ch. xv. 2; Matt. ix. 11; xi. 19.

Such were the first mutterings of the storm that broke at last on Calvary!

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HOUSE.

CHAPTER II.

MRS. GRANTLEY paused for a few moments, then she began, speaking slowly: "I have thought of something to tell you. I hardly know whether I can call it a story. I think I heard or read it, or something very like it, some long time ago. I will tell it you as best I can.

"Once there was a very rich man, a lord they called him——"

"Oh, auntie, don't tell us about great people. I like to hear about boys and girls like ourselves."

The interruption came from Frank, the youngest boy.

"My story is not altogether about the rich man, Frank. It has more to do with some tenants of his: but you shall hear. This lord had a great deal of land belonging to him, and on one part of his estates he built some houses—model houses, he called them. He had them all planned and constructed with the utmost care, and when they were finished, he put a suitable tenant in each. Every house had been built with some special use and design; but the future care and keeping depended upon the tenants themselves. He let the houses for a term of years, and promised to return after a certain time, and to the tenant who had kept his house most carefully and orderly, and had made the best use of the trust confided to him, he promised a reward and a home far more beautiful and perfect, and in a part of the country where he himself resided. Some of the houses were very stately and very grand, almost like palaces to look upon; but each tenant was duly warned that the future beauty of the house depended upon himself alone. The houses at first sight were very similar, but not two of them were exactly alike: there was in each some diversity of appearance. It was a matter of great speculation who should win the prize; each one in his own mind was very hopeful—all but one. Standing apart from the rest—remote, solitary—was one house which seemed at first only a puzzle to beholders. It was one of the model houses, and its owner had made no exception for it when the prize was offered. But the poor tenant of that one house was in despair. The perfect symmetry shown in the others was quite wanting here. The house was not lofty like the rest, but low, and built in strange, irregular form. 'That poor house can never get a prize,' was the universal opinion. Yet the house had been built in with the others, and its builder had some special object in constructing and placing it there. But this was a secret the tenant alone might discover.

"At first the inmate of the poor, irregular-looking house gave himself up to brooding discontent and misery. Compared with the mansions around, what chance had he of anything better than pity at best? So he resigned himself to a state of morbid wretchedness, and ill weeds grew all around the walls and before the windows, and the poor, despised dwelling began to look wretched and miserable indeed.

"As for the other tenants, some of them after a little while quite forgot all about their master's commands and promised reward. As long as the houses were tight and strong, and convenient abodes, they cared but little for the appearance. And yet, though they were not aware of it, just according to their own dispositions and course of life, so the houses changed in exterior, till they seemed lively reflections of the inmates living within. One man was a thief and a smuggler, and he had several of his windows blocked up, lest people outside should detect his wickedness, and shutters were made that could be slipped up in a moment to hide his guilty treasures. The full light of heaven never shone in that house, and outside it looked very like a person who was always blinking and shutting his eyes for fear his neighbours should read his wretched secrets.

"Another tenant was a hypocrite, and the front of his house was clean in the extreme, but all round the sides, and at the back, wherever he thought people might not see, ill weeds grew; and inside, cobwebs hung from the walls. Another thought his lord had left his handiwork incomplete, and hung all sorts of paltry ornaments about the outer walls, but his house only looked the worse for his pains, and the vanity and folly of the man were apparent to all the passers-by.

"Meanwhile, the tenant who lived in the ill-built house, had changed his mind somewhat about his abode. One day, looking out disconsolately, he thought how low and dark the dwelling was. Just at that moment something tapped against the window-pane, and he saw a tall, ugly weed, whose broad leaves were blowing in the wind, and hiding the free light of heaven with its ungainly form.

"As the tenant noticed it, he thought, 'I might well not see out, with all that unsightly weed shading the light!' So he made a brave resolve, and setting to work at once, he cut the tall weed down, and more than that, he dug away at the roots till he had wholly destroyed it. But that was only the beginning of his endeavours. Round all the windows noxious plants had crept and twined, till in a little while the light of heaven would have been shut out entirely. But the tenant, though he had been at first so dejected, was naturally brave, and seeing how much light entered through the destruction of one weed, he set to work heartily to remove all ill-looking or unsightly things from around his house. But the work was worse than he had expected. 'Ill weeds grow apace,' and they had taken deep root and grown used to the soil, so as fast as he cleared them away one day, they appeared creeping up again the next, And then, as the light came in, it showed him so much more dust and signs of neglect, that the poor man saw nothing but thorough reform could avail. And he forgot that when he had done his best, his home was but a poor defective building after all, for he grew so happy in his work that he lost sight of the disadvantages under which he laboured, and instead of dwelling upon his miseries, he began to find many new and unexpected blessings and mercies connected with his lot, and discovered charms which formerly he had never suspected. If his house had a solitary position, it had a very beautiful one.

"At one end towards the east, was a spacious window, which commanded a wide view for miles over a lovely valley, where between green fields and pleasant meadows flowed a winding, sparkling river, and just beyond it all stretched the gleaming sea, where white sails glimmered and shone against the far horizon. And of a morning when the sun rose, the view was grandly magnificent—to see the clouds grow a rosy colour with the coming glory, and the waters beneath flashing back their brightness till they gleamed and shone like a glowing sea of fire, and as the sun mounted higher, to watch the green pastures and fragrant hedgerows all sparkling beneath his rays—oh, it was worth living in such a poorly-built house, to have an outlook so glorious and grand!

"And at the other end of the house, was a window towards the west, of corresponding size, and from thence he could see the sun set behind a range of distant hills, whose summits used to flush with rosy light, as his setting beams rested on them. The tenant in his own mind named the rooms—the eastern one he called Hope, for after the darkest night that room was sure to catch some of the morning's early radiance; and the western room he called Peace, for the scene from that window was full of tranquillity and rest.

"All along to the south also, the house had its front; and at the back, where there was not so much light and warmth, there was at a little distance a forest of tall trees, which sheltered it from bleak winds. So, although the house seemed somewhat removed from other habitations, yet it was peculiarly placed, and carefully sheltered. And by degrees it became so attractive, so unconsciously the gracious spirit of its inmate beautified it altogether, that people, when they passed it, so far from being repelled by its appearance, were charmed and attracted by it.

"Little children, especially, loved the spot, and liked to linger in its gardens bright with lovely flowers, for in the place of the rank weeds, rare and beautiful plants had been carefully cultivated. The tenant himself had long ceased to sigh after the grand houses that had once been so much his envy; in fulfilling faithfully the duties appointed him, he found happiness and content.

"One evening two travellers were passing by, and he heard them talking, and one said to the other:

"'Of all those model houses, this poor, strangely-built house is to me the most attractive.'

"'Yes,' said the other; 'the lord of the houses has heard of its progress, and the news of it pleased him, and made him glad exceedingly.'

"As the tenant heard these words, his heart throbbed with sudden, intense delight. That his lord and master knew and approved of him, and was exceedingly glad, these thoughts filled him with unspeakable joy. But greater bliss was in store for him. Soon afterwards the lord of those houses returned, to pass judgment, and give his promised rewards. There was no escaping his unerring scrutiny. The man who was a thief and had darkened his windows, saw his shutters suddenly torn down, his house laid open to the light, and all his sin and wickedness exposed to everyone. The hypocrite too found his deceit could no longer avail. He had got the front of his house so scrupulously clean that he hoped the outside view would suffice, and that his judge would give a cursory glance and pass him by. But no smart frontages could deceive his lord. He saw at a glance the true case, and he caused all the weeds and rubbish, that had been fostered where people were not likely to see them, to be brought to the front, and the windows and doors were thrown open, and the neglected rooms, full of foul insects, and dust, and dirt, were fully exposed to view, to the utter surprise of many, who had thought that because the front of the house was so fair to look upon, the man himself must be a good and orderly tenant. And the man who had ornamented his house with useless tinsel and trivial array, saw all his senseless adornments taken away, and everywhere the walls looked decayed and shabby where the foolish ornaments had been placed.

"So each tenant was judged fairly, and wherever any one was found to have done his duty, he was well and suitably rewarded. But the prize of all was given to the occupant of the low, oddly-built house, for when the lord of the houses came there, and saw all open for inspection, and how his tenant had improved and beautified, he smiled so sweetly, and uttered such a gracious, 'Well done,' that the poor man fell at his feet for joy and gratitude, and all the lord's retinue softly echoed their master's praise. And the lord took that tenant with him to his own country, where he promised to give him a perfect house, a glorious palace, such as he could never have dreamed of or imagined."

Mrs. Grantley paused, her story was at an end. The children commenced their criticism. "Was that hardly a story, auntie?" said John, who was grave and thoughtful beyond his years.

"I think," said Dora, "it was one of mother's stories which has a double meaning; she tells us such sometimes."

At that moment, Frank began pulling at Dora's sleeve, and pointing through the window. Dora leaned towards him, and he whispered in her ear.

"Mother," she said, "Frank says it has quite left off raining: may we get our hats and go and meet uncle coming from church?"

Mrs. Grantley gave her consent. The children made a speedy exit, and she and Millicent were left together alone.

When the children were gone, Millicent turned towards Mrs. Grantley, a thoughtful expression on her face, her dark eyes soft with tears, "Aunt Grantley, am I the little oddly-built house?"

"You are not the house, dear Millicent. That is only a temporary abode where you must for a time dwell, but I see you have caught my meaning, and I will be quite frank with you. Just at the close of the Bible lesson this afternoon, coming to the room for a book, I opened the door just in time to hear your passionate desire for beauty."

Mrs. Grantley's tone was very kind and gentle, but Millicent's face flushed painfully, as she said, "And you thought what a despicable wish it was, auntie."

"No, Millicent, I thought it by no means despicable. Instead, I sympathised with, and appreciated your desire. Beauty is one of God's own special gifts, a gift entrusted to those to whom it is given, and where not bestowed, it is withheld from some wise and tender design. But when I heard you speak so, Millicent, I could not help thinking of that beauty of soul, which all may possess, and which, be the exterior what it may, must grace and beautify the dwelling where it exists."

Millicent for a time sat silently thinking, then she said gently,

"Aunt Grantley, one part of your story seems wrong. I can realise my sheltered position in having those around me who love me dearly, and care for me and shield me, but I do not understand the wonderful prospects. Instead, oh auntie, I feel so shut upon every side, I only live in a dark little house, that has none of those glorious outlooks."

"The weeds of discontented unbelief will darken the brightest prospects, dear."

Millicent's lips slightly quivered.

"Oh, auntie, I have tried to kill those weeds again and again, but I am just like the poor man, I cut them down one day, and they are all grown up again the next."

"Yes, Millicent, such work as yours can be done only by much prayer and constant watching."

"Aunt Grantley, do you think I can ever succeed?"

"You must do battle bravely, dear Millicent, and when you feel most your own weakness, look to your Lord and Master for strength. Trust to Him to give you the victory, and He will not let you fail. It is His grace that works the change."

"But it seems such a poor work, just to have to conquer one's own evil thoughts and repinings. If I had really to contend against outside foes, it would seem much easier, a victory worth gaining, and something really grand and great!"

"We cannot always form true estimates of greatness. The world may think much more of a hero who wins some terrible battle than of a quiet life spent in very humble service; but God will judge rightly, and the work He gives us is the best work for us, and the only work He will require at our hands."

"After all, auntie, my work is very limited. It seems all just for my own self; there is nothing I can possibly do for others."

"Are you sure you can do nothing, Millicent?"

Millicent glanced up reproachfully.

"Tell me something I can do, Aunt Grantley."

"I will tell you something I noticed this afternoon. Standing in the doorway, I saw tears fill a younger brother's eyes at sight of his sister's distress."

Millicent's face softened.

"Do you mean Harry, Aunt Grantley?"

"Yes; and I fancy a heart that can so quickly sympathise must be very open to your influence. Opportunities for good come to those who watch for them. A kind word, a ready smile, interest in pursuits you may not be able to share, all these are little ways in which you may help and assist those around you. Everything depends on the spirit we manifest—we must walk in the light ourselves if we would give light to others. Active work God will not ask of you; but there are so many ways in which you can bear testimony for Him that I am sure your life need not be either a helpless or useless one."

"I should be doing something of my work by bearing my pain patiently."

"It may be only patience at first, dear Millicent, but a life of close walking and communion with God leads to something better than mere patience. There came a time when the man in the poorly-built house would not have exchanged his lot with any of the tenants of the other houses."

"Not when he had found out the glorious prospects all around him? But, Aunt Grantley, I don't see how I can ever have those beautiful views and outlooks."

"I think you will, Millicent. Often God places a life apart from the outer world, that He may more plainly manifest his glory and the full sunshine of his love. Morning, noon, and night He will brighten and gladden us, and the more we keep the windows of our souls free from all that can obscure or darken, more and more shall we see how beautiful the revelations God will open up before us. Looking into our own dark houses brings only misery and gloom, but when we look out towards God, away from ourselves, then we revel in the manifestations of his goodness all around. How sweet the comforting thoughts God gives to humble souls who thus look out of themselves to Him, they alone can tell."

"Aunt Grantley, I am very dark at present. I have never really tried to let in the light. I will tell you just the truth. I felt myself so burdensome and helpless, there seemed no use in my life at all. But now I see God never makes a life, however humble or obscure, without some particular aim and design. He has given even to me my special place and work."

"And He will give you special help and comfort."

At that moment there were steps approaching the house. Mr. Norman and the young people were returning.

But Millicent had one thought more.

"Aunt Grantley, it was not a poor house in the Lord's own country, it was a glorious palace there. Oh, I too may have a palace one day."

Mrs. Grantley smiled tenderly at the brightened face as she answered: "Yes, dear Millicent, 'A building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'"

BIBLE CLOCK.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

THE ADVENTURES OF RUPERT LONG.

BY THE REV. H. J. BROWNE, B.A.

BY THE ROADSIDE.

CHAPTER XI.—THE HOSPITAL PATIENT.

RUPERT'S story certainly did not lose anything when it was told to Miss Ricketts by the sweet voice and with the charming vivacity of the French girl. If it must be confessed, there was a spice of romance somewhere, hidden down deep in the old lady's nature, but in a formidable matter like this, in which an interesting young hero was concerned, it behoved Miss Ricketts to be very unsympathetic and unbending, or at least to appear so, to the young lady under her charge; so to the harmlessness of a dove it was necessary to add, or, at any rate, to think she added, the wisdom of the serpent.

Christine, however, like many other narrators, had kept the strong point of her story until the end. Observing the frigid expression on the face of the old lady, she added, "And who do you think, dear

PRICE ONE PENNY

Miss Ricketts, was the good pastor who visited Rupert's mother on her death-bed?"

The old lady was, of course, unable to hazard a supposition.

"Do try and guess," said Christine, with just a slight twinkle in her laughing eyes: "the good clergyman was none other than your prince of all pastors, Mr. Gray."

This piece of information certainly did produce a remarkable impression upon Miss Ricketts. In that unselfish life of active benevolence which she was leading, she had been naturally brought in contact with many of the excellent of the earth, amongst whom the earnest minister Mr. Gray held in her estimation a very high position.

Thus it was that on his very first visit to No. 18, Tabor Crescent, Rupert met with a far more cordial reception from the old lady than her ideas of prudence had at first prompted. Indeed, there now arose the opposite danger of our hero being spoiled by his hostess, and when on a fitting occasion, some little time after, Christine confided to her friend a certain promise which she had somehow or other been prevailed upon to make to the young gentleman, Miss Ricketts manifested no intention whatever of endeavouring to induce her to break that promise.

The scene of our story now changes to the picturesque and busy seaport town of Eastport on the northern coast of England. It was here that Rupert had decided, perhaps with some lingering affection for that great element by the borders of which he had spent the earliest scenes of his life, to commence his ministry.

It was a lovely Sabbath morning upon which the young minister climbed for the first time the somewhat rugged path leading to the old church, which stood on a frowning cliff above the town. There had been some stormy weather, and several wrecks had been cast up upon the rock-bound shore during the past week, but on this beautiful morning, which followed the boisterous winds of the preceding days, many of the townspeople, and not a few weather-beaten mariners and their wives, found their way up to the old church above the town, to hear, as they said, "the new parson."

Rupert, who had chosen a different text for his opening sermon, had been induced to alter his purpose during the stormy weather of the past week, and he spoke to his congregation this morning from those striking words, taken from the Apocalypse, in which the prisoner of Patmos states that in his vision of the new creation "there was no more sea."

The preacher pictured to his hearers the Apostle of Love in his rock-bound prison, sometimes ascending some overhanging promontory and gazing across the surging billows towards his old home in Galilee, summoning up, as he did so, all the old memories of his early days, spent with the dear companions of his Lord. The exile saw that in the new creation there would be no more separation, no more storms, no more change, and this, perhaps, was something of what was meant when it was said that there would be no more sea. Rupert felt that his auditors were listening to him, when he reminded many of them of the experiences of their own storm-tossed lives, and directed them to that haven of rest which the Saviour had prepared for them.

Not many days had elapsed before Miss Ricketts, accompanied by Christine, had found her way to Eastport, and had taken up her residence for some little time in that place. The dear old lady was anxious to see for herself how Rupert was prospering, and also to invade his lodgings, in order to ascertain whether the young clergyman, who, she felt quite certain, would be constantly going without meals and all other similar comforts, was being properly taken care of.

Rupert was out visiting when Miss Ricketts arrived, accompanied by Christine, on her visit of investigation. The old lady, however, was gratified to find that the quarters were, at any rate, neat and clean. She was received with many a curtsey by Rupert's landlady, who seemed anxious that Miss Ricketts and the young lady should be as soon as possible acquainted with her own personal history, the numerous occurrences of which had eventuated in her being left "a poor lone woman."

"But he's a dear good young gentleman," added the disconsolate widow, in some fear lest the visitors should think she did not take a lively interest in him. "My husband's brother, who's been on the sea these forty years, says he never heard such a sermon in his life, and he says his mates all think the same, and surely, ma'am, they ought to know. But, dear me, my lady," she added with a slight return to her own personal interests, "it's well the dear young gentleman was speaking of the better country when he told them that there would be no more sea; for how would a poor lone woman like me, miss," she continued, turning to Christine, "be ever able to let her lodgings in this world, if there was no more sea?"

Rupert found the two ladies awaiting him on his return, and a happy hour followed, in which mutual congratulations were exchanged, and in which bright plans of usefulness were made for the future. Christine, who had hitherto said but little on the subject, now seemed full of earnest preparations for their united labours, for were they not to be of one heart and mind, in all the objects of their future life?

The three had been chatting on in this pleasant manner for some time, when Rupert's landlady appeared once more at the door, to say that a messenger had come from the neighbouring hospital to desire the presence of Mr. Long at the dying bed of one of the patients. He was about to bid a hurried farewell to Miss Ricketts and Christine, when the latter rose and putting her arm in that of the young man's, said, "Rupert, I have often visited the London hospitals with Miss Ricketts, but, to-day, let me pay my first visit to a sick-bed by your side."

The nurse was waiting for the minister at the door of the sick ward when Rupert and Christine arrived. The dying man, she said, had met with a terrible accident in some travelling show which had visited the town a couple of weeks before. She had often read the Bible to him at his request, and had sometimes heard him engage in prayer. She thought he seemed penitent and prepared to die, although she feared he had not been a "good-living" man. The doctor had said he might go at any moment, and so she had taken the responsibility of sending for the minister.

"The old mistake," said Rupert to Christine, "of thinking of the clergyman as a person to be sent for when anybody else would be of no use. Somebody to 'read to' the dying patient when in anything but a condition of being read to at all."

The bed, according to the custom of hospitals, had the solemn sign of being screened off from the rest. Men may suffer together, but they must die alone. The largest army must pass at single file through the valley of the shadow of death. This hospital bed would soon be vacant.

Rupert and Christine walked softly across the polished floor, and a few heads were raised from their pillows with a languid curiosity to see the strangers pass behind the well-known screen.

The light was shining upon the patient's face, and showed at once to the minister that his work must be short and his words few. Yet a more vivid impression even than this was that which followed, when, in another instant, as the visitor stooped down to speak to the dying man he recognised in that livid countenance the well-remembered features of Signor Viralla.

Checking his natural excitement, Rupert took in his own the trembling hand and prepared to offer words of consolation. How is it that at such moments we grasp one another's hands? Words are not enough? Is it man bidding farewell to brother man? Or is it that sympathy which the common lot at last met with seems to draw forth from each?

The young man's trembling voice aroused the patient, and he tried to raise himself for a moment now to take on his part a gaze into his interlocutor's face. But with a thrill of excitement his head dropped back upon his pillow. The patient had recognised his visitor. "Rupert Long," gasped the dying man. "I knew who you were when you joined that circus at Dieppe. It was Mary's picture that you had with you, and I knew you were Mary's son. I had been away a long time, but it all came back to me in a moment. Mary was my wife, and you are my son!"

Rupert felt the hand of Christine tremble as he held it fast in his, while with the other he still grasped that of his dying father.

"Oh Rupert," continued the patient, "how I wished as I looked once more upon Mary's face that I had lived a different life. I was bad and wicked, and I knew it must have broken Mary's heart, but I was not as bad, Rupert, as they made me out. I never was a murderer. It was Pompon, the gendarme, who shot the coastguard. It was not I who did it. I fled away because I knew I was suspected, and that he might turn traitor, and so I left Mary and her babe. I left them, because I saw nothing but ruin. I thought I would hide myself for ever. But God is just. Misery made me daring. I tempted Providence. You know how I used to ride. I have ridden my last round. Is it nothing but a gulf that I see before me? Ah, there is no leaping such a gulf as that! Mercy and hope—Mary used to speak of such things—but no, mercy and hope are not for those who have ridden their last ride. Yet, Rupert, there was a dying thief I remember. What was it—didn't Jesus say he was to be with Him? How was that, Rupert?"

"Father," answered Rupert, with a great effort suppressing his violent emotion, "it was so; Jesus did forgive the dying thief, and He can and will forgive you. The reason was, that He had paid the dying thief's debt—his debt of sin; He has paid your debt, father, to the uttermost farthing. You can rest upon Him now your trembling sin-stained soul. Listen, father," said the young man, as he drew forth the old familiar Bible and turned to the old familiar place—"listen, father, to what gave my mother peace on her dying bed. 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'"

"Rest, rest," murmured the dying man, "'I will give you rest.'" Was it a fancy, or was it a reality, that gleam which seemed for a moment to illumine that livid face—only for a moment, for in the next that face was fixed and cold in death? Was it fancy or reality—why not the latter? "The entrance of Thy word giveth life." Peace and victory, what gifts for a dying rebel to receive! And yet these are the gifts which the Conqueror of Death can give even by a dying bed! That smile of hope, never, never could it be forgotten by Rupert and Christine in their future journey of life.

CHAPTER XII.—CONCLUSION.

How beautiful the parks and gardens looked as the laburnums began again to drip with their showers of gold! Rupert and Christine thought there never had been such a spring. It was in London that they were married, and of course at Mr. Gray's church. Whose hands but those of that good and faithful minister could be employed to join together this man and this woman in holy wedlock?

The ceremony was of the most private and unostentatious description. An old bachelor brother of Miss Ricketts, of a somewhat misanthropic reputation, surprised everybody by immediately consenting, when requested to do so, to give away the bride. A white waistcoat of the most festive description and a wedding favour of the largest dimensions, manifested further sympathy and interest on his part. The only other witness to the marriage was Christine's dear old friend, Miss Ricketts.

A tender leave-taking took place between the bride and that old lady a little later on in the day, when Mr. and Mrs. Rupert Long started from No. 18, Tabor Crescent, for their wedding-tour—a leave-taking in which tears, however, were quite out of place, considering that Miss Ricketts had signified her intention of purchasing a house at Eastport and of spending the greater part of every year in that place.

The bride and bridegroom crossed over that afternoon, viâ Newhaven to Dieppe, where they spent a few calm and happy days, revisiting familiar scenes.

Before they continued their journey, they purchased two exquisite wreaths of immortelles, one of which they left on a certain grave in the cemetery above the town, and the other on a little cross by the roadside, a few miles distant from the place.

This journey, however, did not end here. The city of Lyons was their ultimate destination, where they spent several weeks under the hospitable roof of the Abbé Burelle, who, the reader will be interested to hear, had ceased to be curé of Martin Eglise.

Indeed he had ceased to be a member of the Roman Communion at all, and had been called to take the pastorate of an interesting body of "Old Catholics," with whom an open Bible and primitive purity of faith were the desired objects.

In the company of that learned, genial, and now prominent reformer, Rupert and Christine spent many happy days, and gathered up not a few important and encouraging lessons, for future work in England.

Many were the deeply-interesting conversations which took place between Rupert and the Abbé concerning the present and future prospects of the universal church of Christ. There was much that they could learn from one another, but there was, perhaps, no occupation which the Abbé loved so much as the study of that English Bible, which had been such a comfort to Rupert's mother, and which, the Abbé had long ago told Rupert, was doubly precious to him on that account.

"Ah," the Abbé would often say, as he would turn once more to the passage in which the Saviour invites sinners to his meek and lowly heart, "it was from that passage in this English Bible that I got my first idea of a real pilgrimage,—those, and those only, who find the 'Rest,' here offered them, are the true pilgrims of the Sacred Heart."

NEW LAMPS FOR OLD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE HARVEST OF A QUIET EYE," ETC.

"THY word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." Was it when, in my reading, I came to this verse of the hundred and nineteenth psalm that I fell into a reverie? Surely it must have been so with me; and the words that I had just read gave the clue to my waking dream, if waking dream it was. Reading about a lamp must have set me off, to dream, however, of lamps in quite a different connection. Or was mine, indeed, a nap—that state and condition of mind when

> "Shape chases shape as swift as when to land
> Bluster the winds and tides the self-same way,
> Crisp foam-flakes scud along the level sand,
> Torn from the fringe of spray"?

And then, I know not how,

> "All those sharp fancies, by down-lapsing thought
> Streamed onward, lost their edges, and did creep
> Roll'd on each other, rounded, smooth'd, and brought > Into the gulfs of sleep."

However this be, I was no longer a somewhat bald-headed man, the father of a family, and the rector of a parish, no, nor even a young man full of hopes and energies, and bathed in "the light that never was on sea or land." I was a boy again, sitting in a corner of the rough oblong of grass that was lawn, drying-ground, play-ground, what not, to the little black cottage in which we lived. Not even the goddess of mischief could entice me from my absorbed study in the sunny corner of the ragged plot of grass. For, you see, I had just obtained the loan for a week of a book of boys' stories. I was revelling in the delightful possibility of mischief and fun which an invisible cloak would confer on its possessor. I greatly desiderated the carpet which could transport its owner from Margate to Bagdad, or where not in the world; what a treasure if one ever did want to play truant! The purse of Fortunatus, it made one's mouth water—always two pieces of gold to be found in it, and I never remembered to have had so much as one! (I am not saying that this class of reading is wholesome for the young, honestly I think it is not. I am only saying that it is undeniably fascinating.) What marbles I would get, what tinsel, what carpenters' tools! Ah, these are the boy's catalogue of wants; how little he can enter into the res angustæ domi which do make one sometimes, in this world, find it hard to restrain the longing for a dip now and then into some Fortunatus' purse!

But especially was the favourite story my favourite, of Aladdin's wonderful lamp. The garden where the gooseberries were emeralds, and the strawberries rubies, and the cherries coral, and the mistletoe-berries pearls, and the plums amethyst, and the egg-plums diamonds, and the grapes sapphires; and you might fill your pocket as much as you liked. Then the disgust of being shut up among them, seeing that they were not more nutritious or digestible than King Midas' dinner. Then the slaves of the ring, and deliverance. Then the seedy-looking old lamp; what a good thing he did not throw it away, as he might have done since he had his pockets full of jewels! And when his mother began to brighten it up a bit with rag and rotten-stone, that it might fetch a trifle at some Bagdad pawn-shop, presto! the Genius of the Lamp! Then the series of wonders; the beautiful Princess, and the camel-loads of precious stones; but, above all, Aladdin's palace, rising, in one night, "like an exhalation" made of alternate bricks of gold and silver!

But how deeply disgusted I was, every time I read the story (we used to read stories over and over in those days), with the success of the magician's cunning trick. Could I not see him coming down the street in front of the palace, with his basket of brand-new and shining lamps, crying out incredibly, "New lamps for old!" The vexatious folly of the Princess in going to the hall, and taking the worn-looking old lamp from under the dome, and without waiting to ask her husband or anything, actually giving the priceless treasure to his worst foe, and receiving instead a gilt-gingerbread thing of no use in a place where there were plenty of mere lamps! Then the loss and misery that followed; afterwards, however, at much risk and after almost despair, the recovery of the precious talisman, the restoration of the palace, and the death of the magician.

Now, when all these old remembrances had floated through my dreamy brain, something within me, whether it were only my old habit of moralising on things, and finding sermons in stones, I say not, but certainly something in my mind, seemed to whisper, "Seest thou not in this old story an allegory of the present day? 'New lamps for old!' Is not this the cry? and men are everywhere, and in all things, wiser than their fathers. Old faith and old practice, and old customs, and old morality, and old reverence; the present age is never weary of crying, 'The new is better.'"

"New lamps for old." The exchange has, however, in some cases proved a signal failure. It was so in Rehoboam's experience. Nay, to go farther back, it was so in Adam's. That antiquated old lamp that burned only with the white light of innocence and "simplicity concerning evil," was this well exchanged for that brand-new Duplex light, which glared forth "the knowledge of good, and evil"? An experience of ruin, in good truth, but one how often since shared by his descendants! Youth, 'tis said, must buy, will not borrow, experience. Yet how many a one, looking back on the spring verdure of the soul, ill exchanged for premature blight and dust and drought, may ask himself sorrowfully whether he also has not shared in Adam's folly, and exchanged to his much damage Old Lamps for New? The Prodigal son felt this, when he had bartered away health, and youth, and joy, and hope, and energy, and high spirits, and a pure heart, his father's portion, for famine, and swine's husks, and lassitude, and remorse, and bitter disappointment, and the utter palling of delights upon the seared palate, and the secret whispers of gloomy despair. "The old is better," he reflected, and set out to see what yet might be saved from the wreck. And the Pilot whom he met claimed no salvage except his love.

Old lamps for New. I have not come yet quite to the kernel of my dreamings on this subject. But while I try to set my meditations in order, let me quote Mary Howitt's charming verses, enjoyed by me thirty years ago, or more. "Old lamps for New," in the matter of friendship, did not turn out, in this case, a good bargain.

"The Old Friend and the New.

"My old friend, he was a good old friend,
And I thought, like a fool, his face to mend;
I got another; but, ah, to my cost,
I found him unlike the one I had lost!
I and my friend, we were bred together.
He had a smile like the summer weather;
A kind warm heart, and a hand as free:
My friend, he was all the world to me!

I could sit with him and crack many a joke,
And talk of old times and the village folk;
He had been with us at the Christmas-time,
He knew every tree we used to climb,
And where we played, and what befel,
My dear old friend remembered well.
It did me good but to see his face;
And I've put another friend in his place!
I wonder how such a thing could be,
For my old friend would not have slighted me.

Oh, my fine new friend, he is smooth and bland,
With a jewelled ring or two on his hand;
He visits my lord and my lady fair;
He hums the last new opera air;
He takes not the children on his knee.
My faithful hound reproacheth me,
For he snarls when my new friend draweth near,
But my good old friend to the brute was dear:
I wonder how I such thing could do,
As change the old friend for the new!

* * * *

My good old friend, 'he tirled at the pin,'
He opened the door and entered in;
We all were glad to see his face,
As he took at the fire his 'customed place,
And the little children, loud in glee,
They welcomed him as they welcome me.
He knew our griefs, our joys he shared;
There cannot be friend with him compared;
We had tried him long, had found him true,
Why changed I the old friend for the new?

My new friend cometh in lordly state;
He peals a startling ring at the gate;
There's hurry and pomp, there's pride and din,
And my new friend bravely entereth in.
I bring out the noblest wines for cheer,
I make him a feast that costeth dear;
But he knows not what in my heart lies deep;
He may laugh with me, but never shall weep,
For there is no bond between us twain.
And I sigh for my dear old friend again;
And thus, too late, I bitterly rue
That I changed the old friend for the new."

For, you see, he might rub the new lamp ever so much, but no powerful Genius would come at his call.

But now the application that seemed, in my reverie, the most apt, related, as I daresay you have guessed, to certain theories of the present day. "New lamps for old," that cry seemed to me a favourite one with some who set up to be magicians of the mind; and who grudge us our Palace of all delights, its pavement of gold and gates of pearl, a fairer palace than that of Aladdin. And, indeed, I thought of my dear old Bible as that old Lamp with the magic power in it that always came when sought; and of the various new schemes as the new lamps, powerless and comfortless, which schemers of the day eagerly press upon us for a most inadequate exchange. A perpetual cuckoo cry of "Truth! Truth!" (as if these men had obtained a monopoly of the desire for it and the love of it), and a dressing of the demon, Unbelief, in Truth's angel garb. Yea, an endeavour ever going on, to dethrone, with some shadow or puppet of their own mind, the Truth Himself—these cries beset my ear, nowadays, and there seems in the streets a very din of "New lamps for old!"

But I keep my old lamp tight, for all the din, and seek, when I want aid, the Spirit of the Lamp.

"If Christ be not raised"—that was St. Paul's terrible "If." He overwhelms it, however, a text or two farther on, with the pæan: "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept."

But Strauss and many a man of his school have quite decided to relegate the old, old story into the lumber-room of myths. They have new lamps for which they would have us resign our old dingy lamp which has brought power and wealth to

"The souls of now two thousand years."

We keep the old lamp, however; the more so when we see, in others, the result of the disastrous exchange, "New lamps for old!"

The despairing threnodies of poets who have bartered the old lamp away serve as warnings to us. Sings one,

> "Alone, self-poised, henceforward man > Must labour."

He must go his way, his hopeless dreary way, of uncheered labour, toiling after his palace that has passed away as a dream, but lighting upon it never. Human unassisted reason for Divine revelation; this is the New Lamp he is invited to take for the Old. And here are set out by a modern poet some of the cheering consequences of it:

> "Eat, drink, and die, for we are souls bereaved:
> Of all the creatures under heaven's wide cope
> We are most hopeless, who had once most hope,
> And most beliefless, that had most believed.
> Ashes to ashes, dust to dust;
> As of the unjust, also of the just—
> Yea, of that Just One too!
> It is the one sad 'gospel' that is true—
> Christ is not risen!"

I shiver, and hug my dear old lamp to me. For their lamps are not as our lamp, even our advisers themselves being judges.

Take, again, the comfortable doctrine of the Atonement, the redeeming us, not with corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ. Men proffer to us, coaxingly, an example instead of an atonement. But how shall sinful man attain to this ideal? Corrupt churches swell the din of the would-be traffic. "New Lamps for Old!" is still the cry. And visions of man's own heart, well gilt with tempting ormolu of tradition, are now the lure for setting at naught the commandments of God, and parting with the Old Lamp of His word.

But they who have tried it in their need, and never found it wanting, they who know by happy experiment, "what Spirit in it dwells;"—these can turn a deaf ear to these charmers, charm they never so wisely, finding, in such cases, deafness to be a "wisdom of the serpent" well for them to imitate.

So they keep their old lamp, and its old magic, and its power, and its comfort. "The old friend is a good old friend; they seek not, like a fool, its face to mend. Having the old wine, they do not straightway desire new, because they say, 'The old is better.'"

Oh yes, it builds up for us a palace more splendid than any that fancy can picture, the palace of sure hope now, and implicit faith; these are the gold and silver bricks of its walls, and the pure dome of Love spans it; and the Lamp in the midst is the guardian of the structure. And a mightier Spirit than that of the imagination deigns to be at our call when we take our lamp in hand, for aid in any need. Untold wealth is at our beck with this in our possession, "more to be desired than gold, even the fine gold;" entrancing delights, "sweeter than honey and the honeycomb." We are kings possessing it and using it; robbed of it, or persuaded foolishly to exchange it away, beggars, with naught before us but a death of despair.

> "We sit unowned upon our burial sod,
> And know not whence we come, or whose we be,
> Comfortless mourners for the mount of God,
> The rock of Calvary."

After all, we know who the potent false magician is who takes many disguises to seduce us to ruin, and to rob us of that which we should keep, because it is our life. And our best reply will be, "Get thee hence, Satan," when some plausible merchant would persuade us, with smooth tongue, and tempting wares, and many specious reasons to exchange "old lamps for new."

EDWARD PERRONET.

THE favourite hymn, "All hail the power of Jesu's name," was undoubtedly written by Edward Perronet, the son of the Reverend Vincent Perronet, M.A., who was for more than fifty years vicar of Shoreham, in Kent, and so closely associated with the Wesleys and their work that Charles Wesley called him "the Archbishop of the Methodists." It has been ascribed to Shrubsole, who was for many years organist of Spafields Chapel, London; but the error probably arose from his having composed the tune of "Miles' Lane" especially to suit the metre, and be sung with it.

The full poem is contained in Edward Perronet's collection of original pieces, published in London in 1785, entitled "Occasional Verses, moral and sacred, published for the instruction and amusement of the candidly serious and religious." Mr. J. Gadsby, in his "Account of the Hymn-writers of the Seventeenth, Eighteenth, and Nineteenth Centuries," describes how he met with "a copy of it at Mr. Clarke's, the celebrated organist at Canterbury." "Indeed," he says, "I went to Canterbury purposely to see the book, having heard that it was there; and I persuaded Mr. Clarke to present it to the British Museum library. In that library, therefore, it may be seen. When Perronet died, he left Shrubsole a large sum of money." The hymn first appeared without signature in 1780, in the "Gospel Magazine." It has attained a worldwide celebrity, and there is hardly a large collection of hymns in which it does not appear; it is a great favourite in America. Yet it is commonly known in an abridged form, and, like many another production, has received various alterations in course of republication. The hymn has obtained so wide a popularity that our readers may be interested in the original version. It bears the title

"ON THE RESURRECTION."

> "All hail the power of Jesu's name!
> Let angels prostrate fall;
> Bring forth the royal diadem,
> To crown Him Lord of all.
> Let high-born seraphs tune the lyre,
> And, as they tune it, fall
> Before His face who tunes their choir,
> And crown Him Lord of all.
> Crown Him, ye morning stars of light,
> Who fix'd this floating ball;
> Now hail the strength of Israel's might,
> And crown Him Lord of all.

Crown Him, ye martyrs of your God,
Who from his altar call;
Extol the stem of Jesse's rod,
And crown Him Lord of all.

Ye seed of Israel's chosen race,
Ye ransomed of the fall,
Hail Him who saves you by his grace,
And crown Him Lord of all.

Hail Him, ye heirs of David's line,
Whom David Lord did call,
The God Incarnate, Man Divine;
And crown Him Lord of all.

Sinners! whose love can ne'er forget
The wormwood and the gall,
Go—spread your trophies at his feet,
And crown Him Lord of all.

Let every tribe and every tongue,
That bound creation's call,
Now shout in universal song,
The Crownèd Lord of all!"

Edward Perronet seems to have possessed a caustic wit, to which he gave vent in 1657, by the publication of a very satirical poem called "The Mitre," which consisted of about 1,300 verses of six lines each, containing so bitter a satire upon the abuses of the Established Church as they then existed that it was suppressed by private authority almost immediately after it was printed.

Another poem bears the quaint title, "The True Dying Swan; or, the real Christian returning to the Celestial Zion with songs of deliverance," Isa. xxxv. 10.

The complete collection of Edward Perronet's verses contains about two hundred and thirty poems, most of which are short. One which exhibits some ingenuity, and a true spirit of devotion, is called

"AN ALPHABETICAL PRAYER."

"All wise! all good! all-glorious Lord of all!
Before whose throne th' angelic armies fall,
Creation's sons Thy majesty adore,
Declare Thy greatness and confess Thy pow'r.
Each day preserv'd, each day Thy creatures own
Fresh mercies granted, and fresh favours shown.
Grant them for each—what best for all must prove,
Heaven here on earth, and then Thy heaven above.
In all Thou dost, Thy hand in all be seen,
Justice and truth, while mercy shines between.
Kept from all harm—as from all foul offence,
Lust's dark defile—and pride's ambitious sense.
Make every heart the temple for its God;
Nor leave a thought that can provoke his rod.
Of all Thy gifts—Thy holiness bestow,
Purer than light, and whiter than the snow.
Quicken our souls—till, purified our mind,
Reason shall bend—submissive as refin'd!
Soft spicy gales from Eden's groves shall spring,
The stream shall murmur, and the turtle sing;
Vain thoughts shall die—while thoughts of God shall rise,
Unmoor our hearts, and waft us to the skies;
With martyr'd saints we'll crowd th' ethereal coast,
Xerxes outnumber, and defy his host;
Yon sacred spires announce the pilgrim's home,
Zion's fair mount, and God's eternal dome."

Edward Perronet was married, but had no children; he died in 1792, at Canterbury.

His dying words were—

"Glory to God in the height of his divinity; glory to God in the depth of his humanity; glory to God in his all-sufficiency; and unto his hands I commend my spirit." P. B.

ATHENS.

BY THE REV. W. URWICK, M.A.

II.

AND now we descend again from the Acropolis through the Propylæon, as we entered—the only accessible way; and before us to the west, but at a lower height, rises "Mars' Hill," the venerable "Areopagus." Sixteen cut steps lead to the roughly-cut platform on the summit at the east end. Here the venerable "Upper Council" of judges sat in the open air; and the temple of the Eumenides was designedly placed immediately below. Hither the apostle of the Gentiles was led, as if for judgment, and here he took his stand when he delivered the memorable address preserved to us in the book of the Acts. Having climbed the steps leading to the spot I looked around, and before me, in ruin, was the impressive view which in its glory met the Apostle's eyes. The like of it is nowhere else to be seen.

Beneath him was the sanctuary of the Eumenides. On his right were the crowded Agora and the Pnyx, in the distance the temple of Jupiter Olympus. Away on the left stood the temple of Theseus, still imposing in its grace and beauty and the least-decayed ruin in the world. And before him, in all its majesty and wealth of ornamentation, rose the Acropolis, with the Propylæon, the temple of Victory, the Erectheum, and above all the Parthenon, even now, after the lapse of more than two thousand years, the pride of Greece and the envy of the world, the noblest ruin upon earth. It was face to face with all those masterpieces of Grecian art and architecture that the Apostle, all alone on Mars' Hill, surrounded by the philosophers, the statesmen, the merchants of the city, declared: "God dwelleth not in temples made with hands." Opening my Bible I read on the spot that memorable discourse; and never before did I understand and feel so fully the force of those weighty words, the death-blow of ritualism in architecture or sculpture, whether in the temples of India, of Greece, or of Rome, Christian as well as pagan: "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though He needed anything, seeing He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things." . . . "We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device. And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." What boldness, what divinely-inspired wisdom, what insight into the tendencies of human nature, what perception of the future dangers and pitfalls into which the religion of Christ would be plunged, do those majestic and solemn utterances embody! Well would it be for the church and the world, had they been always heeded.

INTERIOR OF THE PARTHENON.

Among the present representatives of Protestant Christianity and of the doctrine which St. Paul first preached, the king's chaplain, Mr. Peterson, who is a Lutheran, may be named first. He is a good and an able man. But the Greek church in Athens, as elsewhere, is sadly corrupt and idolatrous. The venerable Dr. J. H. Hill, of the American Episcopal Mission, has been here fifty years. He is the founder of the American Female School, which educates a certain number of girls as future school-mistresses in the provinces. He is now eighty years of age, with the use of all his faculties excepting sight. He has not, however, much advanced the cause of religious liberty in Athens, for he not only fraternises with the dignitaries of the Greek church, kissing the hands of their bishops in humble acknowledgment, but he conforms to a law which obliges the picture of "the Mother of God" and the Catechism of the Greek Church to be in every day-school. It was not, therefore, to be expected that he would make many converts to Protestantism. There is also in Athens a Greek Evangelical Mission, conducted by two missionaries of the Presbyterian church, the Rev. M. D. Kalopothakes, a Greek by birth; and the Rev. Thornton R. Sampson, an American. It was my privilege to make the acquaintance of both these excellent men, and to see somewhat of their work.

Not far from the ruins of the temple of Jupiter Olympus, and close by the arch of Hadrian, a commodious room is fitted up for worship, and here from Sunday to Sunday, and on the week evenings likewise, a goodly number (about sixty) of the citizens meet for worship. The evangelical truths of the Christian religion are boldly taught, and the cause of religious freedom consistently maintained. This mission is greatly indebted to the Religious Tract Society of London for contributions of money, which enable it to print and publish books of a religious character. In a list before me of fifty publications, I find the names of such works as Alleine's "Alarm," Barth of Wittemberg's "Church History," Butler's "Analogy," and the "Pilgrim's Progress"— all translated into modern Greek, and sold among the Athenians and elsewhere. Of "The Child's Paper," in the same language, upwards of 70,000 copies have been published, and of these 50,000 have been sold in one year, and of "The Star in the East," a large folio paper, 20,800 copies. Both these papers are edited by Dr. Kalopothakes. Upwards of 4,000 portions of the New Testament Scriptures were put into the hands of Greek soldiers during the same period. A day-school had been set on foot by the same mission, and was progressing well, but the strictness of the State law requiring the presence of a priest of the Greek Church, and the teaching of the catechism of that church, has obliged the closing of this school, at least for the present. It is, however, open as a Sunday-school.

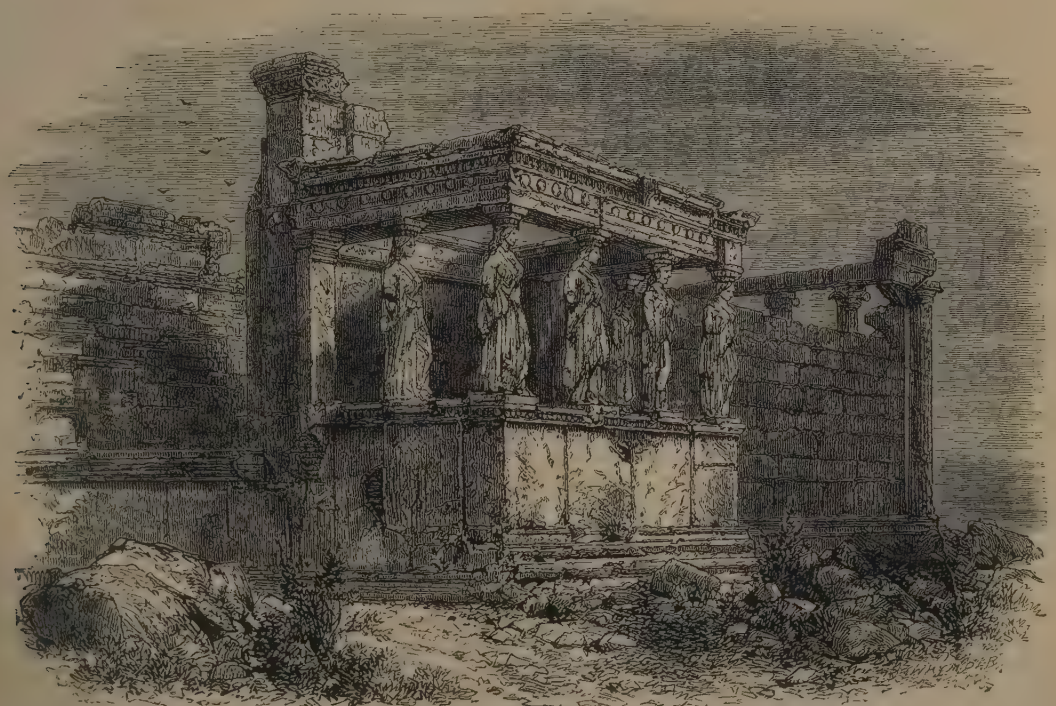
The first day that I visited the Acropolis, it was thronged with the holiday folk of modern Athens. It being a gala day, the usual fee for admission was dispensed with, and the precincts of the old Greek temples were thrown open to all. Here, where the throng of ancient Athens used to crowd in and out, up and down, was now to be seen the interesting sight of modern Athens in holiday attire passing to and fro amid the ruins of the past. All along the peristyle and vestibule of the temple of Theseus likewise, and between its graceful Doric columns, tables for refreshments were placed, and men, women and children, in various costumes, were swarming up and down the steps and thronging the wide area in front. Of these the Albanians in their national dress were the most picturesque and striking. It is extremely elegant and very costly, for every Albanian makes his own clothes. But I had another opportunity of spending some quiet hours among these ruins when all was calm and still in the peculiar clearness of an Athenian sky, and bathed in the gorgeous rays of the setting sun:

"Who that beheld that sun upon thee set,
Fair Athens! could thine evening face forget?"
Corsair, Canto ii.

up in thought the chiefs, and the statesmen, and the philosophers who once trod the steps we were treading, and passed between these columns and conversed together beneath the shadow of these buildings from the age of Pericles downwards. We also visited the Pnyx, the low hill a quarter of a mile west of the Acropolis, where the Athenians were wont to gather for public meetings, and we stood upon the bare stone platform ten feet high with an ascent of steps, cut out of the solid rock, where Pericles "fulmined over Greece," and Demosthenes had often swayed the multitude with his eloquence. Behind us was the same glorious view of sea and mountains: on our right, Mount Hymettus, 3,500 feet high; far away in front, Pentelicus, about the same height; and immediately before us the monuments of Athenian gratitude and glory upon the Acropolis, to which the orator would often point to rouse the patriotism of the crowd. The bema, or rostra, faces a space with a radius of 76 yards, capable of holding 6,000 auditors. In one of the streets beneath the Acropolis, where the ancient and modern Athens meet and blend, there stands the temple of the Winds, built after the Roman conquest, an octagonal tower, each side adorned with a symbolic figure of the corresponding wind from the quarter towards which it faced; Boreas towards the north, a winged figure (as they all are) floating in the air in a horizontal position, and blowing a long shell; Eurus to the east, stern and scowling; Notus to the south, with



THE ERECTHEUM, ATHENS.

It was in company with the two missionaries whom I have named, and under their intelligent conduct that I walked through the remains of ancient Athens a second time. We dwelt upon the past, and called an urn of water, and Zephyrus showering into the air a lap full of flowers. Beneath these figures were formerly a series of dials, so that the building was fitly called the horologium or clock tower of the city; and by a singular coincidence, the street in which it stands abounds in shops of modern Swiss and American watch and clock makers, and sellers of French and English wares.

What Arthur's Seat is to Edinburgh, Mount Lycabettus is to Athens. It rises on the north-east of the city as a natural defence, or boundary, as Plato calls it, and fable tells how it was dropped there by command of the guardian goddess, Athené. Aristophanes ranks it side by side with Parnassus. It is an isolated hill, and rises to the height of about 600 feet. Early one morning I climbed to its summit, and was repaid by a glorious prospect. The modern city lies mapped out before you with its 80,000 inhabitants, embraced by the Cephissus on the east, and the Ilissus on the west, the courses of both rivers being marked by the dark-green olive plantations and gardens. Away to the south-west is the Piræus, and the blue sea beyond, with the mountains of the Peloponnesus covered with snow. To the east and north the more distant canopy of mountains—Hymettus, Pentelicus, and Parnes—bound, with striking symmetry of arrangement, the wide-spreading plain. A small Greek church, dedicated to St. George, crowns the acute summit of this conical and beacon-like hill. Descending, we made our way through the modern streets now alive with traffic, to the outer Carameicus, an ancient place of burial, where have been disentombed the marble monuments of illustrious Athenians; and thence to the famous garden and grove of the Academy, where the immortal Plato taught, and near which he lived, a spot still verdant and rich in oranges, apricots, peaches, and figs, when the surrounding plain is dusty and parched. With all its charms of climate, modern Athens is, in the dry season, a very dusty place; and within as well as outside the dwellings the air is thick with the finest particles, drying the lips, and painful to the eyes.

Among the religious festivals of the Athenians the Eleusinian mysteries were the most important. They were celebrated in the month of August every year for many centuries at the little town of Eleusis, on the sea-coast, and on the road leading to the Isthmus of Corinth. The festival, which had secrets connected with it that only the initiated understood —like the freemasons of modern times—occupied nine days. It was held in honour of Demeter, the sorrowful, the goddess of agriculture, who, weeping for her daughter Proserpine, as the myth runs, appeared at a well-side in Eleusis, and instituted these mysteries in her honour. She has been called the mater dolorosa of heathen mythology, but the root of her worship lay probably in a desire to celebrate the benefits of agriculture. The great procession proceeded from Athens, along the via sacra, to the sea-coast on the second day, which was therefore called "come and bathe." The sixth was the great day of the feast before the temple of the goddess in Eleusis, a temple said to have been the largest in all Greece, and the finest specimen of Doric architecture after Phidias. On these occasions, Herodotus tells us, it was nothing uncommon to see thirty thousand people flocking along the sacred road.

Our time being limited, and the country not being very safe from brigands in other directions, my fellow-travellers and I gave a day to the excursion along this via sacra to Eleusis, the birthplace of Æschylus. The road crosses the belt of green "where meek Cephissus pours his scanty tide," and soon passes the site of the temple of Apollo, now marked by a Greek church. It leads through a well-wooded pass called Daphni (not to be confounded with the celebrated Daphné near Antioch in Syria), and by the remains of the temple of Venus (Aphrodite Phila) whose site has been identified by the discovery of doves of white marble at the foot of the rocks, and by inscriptions still visible upon them. Emerging from the pass a beautiful prospect of sea and island bursts upon you. The bay of Eleusis lies before you, shut in like a lake by the island of Salamis, with narrow channels at the two extremities only. Presently you pass the salt springs, which were considered to have healing virtues. Here the initiated in the great procession bathed, and here too we bathed in the placid waters of the sea as they danced upon the white beach. A few miles' drive farther on along the shore brings you to the town, and you at once have before you the white marble ruins of the famous temple. Huge blocks of polished marble and fallen columns are on every hand, and many beautifully-carved fragments meet the eye. Above are the ruins of an acropolis, indicating the importance of the situation in early times. But now all is as still and peaceful as are those mountains before you and yonder smooth blue sea. It is hard to realise the grandeur that once was here; the remains are strewn about in such utter ruin, and one soliloquises: "Is this all that is left of the far-famed Eleusinian mysteries?" We met a hungry wolf prowling along the lonely road—a strange contrast to the gay and merry crowds that used to stream back to Athens.

Ancient Athens, with the heathen past, is gone, and now in the modern city the Greek church holds its sway. But the Greek church even here, and in this nineteenth century, cannot be described as pure. There is in its ritual what savours too much of heathendom. One of the Protestant Evangelical Missionaries took me to the cavern behind the monument of Thrasyllus, in the rock of the Acropolis, where there was once a temple, probably to Æsculapius, and whither devotees, in ancient times, came to worship the god of healing in the hope of cure. The fabled Æsculapius and his worship have passed away. But the spring is there still, and the cavern was converted into the Church of the Holy Virgin, our lady of the grotto. The church, as well as the temple, has become a ruin; but inside the cavern are still set up the adornments of a Greek altar, and when we entered, a poor woman was prostrate before it, still believing in, and seeking, like the heathen of old, the healing virtue. The superstition is the same, though the idolatry bears another name. As I stood and watched the miserable devotee the thought rose in my mind, "Is there not wanted in modern Athens a second Paul to proclaim afresh the message of the great Apostle on Mars' Hill, and face to face with the altars and pictures of the Greek church to declare, 'God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped of men's hands, as though He needeth anything, seeing He giveth to all life and breath, and all things'?"

There are, however, many pledges of healthy life in modern Athens. The new university, with its handsome marble portico, and long open corridor, possesses a fine library of 150,000 volumes, and has about 1,200 students from different parts of Greece, and about fifty professors. There exists a comprehensive system of public instruction set on foot by the voluntary co-operation of all classes of the people. Young men come to Athens from every part of the little kingdom, and serve for their keep as clerks or domestic servants, on condition that they are permitted to attend classes at the Gymnasium, or University. There exists, moreover, an institution called the Arsakion, in which nearly a thousand girls receive an excellent education. It is divided into several departments, beginning with an Infant School. A beautiful new Academy of Arts, a Polytechnic school, a National Museum (in which, at present, Dr. Schliemann's discoveries at Mycenæ are exhibited), have been erected, by the liberality of patriotic Greeks. One of the handsomest new mansions in Athens is that of Dr. Schliemann. The city wears the aspect of new life and enterprise, and in the movement to independent nationality, education and Christianity are going hand in hand.

GREY TINTS.

"THE brighter the light the sharper the shadow" is a well-known axiom in painting, and, like many of Nature's laws, its similitude can be found in human life. We all know the bright light, the defined shadow. Untutored characters abound in both, but let us now for awhile dwell only on the grey neutral tints. In a landscape how beautiful they are! The soft, purplish hue which the wooded belt round yonder hill assumes, how soothing it is to the eye tired with the glare of the full sunlight; the rippling on the lake below seems but to add fresh beauty to the softened blue! Certainly repose and tenderness are Nature's greatest charms. Is it so in character? The question is quickly answered by us in early youth. Give us, we say, anything rather than a dead level, any faults rather than negative qualities. But on this, as on many other subjects, our opinions undergo a great change when our storehouse is better furnished and we grow wiser.

Amiability, which so many young persons thoroughly despise, we find to be essential in the middle-aged companion, as essential as it is rare, and one by one the grey tints and the negative qualities assume their unobtrusive positions, and become altogether indispensable in these restless lives of ours. Certainly they are so in the domestic ties, in those complicated cases of "in law," whose edges are often jagged and ill-fitting. Like the supple plaster in the mason's hands, which serves to join the rough, uneven stones and firmly set them in their proper place, so will the unobtrusive qualities form a uniting power in the family circle. It is said that the plainest person has always some one point of beauty—foot or hand, or shapely ear—and so from the most matter-of-fact companion we can derive something of pleasure or of profit, if but to exercise our own patience of spirit, as good George Herbert suggests, we are gainers by the companionship.

It is not always those who secure time by the forelock and vault astride him, regardless of bit and bridle, who are the successful in life. Disappointed and wearied out, the wild chase will be abandoned, and apathy or idleness follow at the very period when a steady progress might be reckoned on, and success ensured by patient continuing. "My mind to me a kingdom is," has been felt at one time or other by most thinkers as their greatest prerogative and pleasure, but it is difficult to draw the line accurately between the proper indulgence of contemplation and practice. Perhaps we ought more rigidly to arrange the order of our imaginings, those thoughts, or, more properly speaking, fancies, that come and go, and come again: ethereal creatures bright and varied in hue, and of undefined form, which flit across the mind and wrap it in a glory not its own—a glory useless for earth, not divine enough for heaven, soon, if indulged in, to become the phantasmagoria of all healthy life. From this danger the grey tints are free. Let us then cherish their gentle influence, remembering that excellence will show itself in many a varied form, and when once the character has awakened to a true sense of the responsibility of life, it seeks to cultivate those special graces which are foreign to its nature. God alone can give strength to do this, and He can alone supply the hidden springs, but we must keep the channels clear and build up the breaches.

IMPRISONED MUSIC.

A CURIOUS little incident happened lately during a time of prolonged sickness. At the close of a very dark and gloomy day I lay resting on my couch as the deeper night drew on, and though all was bright within my cosy little room, some of the external darkness seemed to have entered into my soul and obscured its spiritual vision. Vainly I tried to see the hand which I knew held mine and guided my fog-enveloped feet along a steep and slippery path of suffering. In sorrow of heart I asked, "Why does my Lord thus deal with His child? Why does He so often send sharp and bitter pains to visit me? Why does He permit lingering weakness to hinder the sweet service I long to render to His poor servants?" These fretful questions were quickly answered, and though in a strange language, no interpreter was needed save the conscious whisper of my own heart. For awhile silence reigned in the little room, broken only by the crackling of the oak log burning on the hearth. Suddenly I heard a sweet soft sound, a little, clear, musical note like the tender trill of a robin beneath my window. "What can that be?" I said to my companion, who was dozing in the firelight; "surely no bird can be singing out there at this time of the year and night!" We listened, and again heard the faint plaintive notes, so sweet, so melodious, yet mysterious enough to provoke for a moment our undisguised wonder. Presently my friend exclaimed, "It comes from the log on the fire!" and we soon ascertained that her surprised assertion was correct. The fire was letting loose the imprisoned music from the old oak's inmost heart! Perchance he had garnered up this song in the days when all went well with him, when birds twittered merrily on his branches, and the soft sunlight flecked his tender leaves with gold. But he had grown old since then, and hardened; ring after ring of knotty growth had sealed up the long-forgotten melody, until the fierce tongues of the flames came to consume his callousness, and the vehement heat of the fire wrung from him at once a song and a sacrifice. Ah! thought I, when the fire of affliction draws songs of praise from us, then indeed are we purified and our God is glorified! Perhaps some of us are like this old oak log, cold, hard and insensible; we should give forth no melodious sounds were it not for the fire, which kindles round us, and releases tender notes of trust in Him and cheerful compliance with his will! "As I mused, the fire burned," and my soul found sweet comfort in the parable so strangely set forth before me! Singing in the fire! Yes! God helping us, if that is the only way to get harmony out of these hard apathetic hearts, let the furnace be heated seven times hotter than before.

THE DWELLING-PLACE.

"Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations."—Psa. xc. 1.

"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty."—Psa. xci. 1.

BY bringing together the first verses of these two Psalms, we discover not only a great general truth, but the effect of that truth as realised by the individual. To the whole Church, from all generations, the Lord is a dwelling-place. But it is when a man feels for himself that the Lord is his own dwelling-place, that he realises all the blessedness, the security, the comfort which the thought is fitted to afford. He no longer rests in generalities; he dwells in the secret place of the Most High as his own refuge, and abiding there he feels how safe he is. The shadow of the Almighty covers him from the heat; the rock and the fortress of everlasting strength protects him from his foes. The Church of Christ from earliest days, even when in the wilderness, sang by the voice of Moses, the man of God, "Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations." The Psalmist of the ninety-first Psalm re-echoes the strain for himself, and from his own experience, "I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge." We miss the comfort that this truth affords unless we thus make it our own. The Lord is not only the dwelling-place of the glorious company of the apostles, of the goodly fellowship of the prophets, of the noble army of martyrs, of the Holy Church throughout all the world—He is my dwelling-place! The "Rock of ages cleft for me" is my refuge. The saving efficacy of the water and the blood, saves me. I am the lowest and the least of all—but I am His! To me when hiding under his shadow, covered by his Cross, belong all the promis s of the Gospel, the means of grace, the hope of glory!

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

APRIL 3.

FOLLOWING JESUS. LUKE IX. 51–62.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 57.—'And it came to pass, that as they went in the way, a certain man said unto Him, Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest.'

CONNECTION.—A new section of our Lord's life has now commenced—the second stage of His ministry; introduced like the first by a voice from heaven, This is my beloved Son (ix. 35). In His TRANSFIGURATION was His solemn designation for the cross, when the representatives of the Law and the prophets, in glorified form, came down to earth 'and spake of His decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem.' The Lesson shows the beginning of the series of incidents, parables and miracles, occupying in all more than half a year, that followed this great event, and closed His earthly work.

I. JESUS ON THE WAY TO JERUSALEM.—Read ver. 51. We pause on this verse, because of its special connection with our Lord's work. The time was come, literally, the days were being fulfilled, there was a definite purpose and arrangement throughout: ch. xiii. 32; John xvii. 1. That He should be received up, i.e. into heaven. The Ascension, which was to crown His work, is here used to denote in a single phrase its completion, including His sacrifice and resurrection. The Evangelist regards all of Christ's ministry that followed in the light of this great event. 'He was now beginning to depart from this world.'

He stedfastly set his face, expressive of determined purpose, and, may we not add?—of silent, concentrated resolve? Those about Him could not understand His intensity of desire; His looks embody what His words cannot yet reveal. Note in verses 46–50, the selfish ambitions and narrow rivalries that occupied His disciples, while His soul was fixed on Gethsemane and the Cross! To go to Jerusalem. His ministry in Galilee was practically over; the Holy City was henceforth the goal of his desires. In fact, after this He visited Jerusalem twice, and left it again, before His final entry:—at the Feast of Tabernacles in the autumn, and that of Dedication in the winter, John vii. 10; x. 22, 23.

> These three visits are suggested by St. Luke: the verse before us referring to Christ's journey to the Feast of Tabernacles; ch. xiii. 22, to his visit for the Feast of Dedication; and ch. xvii. 11,* to His setting out for His final journey, from the 'city called Ephraim,' John xi. 54.

II. THE SAMARITAN VILLAGERS.—Read vers. 52–56. The company that attended Him being now so large (the twelve, the women who 'ministered unto Him,' etc., ch. viii. 2), it was requisite to make arrangements beforehand where they were to lodge. A village of the Samaritans, identified by some with En Gannim, now Jenîn, a frontier town of Galilee (Conder's Tent Work in Palestine, vol. i. p. 110). Dr. Thomson found the inhabitants 'fanatical, rude, and rebellious' (Land and the Book, s. xxx.). The messengers were rejected by he villagers. Why? Not because Jesus was declared as the Messiah (whether this declaration was made by the messengers s uncertain—see ch. ix. 21—and if it had been, the Samaritans vere not wholly unprepared to receive it, John iv. 25, 42), ut because He and His escort were travelling towards Jerusalem. The old animosity between the two peoples roke out especially at the time of the national festivities, so hat the route generally taken from Galilee was the road on he eastern side of Jordan. (For the causes of Samaritan ostility, see the Biblical Dictionaries, and Handy Book for Bible Readers, R.T.S. 'Sects and Orders.') James and John here show the spirit which had led Jesus to name hem 'Sons of Thunder,' Mark iii. 17. Their outbreak may be xplained, not excused. Nothing is more annoying to weary ravellers, than to be churlishly refused accommodation: fanaicism, again, naturally awakens fanaticism in return; these disciples were jealous for their Master's honour; and they must t the time have been filled with thoughts and memories of the great Elijah, whom they had so lately seen upon the 'holy nount.' Hence their fierce proposal, rebuked at once by Jesus: Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; you do ot understand yourselves, supposing, but wrongly, that this is he way in which the 'spirit of Elijah' is to be manifested. No, he same Spirit which wrought so terribly in those awful times, s now given as a Spirit of love and peace. This the Apostles nderstood better after the day of Pentecost; and we note that ne of these two disciples was thereafter engaged in preaching he Gospel 'in many villages of the Samaritans!'* But even ow the inhabitants of Samaria were not all alike. Jesus and His followers went to another, literally, a different (kind of) village (we need not suppose, with some expositors, in Galilee), and found a different reception there.

* 'Through the midst of,' in this passage may signify between—a circuitous route from 'Ephraim.'

III. THREE WOULD-BE FOLLOWERS OF CHRIST.—Read vers. 57–62. The three are placed together as different types of character. No doubt our Lord often met with persons of each class. Two of these cases are recorded by Matthew in a much earlier period of the history (viii. 19–22). We must suppose either that the incidents occurred twice (so Robinson), or (which seems more probable) that they are given by Matthew out of their order, his Gospel not being chronological. Certainly they seem very appropriately to belong to this last journey to Jerusalem, although not out of place in Christ's earlier Galilean ministry.

1.—Rashness. This would-be follower (a 'Scribe,' Matt.) s eager but uncalculating. A good resolution truly, Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest!

And how deep in meaning! Not merely, as the man may have imagined, to have the privilege of listening to wondrous words, witnessing mighty deeds, sharing in the future kingdom; but this 'following' would imply participation in coming toils and sorrows; while, again, heaven knows no brighter service or brighter joy; John x. 4; Rev. xiv. 4. 'Following Jesus' s the sum of practical Christianity. A truly 'Golden Text' for us! But was the speaker prepared for the consequences of his own words? Take one test. Was he ready to be homeless with Christ? 'Remember those Samaritan villagers yesterday who turned us out. Can you venture on such a wandering life as this?' The general lesson of the incident is to count the cost of becoming a disciple, and if we can then resolve upon this course, the Son of man, our sympathising Saviour-king, will welcome us. We know not whether this Scribe 'went away sorrowful,' or whether in all meekness he replied, 'Ever, Lord, with Thee, though without an earthly home!' If the latter, where is he now?

2. Conflicting claims. Next comes one (a 'disciple,' Matt.) called by Christ to active service,† but hesitating on account of home claims. The form of his request is difficult; Suffer me first to go and bury my father. Now this could hardly mean that his father was at the time dead: for first, the man would not in that case have been in the crowd; while secondly, the dead are buried in the East on the day of death, so that the funeral would cause little or no delay; and thirdly, our Lord was not likely to discourage such an act of filial love. The son's wish, therefore, seemed to be, to go and live at home till his aged father's death, and then to respond to Christ's summons. But these family claims, Jesus knew, would fatally conflict with the call to higher service, and therefore He bids His disciple to leave such affairs with the household spiritually dead. There were those at home to look after all these interests, and to render all duteous observance to the aged parent when he should pass away. A more pressing business claimed this disciple's thought and care. Go thou and preach the kingdom of God. The general lesson is that of ch. xiv. 25.

3. Irresolution. One last farewell at home, and then I am ready! The case corresponds with that of Elisha and Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 20. But Christ saw that this wish betokened a divided heart; hence His reply. The ploughman in the case supposed does not desert his work, but lets his attention wander from it; and (especially with the light ploughs of the East) it was necessary to keep the eye steadfastly fixed on it, that the furrow might be straight. So, distracted attention will hinder all true work for the kingdom of God.

> 'The best illustration of the danger of looking back after having put our hand to the plough, is the case of those converts from Hinduism, whose parents, when apprised of their intention to be baptized, travel to the mission-house, and plead, with tears and threats, that they will not take a step so fatal. Failing by this means to shake their resolution, they at length submit to their hard fate; only requesting that before they undergo the rite which is to sever them for ever from home, they will pay them one parting visit, to bid them farewell which are at home at their house. It seems but reasonable. To refuse it looks like gratuitously wounding parental feeling: "Well, I will go; but my heart is with you, my spiritual fathers, and soon I will rejoin you." He goes—but never returns. How many promising converts have thus been lost.' —Dr. D. Brown.

QUESTIONS.

1. Give illustrations of our Lord's concentrated purpose, parallel with that in ver. 51.
2. What were the chief grounds of the enmity between the Jews and Samaritans?
3. How do the words of our Lord to James and John bear upon the subject of religious persecution?
4. By what general principles are conflicting claims of duty to be settled—especially when religious obligations seem opposed to home interests?
5. Illustrate these three types of character (the 'would-be disciples') from your own observation or from modern church life.

THE ROSE-TREE AND THE SPOTTED LAUREL.

IT was the hush-hour of early dawn, when Nature lies as if spell-bound, awaiting the sunrise. In a quiet little country garden all was silent with the universal stillness of expectation; and yet not altogether silent, for the plants were passing the waiting-time in a voiceless buzz of conversation.

"Impossible, I say!" the rose-tree was exclaiming in a somewhat excited tone; "it would be just as impossible for a stone to drop into yonder pond without ruffling the surface and producing those numerous circles of eddies round it, as for anything to come into this world without in some way or other influencing—consciously or unconsciously—those around it. That the unconscious influence preponderates is my humble opinion. All round us we cast our influence—just as the stone that falls into the pond makes circles all round it—the nearest circles are the most marked; then they grow fainter and fainter, and none can say where the last one ends or dies away."

"It is a very strange thing, this influence," remarked a flower-pot, that was poised upside-down on a stick in the midst of the dahlia bed close by. "Now, it is a fact that, ugly as I am, and dark as my inside is, the gardener had hardly stuck me in this—to me—most uncomfortable position, when I became a cause of attraction to a whole bevy of earwigs. Why they like me is an enigma to myself."

The rose smiled scornfully.

"'Men of evil deeds delight
In darkness rather than in light,'"

she observed. "Why, the gardener has just put you there as a trap to catch the horrid little creatures, and keep them away from his flowers."

"I would rather be a 'trap to catch a sunbeam,'" remarked a dewdrop near, as she stood quietly waiting on the tip of a blade of grass.

She had her wish fulfilled—which was more than she expected. Even as she spoke, a ray from the rising sun caught her glistening face, and made it sparkle with a thousand tints. Unconscious of her beauty, she trembled on the tiny spray on which she was poised, her one little eye—for she had only one—fixed on the orb of day.

"He is drawing me up—up! I must go to him!" she cried; and even as she spoke she was gone.

Yet she had not lived her little day without adding her mite to the weight of unconscious influence that rested on every living object. Refreshed by her gentle touch, and longing to follow her, the small blade of grass stretched itself to the utmost of its power to see where she had gone; and in the very act (though she was not aware of it) made countless other tiny sprays intuitively lift themselves up too, that they might see what their companion was looking at.

"Our question was whether there was such a thing as 'unconscious influence,'" remarked the aucuba-bush, resuming the thread of the general discourse which the dewdrop had broken. "I for one don't believe there is. Everything must know if they possess any power, or influence, over others," and as she spoke she shook her glossy leaves in the still morning air. "Of course we have influence, but I repudiate the idea of unconscious influence entirely."

"And what is your influence, pray?" asked a tall white lily that stood near. "I never knew that things like us had any influence at all."

"What influence have I?" asked the aucuba, in the tone of one who thought the question very unnecessary; "why, you silly little innocent. I am evergreen all the year round. When other trees are cast down because winter has robbed their boughs of all their graceful foliage, I hold up my leafy head, and hopefully point to better days. And when other plants are well-nigh dead with droughts in summer, I still hold up like a man, and try by my appearance at least to put some heart—I ought, perhaps, to say sap—into them."

"There is another side to your story," remarked the rose-tree, from her place at the opposite side of the broad gravel walk, "and it backs up my theory of unconscious influence."

"I should like to hear it," said the aucuba hastily.

"It is not a very pleasant one," replied the rose, "but I may as well mention it, and that is that nothing likes to grow near you. Whatever your influence may be above ground (and I grant it is by no means small), the influence you carry on underground is just as palpable. Why will nothing grow under your shadow? Do you do it on purpose?"

The aucuba had never thought of it before. If she had ever noticed it she had never paused to think why it was. She had always been so set on "keeping up a good appearance" and thus "setting a good example to those around her," that she had overlooked the roots of the matter, like many wiser people do, and knew nothing of the poison that ran in her veins which produced the effect that the rose-tree had noticed.

"At any rate I have no thorns like you," she remarked, in a somewhat injured tone. "They, at least, give no unconscious influence."

"I often regret that they are so sharp," sighed the rose-tree sadly; "but I can't help it. Summer and winter they stick on my stem, and will not come off. Even the winds that dash my fair blossoms to the dust, and scatter my leaves everywhere, have no effect on them. I have tried in vain to get rid of them, but all my efforts have been useless. It is my appointed trial, I suppose, and I must bear it."

"I have often noticed how patiently you bear the trouble," observed a daisy, looking up from its grassy bed at the edge of the grass plot hard by. "And after all, it is well that you could not remove it, for if you could, you would have deprived man of one of his truest and best mottoes: 'No rose without a thorn,' they say."

"You always speak brightly—just like you look," answered the rose. "You always remind me of how good a thing it is to look upward. However wet the ground is, you never withdraw your upward gaze, and consequently escape seeing much that would pain and grieve you."

"It is not that I am not interested in you all," said the daisy lovingly. "Only as my face is always turned to the light, I can only give you sidelong glances, which but show me the surface of things—and that always seems beautiful."

"Yes, 'tis happiest not to look too deeply into things; it prevents our seeing much that is ugly, and much that we are never meant to see. For instance: who would guess that the snowdrop, so pure and white, has its root in the dark earth."

"It is the knowledge of what I spring from that makes me bend my head so low," remarked the snowdrop (her snowy blossoms had long since melted away before summer's mild breezes and sunshine). "It seems the most suitable position for one whose origin is so humble."

"Ah, snowdrop, you often make me think what a lovely thing true humility is!" exclaimed the rose.

"I never knew you noticed me," replied the snowdrop with some surprise.

"Another case of unconscious influence," remarked the rose-tree meditatively. And then she continued as if speaking to herself, "I suppose there is an active and passive side to every life—even a rose's, or a daisy's, or an aucuba's, or a snowdrop's—only it seems to me the passive or negative side—the 'unconscious influence,' if I may call it so—is the greatest.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE proverbial uncertainty of legal issues before our English tribunals has received a striking illustration in the cases of the Rev. Messrs. T. Pelham Dale, and R. W. Enraght. We stated last month (p. 143) the unanimous judgment of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, by which both these gentlemen were declared to be legally subjected to imprisonment as the result of sentences pronounced by the Dean of Arches for contempt of court, in disobeying its directions. The judgment thus unanimously given has been as unanimously reversed by the Court of Appeal. Nearly a week was occupied by this last tribunal in hearing arguments upon the matter from the learned counsel on both sides. The Judges of Appeal, Lords Justices James, Brett, and Cotton—directed attention to two chief points, involving the main issues in both cases: (1) The question of Lord Penzance's jurisdiction; (2) the question as to the regularity of the procedure which had taken place in the execution of the writs issued in pursuance of the sentences which had been pronounced by Lord Penzance. On the first of these questions the Lords Justices were unanimously of the same opinion as the three Judges against whose decision the appeal was made. Lord Justice James said that on this, "the main point," he had not from the beginning "been able to entertain any doubt." Lord Justice Brett said that in his opinion it was "as clear as anything ever propounded in a court of justice that Lord Penzance's Court is the old Court of Arches, and nothing but the old Court of Arches." Lord Justice Cotton was equally emphatic in the same direction. On the first issues, therefore, the judgment of the Lords Justices was in favour of the respondents. On the second issue it was for the appellants, being based, however, upon a purely technical point—the question whether the writ against the respondents had been issued in accordance with the strict requirements of the law. This was decided in favour of the appellants. The result of the appeal was that the application failed as regarded the prohibition to restrain Lord Penzance, but succeeded as regarded the writ of Habeas Corpus to release Mr. Dale and Mr. Enraght from prison. Thus the decision of the Appeal Court only affects these clergymen personally; it leaves unchanged the decision of the Queen's Bench on the substantial question submitted to it.

IN another case also mentioned last month (p. 144), that of the Rev. J. B. De la Bere, Vicar of Prestbury, who had been sentenced by the Dean of Arches to be deprived of his benefice, an application to the Master of the Rolls has resulted in the granting a rule nisi, with an interim order, restraining the publication of the sentence. His lordship added that all he now decided was that there were some points to be argued.

ONE result of the imprisonment of the two clergymen who have been released on the technical ground above stated, has been the publication of much correspondence by persons of position and influence, and others, on the condition of things in the Church of England which rendered such imprisonment possible. Canon Wilkinson having addressed the Archbishop of Canterbury upon the subject, his Grace in the course of his reply, said: "You may feel confident that I, in common with all the bishops, am as anxious as you can be that full consideration should be given to existing difficulties in the Church, and to the best mode of removing them. It certainly may fairly be taken to show that there must be some exceptional difficulty in present arrangements when clergymen of otherwise unimpeachable character think it their duty to run the risk of having their usefulness in their parishes rudely interrupted by the authority of the law rather than yield to those set over them in the Lord that degree of willing obedience which seems to most men to be enjoined alike by the traditions of the Church and by the written words of the Prayer-book (in the preface 'concerning the service of the Church'), as well as by their promise of canonical obedience. I am quite sure I may undertake for my brethren of the Episcopate that we are ready very carefully to consider, at the present juncture, the grounds which appear to have led to so strange a result." His Grace added: "I cannot but respect the evident earnestness of many who are disturbed as to the alleged grievances which attach to our present condition."

SUBSEQUENTLY to the publication of the above letter a memorial presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury by the Dean of St. Paul's, was signed by a number of deans, archdeacons, canons, other dignitaries and clergy. The memorialists say that they submit to his Grace the following suggestions in consequence of the invitation given by the Archbishop to those of the clergy who feel dissatisfied or alarmed at the present circumstances of the Church, to state what they desire in the way of remedy; "First of all, and especially, we would respectfully express our desire for a distinctly avowed policy of toleration and forbearance on the part of our ecclesiastical superiors in dealing with questions of ritual. Such a policy appears to us to be demanded alike by justice and by the best interests of religion. For justice would seem to require that unless a rigid observance of the Rubrical Law of the Church, or of recent interpretations of it, be equally exacted from all parties within her pale, it should no longer be exacted from one party alone, and under circumstances which often increase the difficulty of complying with the demand. And, having regard to the uncertainties which have been widely thought to surround some recent interpretations of ecclesiastical law, as well as to the equitable claims of congregations placed in the most dissimilar religious circumstances, we cannot but think that the recognised toleration of even wide diversities of ceremonial is alone consistent with the interests of true religion, and with the well-being of the English Church at the present time. The immediate need of our Church is, in our opinion, a tolerant recognition of divergent ritual practice." The memorialists also suggest that the Courts by which ecclesiastical causes are decided in the first instance and on appeal should be so constructed as "to secure the conscientious obedience of clergymen who believe the constitution of the Church of Christ to be of Divine appointment, and who protest against the State's encroachment upon rights assured to the Church of England by solemn Acts of Parliament." In acknowledging the receipt of this "important document," as the Archbishop terms it, his Grace refers to the published letter, quoted above, addressed by him to Canon Wilkinson, "as an assurance" that the memorial will receive the attentive consideration of the bishops.

A COUNTER-MEMORIAL to that quoted above is in course of signature as we write. This may be said to have originated at the first meeting of the "Clerical and Lay Associations' Union" which was held a few weeks since at the Cannon Street Hotel, at which a large number of clerical and lay representatives and friends were present. The meeting was presided over by Lord Midleton, supported by Bishop Perry, the Dean of Ripon, Canons Hoare and Money, Archdeacon Bardsley, and many other well-tried Evangelicals. Papers were read on "Reasons for United Action," by Archdeacon Bardsley, of Liverpool, and on "The Method of United Action," by Canon Hoare, followed by discussion. A Central Committee of Vigilance for the year was appointed.

THE Earl of Shaftesbury recently presided at a meeting, held in the drawing-room of Mr. George Hanbury, in Portman Square, in support of the special religious services for the people in theatres, halls, and mission rooms. Mr. George Hanbury gave an account of the work carried out during the last twenty-one years at St. James's Hall, the East-end and other theatres, and at music and other halls. In the course of his remarks he urged, in answer to the objections made by people against religious services being conducted in unconsecrated places, that if the people who frequented the theatre and music-hall missions had not these places to go to, they would go to no places of worship whatever! These views were supported by other speakers in forcible terms, in which they dwelt upon the possible evils to society generally which might result from the lower classes of the huge population of London being left to grow up in infidelity taught them on all hands, and it was also pressed that the people who were brought to hear the truth by means of these services would not hear it otherwise. The noble chairman, in the course of a long and eloquent speech, warmly supported the work of the mission, and expressed himself as greatly depressed that its friends should have now to combat the objections which were dealt with and overcome more than twenty years ago. He urged that the objectors to the services should read the reports, and in these, he said, they would find abundant answer to their objections. It was announced that these services greatly suffer from want of adequate funds.

THE ninth annual meeting of the Orphan Homes of Scotland, the Destitute Children's Emigration Homes, and the City Home and Mission, Glasgow, was held recently in the City Home Hall. Dr. Cameron, M.P., occupied the chair. Mr. Quarrier began his work among the poor children of the streets sixteen years ago, when he formed the Shoeblack Brigade in Glasgow. He soon became convinced that much more ought to be done, and nine years ago was led to originate these Homes, in which not only the temporal, but also the spiritual interests of the children are cared for. There is no collector for the Homes, paid or unpaid; no names of donors are published, but only what is necessary to show every sum received. In the course of his address, the chairman referred to the remarkable fact that, whether the times were good or bad, Mr. Quarrier's work had gone on with unvarying regularity, and funds were supplied without any need of an appeal to the public. Mr. Richard Hunter presented the financial statement, which showed that 10,252*l.* had come in during last year, besides numerous articles of clothing, provisions, etc., the largest amount ever received. Every penny received is publicly acknowledged once a fortnight, as well as in the annual balance. Mr. Quarrier stated that it was with gratitude to God that he had to say, at the year's close, that their wants had been met, and encouragement given to look for yet greater things than these. During these nine years, upwards of 1,400 children had been rescued, and put in the way of supporting themselves: 2,000 others had been casually helped; many hundred thousand tracts had been circulated among the poor and in low lodging-houses: the Gospel had been extensively preached; the City Home had been built at a cost of 8,000*l.*; forty acres of land had been purchased at Bridge of Weir, and eight orphan-houses erected at a cost of 21,000*l.* During the year, 467 children had been permanently helped, and temporary shelter had been given to 174. In addition, upwards of 1,500 men, women, and children, in different stages of distress, had received advice and assistance; 307 had had a night's lodging paid for them in the model lodging-houses; and many widows had been helped to pay their rent. It was not right to relieve parents or friends of responsibility where they were able to maintain children, and hence these institutions undertook only those cases which there was nobody else to touch; and every single case was personally investigated and dealt with on its own merits. It is worthy of notice that 700*l.* was earned in wages by the boys and lads in the City Home during the year. The speakers who followed expressed the sense of the great value of the institution, and bore testimony to its usefulness.

THERE has been provided in the capital of Spain a little hospital for sick Protestants. The necessity for such an institution in any priest-ridden country, may be judged from the following narrative which we find in a letter from the Rev. F. Fliedner of Madrid: "A young professor of mathematics, lay," in a town in the South of Spain, "on his last bed. His wife had been employed by us as a teacher years ago; she was faithful in her office, though not a Protestant when she came to us. Only the need of earning her daily bread had driven her to the heretics; but we noticed how the slow influence of our common work gradually drew her heart towards us. Her quiet little husband we but seldom saw, and several years ago they went to Guadiz, where he was employed by Government. When it was evident that his end was drawing near, the Bishop came, with other clergymen, to persuade him to receive the last sacraments of the Roman Church; he refused, gently but decidedly, and at last pretended to sleep in order to escape their importunity. But when left alone with his wife, he drew a key from under his pillow, and asked her to take his Bible from a drawer, and read to him. Even she had not known of its existence before; shy as he was, he had not dared to confess his faith. But now the precious treasure which he had hidden brought light and comfort to both. We cannot judge hardly of our timid brother, for the position of such hidden ones in the little towns, and especially in the province of Granada, is incredibly difficult. The best proof is that, even in this case, a few minutes before the death of our brother, his wife was removed by force, and extreme unction was administered to him. But we rejoice that the Saviour was near to him with His word in the hour of death, and thank God when He permits us to see, by such unexpected experiences, that the seed of His Gospel is not sown in vain."

BERLIN has a Protestant population of 781,686 souls, for which there are 36 churches and 75 pastors, with church accommodation for only 31,873 persons, or 4 per cent. of the whole. The average number under the charge of each pastor is 10,500! The worst parish in Berlin is that of St. Thomas, which has a Protestant population of 90,000, for which there is 1 church and 1 chapel, accommodating together 1,730 persons and ministered to by 4 preachers. "All the parishes are terribly unwieldy. It is said that only about half of the Protestant interments are performed with religious rites. The "Foreign Church Chronicle" says: "These figures present us with a startling picture of religious apathy, and it is a comfort to know that Berlin is an extreme case of the kind. In the smaller towns and in the country there is much more religious life and activity; and there are symptoms of an awakening at Berlin. A few churches are in course of erection, and a scheme is on foot for the endowment of a staff of curates, while the Berlin City Mission is working with praiseworthy vigour. But there needs a national revival and a self-denying spirit not yet displayed in order in any adequate way to overtake the religious necessities of the great centre of German Protestatism."

THE Paris correspondent of a contemporary writes: "Step after step is being taken in the direction of the separation of Church and State. Episcopal stipends have been reduced to the figures of the Concordat, the crucifixes have been removed from the Paris schools, a Secular Education Bill has been sent up to the Senate, and educational diplomas are now to be gained without the necessity of an examination in religious subjects. The Supreme Council on Prisons is also to be remodelled like the Educational Council, to the exclusion of the Archbishop of Paris, the Chief Rabbi, and the President of the Protestant Consistory, hitherto ex officio members."

A RUSSIAN journal reports that a short time ago some peasants were drawing water from a well in Gadiatch, when one of them espied a picture of the Virgin floating on the surface of the limpid liquid. While they were taking counsel together as to the proper course of conduct to be adopted in the face of so marvellous a manifestation, they were joined by two village girls, who, the picture being pointed out to them, declared that only two hours previously they had seen it flying about in the air and watched it as it gently descended into the well. This story of theirs spread throughout the district of Gadiatch like wildfire, and as soon as it came to the ears of the landowner upon whose property the "holy well" was situated, he lost no time in building a chapel over the spring. To this chapel the population of the district has since repaired in daily increasing numbers, leaving the churches empty of their congregations even on Sundays and saints' days, so that the local clergy, finding their takings growing smaller, applied to the police authorities for an investigation of the alleged miracle. An official inquiry has brought to light the fact that the Virgin's counterfeit presentment had been purchased of a travelling pedlar by the speculative landowner above mentioned, who had utilised it, with the assistance of his peasantry, for the creation of a sacred shrine upon his estate, and had already cleared a handsome sum by appropriating the money offerings of the pilgrims who had flocked to the "holy well" from all parts of the surrounding country. The author of the fraud is in prison awaiting his trial for sacrilege.

THE more distinguished clergy and ministers who have been removed by death within the last few weeks include the Rev. Dr. Cartmel, Master of Christ Church, Cambridge, and Chaplain to the Queen, aged seventy; the Rev. Dr. Humphry Lloyd, Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, in his eighty-second year; the Rev. R. C. Dallas, aged eighty-seven, who entered holy orders half a century ago, after having been wounded at the battle of Waterloo, and having received a medal in recognition of his bravery; and the Rev. Josiah Miller, one of the Secretaries of the London City Mission. The Wesleyan Connexion has again sustained losses by the decease of the Rev. Robert Jackson—the last of three brothers, all of whom were in high repute as ministers in Methodist circles—in his eighty-second year, and of the Rev. Dr. Frederick James Jobson, in his sixty-ninth year. His rare gifts early placed him among the most popular preachers of his denomination. In 1864 he was appointed Book Steward, and in 1869 he was elected President of the Conference. Very few Methodist ministers have enjoyed so many friendships among the leading men of other religious communities.

THE Pope's pecuniary circumstances are anything but encouraging, the Peter's Pence collection for last year having seriously diminished. During 1880 the sum collected barely amounted to three million francs, whereas in 1879 the tribute came to a million francs more. It is more than suspected, as a cause of this falling-off of revenue, that those who have no sympathy with Pope Leo's reforming views have done a great deal to restrain the liberality of "the faithful," hoping by cutting off the supplies to compel the Pope to adopt a more intolerant policy.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

HAS IT BEEN A HAPPY BIRTHDAY?

THROUGH THE LINN;

OR, MISS TEMPLE'S WARDS.

BY AGNES GIBERNE, AUTHOR OF 'MURIEL BERTRAM,' ETC.

CHAPTER I.—THE NINETEENTH BIRTHDAY.

"WELL, Lettice, my child, has it been a happy birthday?"

Mr. Majendie took off his gold-rimmed spectacles, rubbed them gently with his silk pocket-handkerchief, laid them on the study-table by his side, and looked smilingly into his daughter's face.

"Has it been a happy birthday, so far? Nineteen years old! How time flies! All the more need to make good use of the hours as they go. It is a grave thought, that not one ever comes back. Has it been a tolerably happy day, my dear?"

"One of the happiest I ever had, father, and that is saying a good deal."

"More than some girls could say in your place perhaps. No amusements, no excitement, no party, no friends—I am afraid it has been but a dull sort of fête day."

"Quite enough of a fête for my taste," Lettice answered, smiling, with a little rattle of her new gold watch-chain. "I think I have been thoroughly fêted with gifts—just exactly the things I wanted most too. As for excitement, Violet and I had a most exciting game this morning with Bruno and Frisk, and as for amusement, mother has been reading and talking to us delightfully for two whole hours this afternoon. Aunt Jeannie can't come to dinner, as I wished, certainly, but I am going to pay her a visit instead, which is almost as nice, for I shall have her all to myself."

Lettice looked as pleased as if she had been describing aught but the most ordinary events of every-day life. She stood by her father's chair, a slender well-grown girl, with clear colourless skin, resolute outline of lips and chin, and dark full eyebrows over liquid grey eyes. Mr. Majendie was an old man, having married late in life, and his thin silvery hair grew crown-wise, in a circle round a bare space on his head, contrasting with a gentle ruddy-complexioned face. It was a September day, somewhat chilly, and a fire burned in the wide fireplace. The room was plentifully lined with books.

"Yours is a contented spirit, my Lettice. What, letters!"

"Fraser imagined this morning that I was disappointed at receiving no birthday letters, so he actually walked all the way to Ballam under the dim hope of finding some by a later mail. I happened to remark, in his hearing, that one or two of my old schoolfellows used to write, and had not done so this year. Naturally enough, for I never write to them. I am afraid good old Fraser was more disappointed than I, to find his attempt a failure."

"It was a failure, then?"

"Oh yes—as I could have warned him. Whom should I hear from? Everybody that I love is with me, and I have not any outside friends, you know." Lettice smiled contentedly, as she made the remark.

"Time you should make them. Time you should have some, Lettice."

"Father, what is the use? People don't care for me, and I don't care for them. I am never happy with strangers. There is a sort of mutual repulsion between them and me. I have you and mother, and Violet, and Aunt Jeannie, and the servants, and the dogs, and the flowers, and the books. I have everything I can possibly want or care to have. Why should I wish for anything else?"

"I should like you to have some nice girl-friends of your own age."

"Aunt Jeannie is my one girl-friend, father, and I do not want a second. She is more of a child than I am, in some respects. But I am hindering you. There are three letters which you will want to read, and here is the newspaper, only just arrived. The man forgot to deliver it before, I believe—or had an accident with one copy."

"Thank you, my dear. Ah, one letter I see is from Selina Temple. Singular that I should have written to her yesterday."

"Just about time for her usual half-yearly epistle. She is very regular. However, it is not likely to contain any news of supreme interest. There is nobody at Brentwood whom I care about. Two crossed sheets! O poor father! I am going now to see Aunt Jeannie. Shall I take any message?"

"No, thank you, my dear. Wrap up, for the wind is cold."

Lettice went off with a light step, shutting the door behind her. She opened it again for a moment to say, "Dinner is half-an-hour earlier than usual to-night."

"Ah, yes—the little Violet dines with us, I suppose."

"Her usual birthday treat. And as we could not take her for a ride to-day, on account of the weather, I have promised that we will if it is fine to-morrow."

"Brown Jennie will be in good spirits after three idle days."

"Oh, so much the better. That is what I delight in. Father, you little knew what a treat you were providing when you gave her to me last birthday. My rides before on good old Nellie were another matter altogether, though they were pleasant enough. There is nothing like riding for enjoyment. I sometimes think I should be quite a different creature, without those free, wild gallops to put life into me."

"Happiness does not rest on such matters, my dear," said Mr. Majendie, gently playing with the three letters he had received—two still unopened. "One could learn to do without rides. They are adjuncts, not necessities."

"Very important adjuncts in my eyes," said Lettice. "One could of course learn to do without a good many things—but I don't know about being happy without them. I am afraid I love rather too well my present manner of life. I do not want a single bit of it ever to change."

"A sure proof that yours has not been a melancholy girlhood, my Lettice."

"I hardly know what melancholy means—from experience. How could I, with such a father and such a mother and such a home?"

She was by his side again, and he folded her in his arms for the bestowal of a hearty kiss.

"'Such a daughter' too, I might add, Lettice. But no need to pay compliments. I am afraid the cloudlessness can't be expected to last always; but it is good so far that your early years have been happy. I am glad, my dear——"

And she kissed him once more, and went off, her eyes glistening. Opposite lay the drawing-room, and within sat a lady at a davenport, near one of the windows. She wore a delicate white shawl over her shoulders, and had a frail look.

"Mother, there is a letter from Selina Temple—nothing of importance from that quarter, we may be sure. The other two looked like circulars or bills, I am not sure which. I left father to enjoy them and his paper, as I am going to Aunt Jeannie."

"Tell her I hope she is nursing her cough. Where is Violet?"

Lettice's face broke into silent laughter, as she made a sign towards a corner of the room. For a huge black retriever lay there, with his nose upon his massive paws, and eyes glancing wistfully; and down upon the ground beside him was curled a slender child of about nine or ten, pillowing her little head, all covered with short golden curls, upon his curly body.

"Asleep! She is tired with her romp this morning. I did not know she was here."

"Bruno seems to be a fixture. I meant to take him with me, but it would be a pity to wake Violet."

Bruno understood of course, and his eyes grew more wistful, while his tail gave one little responsive pat upon the floor. Otherwise he did not move. Lettice nodded and smiled, as to a human being, said, "Good old Bruno!" and went off.

Hat and shawl were soon donned, the latter flung in quaintly careless style about her shoulders. Outside the front-door Lettice stood for a minute, looking out upon the princely elms which grew almost too closely round the old country-house, Lettice's home from her birth. She had never known, and did not even wish ever to know another. All her life-interests were centred here.

The trees were changing tint, and a good many yellow-brown leaves lay scattered along the edges of the path. A carriage-drive wound among the elms for a short distance, and after two or three bends a straight avenue of limes led to the principal gate, beside which was a small creeper-grown lodge. Lettice went down the lime-avenue at a quick run, paused a moment at the gate, to exchange some words with the lodge-keeper's little Nancy, and then walked briskly along the rutted high-road which led to the little village. The latter consisted of a group of cottages, with two or three tiny shops and a few outlying farms. Of gentlefolks' dwellings there were none, excepting only the neat Vicarage.

Lettice stopped there, and entered. She passed, without ringing, through lattice porch and narrow passage, straight into the drawing-room.

"Aunt Jeannie!"

"Ah, there she is! I knew she would come. Good-day, my child, and many a right happy return of the same to thee."

"Aunt Jeannie," though in truth no aunt, no relative of the Majendie family, had been for years Lettice's chosen friend and confidante, the only one she possessed out of her immediate home-circle. As she had told her father, she did not care to find a second. Despite disparity of age, the two were well matched. Mrs. Canynge at forty-five was in some respects younger than Lettice at nineteen.

"I could not venture out in this wind, or you would have seen me this morning. My cold has hung about me so long, that I am warned to take care, and it doesn't do to be wilful in such matters, for the sake of others. It was a disappointment to me not to go. Come now, sit down and tell me how you have spent your birthday. But first—this is for you."

Lettice drew aside the silver paper from a small inlaid box of Indian workmanship.

"Thank you—how pretty!" she said, with eyes more eloquent than words.

"From both of us. Well, what else have you had?"

"My father gave me this gold chain—isn't it massive? And the watch is from mother. My old watch has not gone well for a year, but I have made it over now to Violet, and she is enchanted. I had a volume of poems from father too. Violet's present is a silver pen-handle, and there was something from each of the servants—an ivory pencil-case, and a little work-bag, and some flower-vases, and other pretty knick-knacks. It has been as happy a birthday as one could wish, though Fraser did think Miss Majendie ought to have had some letters of congratulation, and my father wishes I had more 'outside' friends."

"How many have you in all?"

"One, only I don't count her 'outside.'"

"And you had no letters?"

"One note—from that same friend."

"And she is——?"

"You. I have no other."

Mrs. Canynge's expression was not one of satisfaction.

"I can't slice up my heart among fifty people," said Lettice. "I care for very few, and very few care for me."

"This country life is undesirable for one of your temperament."

"Aunt Jeannie—please—pray—I entreat you—don't put that notion into my father's head, or he will want to send me off at once on a course of visitings."

"And if he did?"

"I don't want to go. I don't care to go. There is nobody in the world that I have the slightest wish to see—unless it were a distant glimpse of some of the great men of the day. I am perfectly happy. I don't want a single thing that I have not got. Why should I be disturbed?"

Mrs. Canynge sat looking down into Lettice's eyes thoughtfully. She had herself a strongly-marked face, wherein the heavings of a stormy nature had settled into an after-calm. Great peace showed in the sympathetic eyes, and the lips, though changeful in mood as a child's, were habitually restful.

"There are two things needful in one's life," she said. "There ought to be a giving out as well as a taking in."

"I give out love to my own people, and I take it in from them."

"Aye, my dearie, but that's a narrow circle, very narrow. The world doesn't consist of you and your people. There's such a thing as family selfishness, no less than individual selfishness. I would not have you reach womanhood with a heart no bigger than a nutshell. And it only grows by giving. A heart can't be sliced into definite halves and quarters, as you seemed just now to think. It's more of the nature of flame than of solid substance. The more it has to feed on, the larger it grows, but if you shut it up, it fades and wanes."

"Still, I suppose one may be narrow and yet deep, Aunt Jeannie. I am not a lake, I know, open to approach on all sides."

"Then you're unlike One whom we want to resemble. His heart of boundless love is open to approach in every direction. There's no barred gateway or walled-up avenue to the heart of Jesus. And though He had His chosen friends, there was no living man for whom He had not loving interest to spare."

"I don't know that that has struck me so much before," said Lettice soberly, after a pause. "But still, people do differ. We can't be all alike. I think yours is a lake-nature, and I admire it in you—only I cannot be the same. It is not my nature, and it is not the Majendie nature. I am more like a river, flowing between its two banks. My banks are beautiful enough for me."

"The river expands into the lake sometimes. Well, it is a pleasant river," said Mrs. Canynge, touching Lettice's brow with caressing fingers, "a happy sunny sparkling river, not at all disposed to fret and murmur over any little stones and rocks in its way, but rather given to singing and dancing over them. But don't get shut up and cramped in between two high banks, able to get no glimpse of anything beyond."

"I can't change my nature, Aunt Jeannie."

"My dear, God can change it for you. We are of plastic make, not adamant. And you can strengthen or weaken your natural inclinations by a course of indulgence or resistance."

"My father had a letter from Selina Temple just before I came out," said Lettice suddenly.

"Miss Temple. His first cousin, is she not?"

"Yes, our only near relation living. I don't know what she says, and I am afraid I don't much care! Selina Temple is not a person that interests me."

"She ought. She is a human being."

"Do all human beings interest you?"

"Yes—as such." Mrs. Canynge looked a little amused.

"I hope that isn't the kind of interest you take in me, Aunt Jeannie. However, I have not seen this worthy cousin of ours for nine years."

"No need to sneer at her," put in Mrs. Canynge softly. "Sneers are commonly the product of a small mind."

"Or a narrow one? You are determined to take me down, by way of a birthday treat," said Lettice playfully, with unruffled good-humour. "There, I won't sneer. I never do at anyone that I love. As for poor Selina Temple, of course a child of ten is no judge. But I never in all my life was so naughty as during the week she was with us. Her presence seemed to develope temper and obstinacy and perverseness all at once."

"I remember thinking her a quiet inoffensive little person, willing to be friendly."

"Inoffensive, perhaps, but not unoffending. She made me feel all over prickles. I don't believe you know the sensation."

"Of course you don't, because, when the prickles come, I do not always use them upon folks around me."

Lettice laughed, and sat then looking towards the window. Light was fading fast, yet enough remained to show the smile on her lips. There was placid contentment in both faces, but different in kind. For with the one the calm was the produce of temperament and circumstances, a thing of nature. With the other the calm was a reflection from a higher region, altogether beyond temperament or circumstances or nature, and not to be affected by them.

"What a happy life mine has been!" Lettice said presently. "I cannot look back and remember a single real trouble—unless it was our anxiety about Violet last year. But even then she never was so ill as really to alarm us. I should think very few have known such a childhood and girlhood as mine. I wonder if my life is to be always so. I would like it. I never have any craving for stir or excitement. All I want is just to go floating on as I do now—everybody that I love around and near me."

"No, no," said Mrs. Canynge. "It can't be in this world. The river cannot flow on placidly ever the same. You'll come some day to linn, or rapid, or waterfall. Lettice, child, don't make a needs-be for God's hand to touch you heavily in these things you love so well. I don't like the sound of that 'all I want.'"

"It is true."

"Then the truth has danger in it. What if you grow so well content with lower things that you never trouble yourself to see the higher?"

"That is my danger," said Lettice very quietly. "I try to feel as I should, and I have a love for my Bible, and I would not miss going to church on any account. But I have so fully all I want that I do not thirst after God. It is all quiet duty and enjoyment, nothing more."

Mrs. Canynge's face wore a curious expression.

"Well—we're various natures," she said quaintly. "I am not you, and you are not me, and nothing will ever make the one into the other, however much each may be modified and re-moulded. The training such as you need will come to you, sooner or later. We are wise to enjoy our bright times while they last."

"What did you mean just now by 'linn,' Aunt Jeannie?"

Mrs. Canynge looked thoughtfully down into the upturned face.

"I meant—something that came to mind, child. Your talking of yourself as a river brought a certain scene to my recollection."

"A story. Aunt Jeannie, tell me the story. Fancy that I am really a child again for once. I see you have a story written in your eyes. What is it about?"

"It isn't a story, Lettice, at least not exactly. It is only something I once saw, and I'm not likely ever to forget it."

"When? What?" repeated her companion.

"Years ago. I took a journey north to Aberdeenshire, and stayed there awhile, and saw many a beautiful sight. But among them all—and I don't say there were not some grander and fairer—among them all there wasn't one which left a deeper mark on my mind than the sight of the Linn of Dee."

"The Linn! That is the word I was asking you about. I have learnt enough geography to know where the River Dee is," said Lettice playfully. "Am I like the Dee, Aunt Jeannie?"

"If you are, child, you've never been through the Linn yet. I could pray you never might, but our God knows best. I have given up trying to shape life's course for those I love. I'll tell you some day about the Linn, Lettice, but not this afternoon. My throat is warning me not to talk more."

"And the clock is warning me that I must go home," said Lettice, springing up. "But that is a promise. I shall claim its fulfilment before this day week. Good-bye, Aunt Jeannie, and thank you for your present. I must go and show it to my people."

"Always the same song—'I and mine!'" murmured Mrs. Canynge, after her departure. "She is a dear girl,—but it is étroit. I don't like it. I wish I could shake her out of her groove."

And she could not look ahead to see how soon the shake—not from her hand—would come.

Lettice, unaware of her friend's solicitude, sped quickly home. She found Violet waiting in the hall.

"I thought you would be late for dinner," said the child. "There are only ten minutes. But mother has not gone upstairs yet to dress, so you have plenty of time. Mother always takes longer than you."

"Where is mother?"

"In the study. She went in to speak to father half an hour ago, and she has not come out. I can't hear their voices, so perhaps he has given her some letters to read. I tapped once, and they did not answer, and I thought they must be busy."

"We will remind mother of the time," said Lettice. "You are sure they have not gone upstairs."

"Oh no, I have been watching ever since they went in."

Lettice rapped lightly and received no answer. She rapped again and yet again, but with the same result. A sense of fear crept over her. She opened the door two or three inches, and said, "May I come in?" Silence still, but she caught a glimpse of something.

"Violet," she said calmly, "go and tell Fraser to come here at once. I want to speak to him. Then go to my room and wait for me."

"May I not come back with Fraser?"

"No. Make haste, Violet."

The child ran away, and Lettice went straight in, unhesitating. Her lips were blanched, and the ground reeled beneath her, yet she walked steadily.

Mr. Majendie sat in his easy-chair, leaning back, his head drooping forward. The eyes were closed, and the usually ruddy skin was entirely colourless. One hand lay upon the table, loosely clasping an open newspaper.

That was not all. Beside him knelt Mrs. Majendie, resting heavily against him, her white face bowed down upon his knees.

Neither spoke, neither moved, as Lettice came in. A strange and solemn stillness reigned in the little room, and about those two quiet figures.

Lettice did not scream or faint. She stood for two or three seconds, looking, with a dread awe upon her of making any sound. Then Fraser came to the door. He had been close at hand. Lettice turned to meet him, with a smile which he never forgot,—so forced, so full of anguish.

"Something is the matter," she said. "They have both fainted, Fraser. See—how strange. Call help quickly."

Fraser knew better, as regarded one of the two. "Miss Lettice!" he tried to say with parched lips, but a look ordered him to obey; and Lettice knelt down beside her mother.

HORÆ PETRINÆ.

BY THE DEAN OF CHESTER.

SECOND SERIES.—II. THE PRIMACY OF PETER.

IF controversy is forced upon us (and controversy with Romanism is in this day forced upon us with great urgency and in new forms) it is commonly the best policy to assume the aggressive. In some such cases, indeed, prudence may suggest that the best course is merely to maintain defensive positions. But this is only when there is a probability that aggressive measures might involve the risk of failure. Defensive warfare is generally liable to be interpreted as an acknowledgment of weakness.

Now certainly, if in any part of the Roman controversy a bold course is invited by the circumstances of the case, it is in reference to the primacy supposed to be connected with "The Chair of St. Peter." I have said that this inevitable theological war has now assumed a new form. It is essential to observe, in approaching the subject which is at present before us, that what we have to oppose is not an old doctrine, but a new one. What we have to deal with now is not a dignified immutability, but a portentous change. We are in a totally different position from that which was occupied by our fathers in face of the Church of Rome, because she has altogether altered her own attitude. Now, the Pope is not liable to be corrected by the decisions of the Church at large; but whatever he pronounces officially, within the sphere of faith and morals, is infallible and immutable. Bossuet, the great Gallican hero of Romanism against Protestantism, would, if he were to live again and to preach his old doctrine, be one of the worst of heretics. Döllinger, still living amongst us, who for fifty years taught without interruption the superiority of Councils over Popes, is suddenly silenced by authority. Development has now reached its highest point: and it would be waste of time to go back to any earlier point in this development. It would be an anachronism to attempt to prove, however easy the proof may be, that the Church of Rome has never changed: because its change is now admitted and asserted. The whole force of the Roman contention is comprised in the assertion that all doctrinal truth is concentred in the Chair of St. Peter.

Our task, then, in this part of our dealing with the biography, the work, and the influence of the Apostle Peter, is very much simplified. Our business is to inquire how far the claim of an unqualified doctrinal and disciplinary supremacy of Peter in his successors is in harmony with what we read in the New Testament. It would hardly, perhaps, be fair to assume that this principle would be made so conspicuous in the Scriptures as to command immediate assent, for the Ultramontane admits that the assertion of the principle has only gradually reached its present commanding position. But at least we may assume that the New Testament would be found, in this matter, harmonious with itself, that nothing would be read there inconsistent with this high Papal doctrine, still less anything which absolutely contradicts it. Let us, then, rapidly glance at the passages which bear on this subject in its connection with St. Peter, who, according to the theory in question, was the first of the Popes.

Our thoughts here turn immediately, in the first place, to the great passage in St. Matthew's Gospel (Matt. xvi. 18), where Peter's name is mentioned by our Lord in the closest connection with the building of His church upon an immutable rock. Some remarks have already been made on the earlier giving of the name to this disciple (John i. 42), with the suggestion that it may possibly have had some allusive reference to his strength and force of character. Here, in this later passage of Gospel history, it is evident that there is a reference to something deeper. It seems impossible that such language could have its complete fulfilment in the character of one who showed himself very vacillating and inconsistent. Moreover, Christ says on this occasion that Peter had not reached by his own unaided powers the truth of which he had just made so noble a confession: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed this, but My Father which is in heaven." This is hardly the occasion which would have been chosen for a panegyric on natural qualities, which, after all, Peter did not possess without considerable alloy. The truth is, that here we are in contact with one of the great questions of Christendom. In speaking of the foundation-rock on which His church should be built, did the Lord mean Peter himself? And if it was Peter himself, was it Peter personally, or Peter officially? And if Peter, was it Peter once for all, or is there a reference made to a long series of foundation-rocks? Or was the reference rather, as great writers have maintained in early ages, to the faith expressed by Peter, the truth proclaimed by Peter? Is this the living power through which the church is built from age to age? For this view we can quote Jerome: "Upon this rock the Lord founded His church; the foundation laid is our Lord Jesus Christ alone; on this foundation the Church of Christ is built;" and also Chrysostom: "'I say unto thee, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my Church'—that is, upon the faith of his confession;" and likewise Augustine, who says that in his later years he most frequently "thus explained what the Lord said; that it should be understood as upon Him whom Peter confessed; for Christ was the Rock, whom Simon confessing, as the whole Church confesses Him, was called Peter." To this famous passage in St. Matthew's gospel we shall return presently. Meantime the case, as thus stated, constitutes a very serious difficulty for the Church of Rome; for it was a maxim laid down at the Council of Trent that Scripture is to be interpreted "according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers."

Let our eye now range over the general Gospel history, so as to see Peter whenever he is mentioned in a possible connection with this subject. We should expect to find indirect confirmations of this primacy of Peter, if it is a cardinal principle of the Christian Revelation: and certainly we should expect to find nothing that contradicts it. But what do we read immediately after this great promise to Peter? A rebuke addressed to him with unexampled severity for opposing the Saviour's declaration of God's will: "Get thee behind me, Satan; for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men" (Matt. xvi. 23). The power of binding and loosing given to Peter is given equally to the other apostles (Matt. xviii. 18; John xx. 21–23). On one of these occasions, too, St. Peter was absent. It was in answer to a remark made by Peter himself (Matt. xix. 27, 28) that the Lord said that the Twelve Apostles should "sit upon twelve thrones," thus assigning to all of them equal honour and jurisdiction. When the question was asked, "Who is greatest in the kingdom of heaven?" the opportunity was not used for indicating, however slightly, the latent principle of Peter's primacy, but a little child was placed in the midst of the disciples. A similar opportunity was passed by, when the mother of James and John asked for her sons the highest places of state in the coming Kingdom. It has been shrewdly said, as regards this incident, that "on the Roman hypothesis Christ's answer must have been that He had already given the right-hand post to St. Peter, and did not intend to create a left-hand one." On the night before His crucifixion, the Lord did designate His Vicar on earth: but that Vicar was not St. Peter. After the resurrection, when this disciple asked a question concerning the future career of St. John, the answer was, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" Nothing could more clearly demonstrate that St. Peter had no jurisdiction over his brother apostles. In fact, the more closely we examine the Gospel story, and especially those passages in which St. Peter himself is prominent, the more distinctly we perceive that the whole case for the Petrine primacy rests on that memorable conversation at Cæsarea Philippi. If that passage were wanting, not a shred of evidence in this direction would remain.

Let us now turn to the Acts of the Apostles. It might be fairly urged that while the Lord himself was on earth, His Vicar had no office to discharge. But when Christ returned to heaven, the mission of His Church began, without His visible presence; and then, surely, we should expect its true constitution and government to be made known. But what do we find? St. Peter is, indeed, very prominent in the early part of the Book of the Acts; but St. Paul is quite as prominent, and more exclusively prominent, in the later and the larger part. St. Peter was certainly a great preacher at Jerusalem: but so was St. Paul, not only there, but in the cities of the Gentiles. Nor is there any trace of supremacy of the former over the latter in that part where we do see them together on a memorable occasion, when faith and morals are vitally in question. On the contrary, at the Council at Jerusalem (Acts xv.) it is St. Paul's teaching and practice which receive public sanction, and it is St. James who presides and gives the decision. And, to revert to that earlier part of the apostolic history, in which St. Peter is the most prominent figure, let the following points be noted. When a successor is to be appointed to succeed to the place vacated by Judas, St. Peter does not take this first step in Church history by filling up the vacancy. He does not even select among candidates submitted to him: but he joins with the rest in choosing two suitable men, and refers the decision to a power altogether independent of himself (Acts i. 24). When the first great step is taken for the propagation of the gospel among those who were not strictly Jews, St. Peter does not direct the mission to Samaria, but follows where another has begun, and is "sent" in company with John by the general body of the Apostles (Acts viii. 14). When the first great typical conversion is made, through his instrumentality, in the case of Cornelius, Peter peremptorily refuses the honour which his so-called successors have for centuries claimed and received: "Stand up: I myself also am a man" (Acts x. 26). And, what is more important, after St. Peter had acted so decisively at Cæsarea within what was certainly the sphere of faith and morals, the other apostles felt no scruple in blaming Peter (Acts xi. 1–3): nor did he meet this censure by rebuke and assertion, but, on the contrary, proved his case elaborately and patiently by argument, and confirmed it by testimony (verses 4–18). It is evident that when the Acts of the Apostles were written, both St. Peter, and the other apostles, and the writer of the book, were unconscious of that which is now termed the primitive and inalienable "privilege of Peter." Putting aside, for the moment, all abstract objections to the theory of development, it is clear that in this case, as regards the authority of that book, a colossal system has been developed out of nothing Turning now from the Acts of the Apostles to the Apostolic Letters, we may limit ourselves to two of St. Paul's Epistles, and to the two epistles which were written by St. Peter. In fact, no other epistolary writings of the New Testament have any bearing upon the subject. And this silence, too, is a fact worthy of remark. If the supremacy of Peter and his successors, in all questions of religious doctrine and moral discipline, is an essential part of the organism of the Church, we should expect so vital a truth to appear, if not visibly permeating all the Scriptures of the New Testament, yet here and there in its epistolary parts as a recognised and unquestioned principle. No indications of the kind are to be found anywhere. There is a long and most copious epistle addressed to Rome; but from no part of it, if taken alone, should we acquire any knowledge of the very existence of Peter. He is named in only two of St. Paul's letters; and there, as we shall see, he is named in such a way as to make it impossible to believe that his supremacy was then recognised.

In the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we find St. Paul, when beginning to rebuke severely their party divisions under nominal leaders arbitrarily chosen without any sanction, exclaiming indignantly (1 Cor. i. 12): "Every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ," with which passage we should combine another, in the next chapter but one (iii. 21, 22): "Let no man glory in men: for all things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas." Now, as to the party which presumed to call itself by the name of Christ, we find that Sacred Name raised at once to a point of infinite height above all mere human agency: "Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?" This outburst of feeling is of the utmost value as an assertion of the necessity of the atonement, and of the allegiance which is due to Christ alone. But, meanwhile, Peter is left on the same level with Paul or Apollos. There is more in this than appears at first. If the supremacy of St. Peter, in teaching and in government, was a vital truth, St. Paul could not have been ignorant of it, and he could not have dared so to write to the Corinthians as to give to it no recognition. But, in fact, the exclusive adherence to Peter is noted, not as a mark of catholicity, but as a mark of schism.

Soon after the writing of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Galatians: and in that letter St. Peter is, beyond any question, a very prominent figure. It is important to mark carefully in what relation he appears there, to the Church at large, and to St. Paul himself.

In the first place, it is to be observed that St. Peter is named in three very different parts of the epistle. St. Paul says (Gal. i. 18), when giving an account of his own early personal Christian history, that "three years" after his conversion, when his sojourn in Arabia was over, he "went up to make the acquaintance of Peter, and abode with him fifteen days." This was a memorable meeting of the two apostles; and we shall recur to it hereafter, when their relation to one another becomes our special subject. It might be supposed at first sight that this eager desire of Paul to make the acquaintance of Peter was caused by his recognition of Peter's supremacy. But Roman Catholic theologians do not venture to use the passage in this way. In fact, the whole course of the argument in the early part of this epistle contradicts such a supposition. St. Paul is here asserting and proving his absolute independence of all the other apostles.

The next notice of St. Peter in this epistle is coincident historically with that account of the meeting of the Council which has already been adduced from the Acts. All that need be added on this point is that, as regards Paul's independence of Peter, we have in the letter the most absolute confirmation of what we read in the history, and, in fact, that the letter considerably strengthens St. Paul's position. When he went up to Jerusalem he says that he himself "communicated" to the apostles what he had been in the habit of teaching (ii. 2), that, however great the other apostles might be, this made "no matter to him," they "added nothing to him" (ver. 6). James, Cephas, and John (Cephas being not even named first), the recognised "pillars" of the Church, gave to Paul and Barnabas, after all this independence, "the right hands of fellowship" (ver. 9). Nothing, as negative evidence, could go beyond this in proof that the Primacy and Infallibility of Peter were unknown to the earliest church.

But this epistle furnishes positive evidence so strong that the strangest interpretations have been invented to get rid of it. Soon after this meeting of Peter and Paul at Jerusalem they met again at Antioch; and Peter having acted inconsistently with his own principles, in the matter of Gentile converts, Paul "withstood him to the face, because he was self-condemned" (Gal. ii. 11), for this is the true translation of the last phrase of the verse. This is a scene of extraordinary interest; and another place must be found for describing it more particularly. It is enough to say here that, when St. Paul saw that those who had been misled by St. Peter were "not walking uprightly according to the truth of the gospel," he expostulated with him "before them all" (ver. 14), and argued with him the question on principle (ver. 16). Nor was this followed by any Papal rebuke or excommunication; but, on the contrary, we find Peter in his second letter (2 Pet. iii. 15) speaking of his "beloved brother Paul" with the utmost affection and respect.

We are thus brought from the Epistles of St. Paul to those of St. Peter. It is enough on this occasion to quote two passages from them. The first carries us back to that memorable interview, recorded by St. Matthew, with which we began. We find St. Peter writing thus: "To whom" (i. e. to Christ) "coming, as to a living stone, ye also, as living stones, are being built up a spiritual house: behold, I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on Him shall not be confounded: unto you that believe He is precious." We cannot rightly dissever what we read here in the epistle from what we read there in the gospel. It is surely impossible to believe that Peter wrote this in forgetfulness of what his Lord had said; more especially when we find him using the same image in a speech recorded in the Acts of the Apostles (iv. 11). And it must surely be important to see in what form, and with what kind of conviction and feeling, the Lord's language had laid hold of his mind. If we could interrogate Peter himself, does it not seem as though he would give the same explanation as Chrysostom, Jerome and Augustine? He appears to be quite unconscious of what is technically termed the "Privilege of Peter." He uses words which seem to exclude it. And it would be no true humility to conceal his credentials, and to be silent concerning a commission to be the spiritual ruler of the world.

And there is another passage in this epistle, where he speaks directly as a pastor, and which could hardly have been written without a vivid recollection of the conversation which took place in the interval between the Resurrection and Ascension, and the commission to feed the lambs and the sheep of Christ. "I, who also am an elder, exhort you who are elders, feed the flock of God," not as being "lords over God's heritage," but being "ensamples of the flock; and when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." We see in what relation St. Peter viewed himself as standing to the great Shepherd above him, to his co-presbyters and to the Church at large. Nothing could be more simple, more lowly, more affectionate. No contrast in literature is more striking than the difference between the style of St. Peter's own Epistles, and that in which his so-called successors have often written. Here is no trace of any consciousness of a Divine grant of supreme jurisdiction. If the plenitude of teaching and of ruling were vested in St. Peter and his successors, we should surely find the assertion of it here. But we do not find it here. Nor did the early commentators find it in the words spoken by Christ to Peter concerning the feeding of His lambs and His sheep. They claim for all the apostles what is there assigned to Peter. What is special in him is that he had fallen and was restored. As St. Augustine finely expresses it: "Be not sad, apostle; answer once, answer twice, answer thrice: let confession conquer thrice in love, as presumption was conquered thrice in fear: that must be thrice loosed which thou hast thrice bound."

Let us, finally, put this argument to a simple test. Let us imagine that we had read in the New Testament that St. Peter had been mastered by an irresistible conviction that it was his duty to go to Rome; that he had persevered in the design till he accomplished it; that previously he had addressed to the Roman Christians the longest and most elaborate exposition of Christian doctrine which we possess in the Sacred Volume; that when at Rome he had from this place, as from a great centre, addressed authoritative epistles to other churches; that he had represented himself as weighed down with "the care of all the churches;" that he had exercised excommunication; that he had asserted his authority and "magnified his office" in the strongest language; that he had sent his legates, with full power to act for him; that he had given peremptory commands regarding social duties and public worship; that he, and he only, had written pastoral letters respecting the duties of the Clergy—if these things had been read in the New Testament concerning St. Peter, what would the effect have been on the whole course of religious controversy? And these things, and other things such as these, are written in the New Testament; but they are written concerning St. Paul, not concerning St. Peter.

The Bridge.

I STOOD on the bridge at midnight,
As the clocks were striking the hour,
And the moon rose o'er the city,
Behind the dark church tower.

I saw her bright reflection
In the waters under me,
Like a golden goblet falling
And sinking into the sea.

* * *

And like those waters rushing
Among the wooden piers,
A flood of thoughts came o'er me
That filled my eyes with tears.

How often, oh, how often,
In the days that had gone by,
I had stood on the bridge at midnight,
And gazed on that wave and sky!

How often, oh, how often,
I had wished that the ebbing tide
Would bear me away on its bosom
O'er the ocean wild and wide.

For my heart was hot and restless,
And my life was full of care,
And the burden laid upon me
Seemed greater than I could bear.

* * *

And I think how many thousands
Of care-encumbered men,
Each bearing his burden of sorrow,
Have crossed the bridge since then.

* * *

And for ever, and for ever,
As long as the river flows,
As long as the heart has passions,
As long as life has woes;

The moon and its broken reflection,
And its shadows shall appear,
As the symbol of love in heaven,
And its wavering image here.

LONGFELLOW.

THE BRIDGE.

PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF A TRAMP.

AS TOLD BY HIMSELF.

I HAD known him for years, but always as a decent working-man, a man who honestly paid his way, and one who was ever ready to do a kindness for a mate. I knew, for he had told me so much, that he had been lower down in the social scale than he was now, and I also was aware, for I had met some of his relatives, that he was a member of a respectable family. Suddenly, one evening, as we sat talking by the fire, he asked me if I should like to hear something of his life when he was a tramp.

"A tramp!" I exclaimed, looking at the respectable man before me—"you a tramp, John!"

"Yes—or a 'mumper'—a beggar, that is. I've never told anyone, but I should like to tell you. I feel safe enough from it now. When I was nearer to it in time, you see I could not bear to think of it or to tell anyone."

"I suppose you felt as though possibly you might slip back into it."

"No; I had had enough of it, but I was frightened and ashamed of anyone knowing."

"Well, tell me it now."

And this was the account John Thornton gave of himself:

You know my father and mother died whilst I was still a little child, and that my uncle adopted me. As a boy I was constantly ill, and my education in consequence was much broken. At the age of fourteen I left school and was permitted to idle about at home. My uncle was an indulgent and rather indolent man, and whenever he proposed placing me in any business I always made an excuse why I should not go. And he, I suppose, to save himself trouble and also because he had many sons of his own to provide for, used to accept my excuses and objections. All I wanted was to be allowed to idle about, and I got my own way until I was eighteen years of age. Then my uncle seemed to wake up and see, what my aunt had seen long enough, that if ever I was to have the power of earning my own living I must be put in the way of doing it at once. So they gave me to understand that choose I must, and quickly, some useful occupation. So I chose right off to go to sea. I thought it would be grand to see foreign parts, and I never guessed that a sailor's life was about the hardest a lad could choose; I thought it would be all pleasure. Well, my good uncle and aunt provided me with a capital outfit, and one fine spring morning my uncle went down with me to the London Docks. The merchant-ship I was apprenticed to was named the Blenheim, an old wooden man-of-war with three decks. She looked very pretty as she lay ready to sail, her paint so bright and clean, and her new canvas reflected in the water as well as the fleecy clouds. I sometimes think I can see her still if I shut my eyes. It was the beginning of my new life, and I thought there could not be a finer ship. But my heart sank down into my shoes, and I almost wished myself back again when my uncle said good-bye. He had been a father to me ever since I could remember, and when he told me to be a good lad, never to forget my prayers, or to give way to drink, and then gave me a farewell hand-shake and disappeared over the side of the ship, I could not help two or three tears coming, much as I was ashamed of them.

I had read a great deal about bounding billows, and thought sailing was only next to horse-racing for speed, but I very soon found out I was mistaken. A good spell of fine weather kept the Blenheim bobbing up and down in the Channel for three days, and then, all the way to the Cape steady and rather slow sailing was all we got. Many a time I used to feel vexed enough, as I watched the sails flap in and out, and wished a good breeze would fill them, and the decks too felt hot to our bare feet as we walked over them. But it was real pretty down in those Southern seas at night; lots of bright stars came out overhead, and I used to wish the folks at home could have seen them. And there was always a pleasant cool wind at night. But if I wished sometimes for my aunt and cousins, I was oftener glad they were not there and did not know what my shipmates were like.

Seventeen men slept in the forecastle besides myself; I was the "boy."

The first night I was on board I knelt down to say my prayers as I had always been used to do, when I was a little kid by my aunt's knee, and through all the later years by my bedside; but I was speedily disturbed by a man called Solomon Self. He shouted out with an oath,

"What are you doing there, young un? We don't want any old women aboard ship."

So I gave over then, but I could not feel easy, and again the next morning I knelt down. But a general row began directly. Two or three of my nearest mates seized hold of me and rolled me over and over, threatening to give me a good ducking if ever they saw me at it again—while all the others roared with laughing.

From that time forward I ceased to pray. At first it made me miserable, but the feeling soon wore off, and then it was easy to learn to swear. After that I tried to forget all I had learnt at home of that sort, but I could not quite do it, for when, in the Sunday service on the poop deck, where I had to stand in clean duds with my shipmates to listen, our captain read out of the Prayer-book words I'd heard so often before, or when in turning over the things in my chest, I came on the Bible my aunt had put there for me to read, I did not like it at all. However, I got to care less and less as time went on.

As we neared the Cape, the weather became colder, and the seas more angry. One Sunday the scullery boy was ill, and I had to take his place. I heard a confused noise in the forecastle, oaths, stamping of feet, and presently the sound of blows; then I ran out to see what was the matter, and there were a whole lot of the sailors fighting, and tumbling, and swaying all in a heap about deck. It turned out that some of them had got down into the hold and stolen a case of whiskey.

Just as I got to where they were, I heard some steady steps behind me, and turned round, and there were the captain and steward.

"My lads," said the captain, "how is this? Where did you get the liquor?"

Solomon Self, with his usual oath, replied,

"We brought it from home, and as it's a fine Sunday, thought we'd have a drop."

"Go to your work, lads."

"We want no work. She's going right enough. We don't mind where she's going, if she's plenty of sea room to knock about in. We won't go."

Some of them laughed, some shouted, and then began a riot. Some men stood looking on, some laughing, jeering and encouraging the ringleaders, who were struggling with three or four of the officers and the steward, but at length the officers got the master of them, and they got six of the men secured, and put them in irons, and then the rest of them fell asleep as they lay about the deck.

I was awfully frightened, and went back to my work, feeling very queer. I remember right well that night, there was a fresh breeze, and as I lay in my hammock, I thought suppose it increased to a storm, now that the sailors were all stupid and good for nothing! I could not sleep and kept tumbling about. Presently I saw German Hans, a young smart fellow, but now stupid and feverish, sit up in his bunk on the opposite side of the forecastle to where I lay.

The large ports were open, and as I watched Hans sit staring there, he stretched himself and yawned, and then heavily rolled over—and out. I heard a sullen splash, a faint smothered cry, and then no more. I sprang down on to the floor, and shouted as hard as I could, "Man overboard!" But it was too late. Poor Hans! He had an old mother in Rotterdam, but he would never carry her any more of his wages.

Two days afterwards a storm came on, the mizzen-mast went and three inches of snow lay on the deck, but the good ship weathered through it, and a few weeks afterwards we anchored in Madras harbour.

When we had done there, we went on to Calcutta, and were caught in a monsoon on the way It began all of a sudden, one Sunday while we were hearing the service, and by Tuesday, mast, boats, everything, were swept off the decks, and the Blenheim was a wreck. It lasted four days, and calmed down as suddenly as it began. But though the danger was over, we had been driven far out of our course, and what with that and the state of the ship, we were three weeks behind time, and they had given us up for lost at Calcutta. We were towed up the Hooghly by a steam-tug.

I shall not forget the next day soon, for it was the first time I had ever been drunk. It was a very hot day, and some of us went into a drink-shop ashore, and one of my mates persuaded me to have some rum and whiskey mixed; it soon knocked me over.

They hauled me on board, and I lay on deck all night. The captain scolded me next day, but said as it was the first time he would look over it. But if it was the first, it was not the last. There are plenty of low publics kept there by both English and Yankees, and I soon was always going to them.

Soon after this the ship was condemned, therefore we were all paid off. The captain saw I went to the Sailors' Home, but I did not stay there, though the company that our ship belonged to kept us while we were there. I spent often six or seven pounds in a week in drink and spreeing of all sorts. I remained in Calcutta about three months, and then having nothing left shipped in a German vessel.

I was the only Englishman on board, so the others put on me and I got double work to do. After touching at Ostend, the vessel came on to London; there I sold all my clothes, and my box for 1*l.*; they had cost my uncle 10*l.* before we started. I drank this pound, and when it was gone I went home and told my uncle I had lost my box at Ostend, and he wrote to the custom-house about it and kept wondering no trace could be found of it. At first I felt a bit ashamed when I saw how thoroughly the old gentleman believed me, but after a time I only laughed to myself when I heard him go on about it. I remained at home four months, and then shipped in the Lightning of London. My uncle bought me another outfit, and told me "not to be so careless again." I felt very ashamed when he said that, and nearly told him the truth, but some one came close to us, so I held my tongue.

I was the youngest hand on board the Lightning, and got knocked about a good bit. We were still lying in the Downs when we were run into by another ship, and we had to put into Dover harbour for repairs. Another vessel lay alongside ours. So, determined as I was to get away from the Lightning, not liking my treatment, and expecting it would grow worse and not better when we got out into the high seas, that I took my clothes one by one, and sold them singly till I got them all sold, then I waited till it was quite dark, slipped into the water, and swam ashore. I spent the night at a public-house, and next morning, early, set off and walked to Canterbury. I had sold all my things for only 2*l.*, and even that I wasted. I went to a public-house there, and lived on it. I remember a man advised me to buy a basket and hawk things, but I would not work at anything. Presently, all my money was gone. Then I pulled off my jacket and sold that. I drank all I got for it, and then walked back to London. I did not like to stay there, fearing every gentleman I saw might be my uncle, so I walked away to Faversham.

For two days now I had had nothing to eat. I saw a woman come out of a small farm-house; she carried a pan of smoking hot small potatoes, or "chats" as they are called. I went up to her and said, "Please, missus, will you give me a few of those; I am very hungry." "No," she answered; "I want them for the pigs."

I laid down that night in a hay-stack, and next morning started begging, or "mumping." This is how I began. I went to a cottage and asked for something to eat. I told my first mumping tale true enough; when I said I was nearly starving I expect I looked it too, for they gave me some bread and meat—it did taste nice! That night I went to Woolwich and put up at a padding-ken, where I met regular professional mumpers. They were a queer lot, and at first used to astonish me a good deal, but I soon got used to all the dodges. Often tramps would come in lame, and directly they got in, would put sticks and crutches away in a corner, and many a time I've seen a woman, a cripple from rheumatic fever, or a man that had his leg off at the knee, dancing till morning, with as active legs as any of us. There used to be songs as well as dancing sometimes. The padding-kens were mostly dirty, but tramps don't mind that, and it was very convenient to use them, because you met with others who would tell you the news of the road. They would say: "There are so many 'good cribs' on such a road; so-and-so's a good spot for sixpences; so-and-so for chuck (i.e., bread) and meat," then another would say, "Oh, I don't want that, I want money," or "Don't go to ——, he'll have a bobby to yer." "A pal's made —— hot with prigging covvas off the clothes-line."

I noticed that Irish mumpers generally had children, and very good hands the children were at making up and telling lies; it seemed second nature to them; quite babies could do it, and looked so pitiful all the time they often got most given. Well, the father and mother sent them out to beg with "scran" or food bags, and when they came in at night, they would empty these bags, and after giving the little ones some bits, the parents would sell the chuck, and get drunk with the money.

Some of the mumpers pretended to be sailors, some were blown-up colliers, and made up their wounds and scars in a morning before they went out; some strapped an arm across their bodies, and then went out with an empty jacket-sleeve and told how "they had lost it." A good beggar would get a good deal in the course of the day. I have often heard it said at night, "I've only had hold of five shillings to-day; I must look out better to-morrow." We used to content ourselves with two good meals a day. We had for breakfast generally beefsteak, mutton-chops, ham and eggs with tea or coffee, in which I always took "French cream" (i.e., rum). At about eight in the evening we had supper; it was the same kind of meal as breakfast, only after it we "got a good skin full," that is, got more or less drunk upon beer or spirits. We paid from threepence to sixpence per night for our bed and the use of the fire.

I soon became an adept at begging; sometimes I got hold of as much as ten shillings a day. I found one very favourable time was to beg from people as they came out of church on Sundays; if it was wet and cold I have got two shillings in a quarter of an hour. I "cadged," which is another name for begged, about Woolwich some time, till one day a policeman caught me with my pockets full of "scran"—he made me show him too what I had in my bag—and then he said, "You've been here long enough, young man."

I was very glad to "slope," for I never had been in prison, and did not at all desire to try the life inside one. At Loughborough I took up a new character, I bought a tall hat, good clothes, paper front and cuffs which made me look clean and respectable, though underneath my shirt was filthy. Here I very successfully worked the discharged clerk. It is the habit of beggars to frequently change their characters, that they may not be recognised, and often at night in the padding-kens complete "get-ups" are sold or exchanged. After mumping about Woolwich, Blackheath, Lewisham and the neighbourhood, till, in spite of different disguises, the police began to recognise me, I tramped off through London. I did not beg there because I was afraid of meeting some one who might know me.

I went quite twenty miles out of the way to miss my uncle's house, for he lived in a then not over-built suburb. At length I arrived at Hatchin.

At the ken that night I heard of Squire Lucas, and was advised to call upon him. I did so, and found the steward lived in the hall, and the squire in a small farm-house, or rather in a barn in the yard. The barn window-holes were fastened across with strips of wood. I peeped in at him; he was horribly dirty, and clothed in a piece of sacking only. His hair hung in clotted masses, all shaggy. He came to the window and asked me if I was a Protestant or Roman Catholic. I was obliged to say Protestant, and he pushed a penny through to me. If I had said Roman Catholic, he would have given me threepence, but he would have made me say the "Hail, Mary" first, and I did not know it.

Soon after that I was again in Loughborough. I arrived rather late at night, and it was raining. I thought before I turned in, as it was such a disagreeable evening, I might do a little business. I therefore sat down in front of a respectable house which stood back a bit from the road, and tried to cry. I could do it pretty well, and presently some tears came. A clergyman came out of the house and up to me. I told him a good yarn: my wife was suddenly taken ill, I had five little children, and so on. He said, "Come in, my poor fellow, at all events; I will give you what I can." He took me into a clean kitchen and gave me a half-quartern loaf, two pounds of cheese and one shilling towards the lodgings for my family. I left his house cheered. My tears quickly dried, and I spent the shilling in beer to wash down the bread and cheese. If I could see that good clergyman I would humbly beg his pardon, and assure him that the tramp who so shamefully cheated him and imposed on his kindness that night is a different man now and thoroughly ashamed of his old self. At the time I gloried in having so easily "done him," and remember strongly recommending this clergyman to the attention of some other mumpers I crossed the next morning. I begged over most of the south, especially around London, for a long time—a dreary and shameful time it now seems to me. But at length my life as a cadger was to end as abruptly as it commenced.

It was a bright summer's day, when one Monday morning, slouching along a country road, I saw some clean men working on a new railroad. They looked so healthy and nice. I thought: "What a much better way theirs is than mine to get a living; they can look anyone in the face."

I felt ashamed of being a beggar. I could not get rid of the thought. All day long I seemed to see those men, and the more I studied on it the more ashamed I got. During that week I heard there was like work going on at Chesterfield, and set off to walk there. The following Sunday my boots were worn through. Then I walked fourteen miles without them, but I had set my mind on going on; my feet now were cut and sore, bleeding as I went. At last, towards evening I reached a roadside public-house. There were some colliers and labourers drinking on a bench outside. They called me to them and gathered me four-and sixpence, and they gave me so much beer that I was soon as drunk as any of them. The landlord, who was also drunk, brought me an enormous lump of bread and fat bacon, enough for three men, and because I could not eat it all, said I was an impostor. Presently he turned us all out. The rest went home and I slept out in the rain under a wall. Next morning, in an old pair of collier's clogs which one of them had given me, I tramped to Chesterfield. I did not venture to offer myself dirty as I was, on the works, so I took off my shirt, washed it in a brook and laid it out in the sun to dry. While I waited a gentleman came along.

"What are you doing lying there, my man?"

"I am waiting for my shirt to dry. I've been out of work a long time" (which was true enough); "I have only one shirt, and cannot bear to be dirty."

I said this coolly, though I well knew how filthy I was from sleeping in the padding-kens. The gentleman gave me a shilling.

I stopped not at a ken, but a poor lodging-house, bought a penny-worth of white rags, wrapped my feet in them, blackened my clogs to look decent, and went to the railway works, and told the manager I had just come out of the hospital. He gave me some stone-breaking. Nothing could have been harder, as my hands were soft with long disuse, but I stuck to it. My hands bled so much with the strain, that sometimes the handle of the hammer was red with it, but I was determined to persevere. And that was the beginning of a better life.

After a time, I got into a clean lodge, and got some decent working-clothes. I never begged again, but my life for a long time was about as bad as it could be. I was a navvy for years, a wanderer about the country, uncared for and shunned, and I don't wonder. Then God found me. I got to a spot where there was a little church, a night-school and reading-room, and a Sunday Bible-class, all for us chaps. I saw a lot of my mates go, and I was asked to join them. I hardly liked to do it, but I had given my word. So I went to the Bible-class that Sunday, and never missed again when I had made the start. It was the opening into a new life. I don't mean I got all straight at once; it took me years fairly to master the drink, but God is stronger than the devil, and I've changed masters now, and I am sure "He will never leave me, nor forsake me." I'd rather die any day, than be back in that bad life, and He knows it.

* * * *

As John Thornton rose to go I heard the echo of the old Bible words, "Godliness hath the promise of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come."

Sabbath Thoughts.

ALL THINGS MADE NEW.

"He that sat upon the throne said, Behold I make all things new."—Rev. xxi. 5.

NEW heavens, new earth, a new song, a new name—all these are included in this promise, but it is a glorious hope to those only to whom the Lord has given a new heart and a new spirit. The old sinful heart, the unrenewed nature, does not long for the day when all shall be renewed according to the mind and will of the Holy One. To such a heart this poor old sin-stained world is better as it is! Far from perfect it confessedly is; much has to be done to reform it; but to "make all things new," is rather a threat than a promise. That "holiness, without which no man shall see God," is not desired by the natural heart of man, nay, it is more or less dreaded.

To those, however, who have fled to Christ and laid upon Him the burden of their sins, and taken up His yoke and His burden, the hope of perfect renewal after His image, and the prospect of a state in which all things will be thus renewed, is unspeakably dear. The weight of sin within us and around us, would be unbearable without such a hope. The thought of the numbers who live at a distance from God, would be crushing could we not lay the load upon Him. He knows how to make all things new, and He has said that He will do it. Let us be assured that He will fulfil His word. It is impossible for us to see how His gracious will in this respect is to be accomplished; but it is not impossible for us to say, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief!" The worst of all sins against Him is unbelief; let us pray continually, "Lord, strengthen our faith; strengthen within us the new nature; and may we rejoice in the thought that Thou art working even now, by Thy Word and Thy Spirit, to make all things new."

"Thy nature, Lord, to me impart,
Come quickly from above;
Write Thy new name upon my heart,
Thy new, best name of love!"

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

APRIL 10.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN. LUKE x. 25-37.

GOLDEN TEXT, LEV. XIX. 18.—Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'

CONNECTION.—This parable is without express note of time or place, but it probably belongs to the series of incidents and discourses connected with our Lord's visit to Jerusalem for the Feast of Tabernacles. See Introduction to Lesson for April 3. The Mission of the Seventy to Peræa, to prepare the way for our Lord's ministry in that district, is recorded just before, and His visit to Bethany just after. Robinson places the parable immediately after the discourses at the Feast, John vii., viii.

I. A QUESTION CONCERNING SALVATION, AND CHRIST'S ANSWER.—A certain lawyer; expositor or professor of the Mosaic law. Tempting Him; not in any evil sense, but wishing to test the opinion, perhaps the knowledge, of the great Galilean Teacher. The same question was asked by another with a serious practical aim (ch. xviii. 18). Such test-questions were common. Compare Matt. xxii. 26; answered in the same way. But there Christ gives the reply; here the answer is challenged from the questioner. How readest thou? That is, It is your business to know and teach this very thing. The answer was probably the regularly accepted one: the first part of it (Deut. vi. 5) was the summary of the Law which was read in Jewish households, morning and evening; the latter part (from Lev. xix. 18, our Golden Text) was appended to it by the most famous teachers of the time, as Hillel. How is God to be loved? The fourfold description of our nature, as devoted entirely to Him. The heart, as the source of all, the centre, so to speak, of our spiritual being; 'from which the rays of the moral life go forth in their three chief directions:'* the soul, emotional, the strength, practical, the mind, intellectual. How, again, is our neighbour to be loved? The test is the simplest conceivable, yet the greatest. Another's self and our own, upon the same level! Here truly we find the second commandment 'like unto the first' (Matt. xxii. 39), as it is only when we apprehend our same relation to the one Father, that we can thus place ourselves and others on an equality in love.

Does our Lord accept the lawyer's reply, only as announcing a great impossibility, serving to discover human weakness? This you cannot do? Not quite so, in the first instance. His reply is literally true to the spirit of both Law and Gospel. LOVE is LIFE. Love God thus, your neighbour thus, and thou shalt live. Observe how Christ unexpectedly turns the question into a personal one. The lawyer proposed a problem, his what shall I do? breathing no anxious concern (as in Acts xvi. 30); simply using himself as an illustration. But Jesus drives the appeal home, awakening the conviction, I do not thus love! That is, 'I do not thus love my neighbour,' for he has nothing to say to the 'first commandment.' There, as a Jew, probably a Pharisee, an accredited teacher of the people, he thinks himself all right! But this 'second' command arouses some uneasy reflection. He needs to justify himself, even without being accused except by his own conscience! And so he takes refuge in the ambiguity of the law. 'I would obey, if I knew how.' Who is my neighbour? The rabbis had certain rules upon this point: thus, 'Not a Gentile, not a publican, not a Samaritan.' But there was an instinct in this lawyer's breast telling him that such distinctions would not do. Uneasily he looks to the Great Teacher for a reply. Then Jesus tells the story which has answered the question for all time.

II. THE PARABLE. Read vers. 29–35.—The vivid truthfulness of every detail in the narrative, like the finish of an exquisite picture, has often been noticed. To this day, the traveller descends the steep rocky bridle-path from Jerusalem to Jericho, about 21 miles, a fall of 3,000 feet,† only attempting the journey when protected by a strong escort from the Bedouin robbers who haunt the overhanging limestone caves, or lurk behind the crags. The tale has been literally true of many a solitary wayfarer in our own day; they stripped and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead, to perish beneath the burning Eastern sun, should no timely help arrive. By chance—by coincidence—it so happened that—on that day three other travellers were respectively wending their way along the defile. The priest had doubtless been engaged for his week in the services of the Temple, and was returning home to the priestly city of Jericho.‡ Had he learned no lessons of charity in the sanctuary? He might have there read in the Law that if his brother's ox or ass had fallen down by the way he was bound to give a helping hand (Exod. xxiii. 5; Deut. xxii. 4): but here was a brother man! To pass by on the other side was to ignore the sufferer altogether—plainly from selfish motives, whether indifference, or fear of consequences, or dislike of trouble. Some are 'so sensitive' that they cannot look on pain, and therefore offer no help. Others coldly say, 'It is not my business.' Many reasons might offer themselves for the refusal of help, but the true reason is hardness of heart. The Levite represents a somewhat different class. He came and looked—his was calculating selfishness, as that of the other was instinctive. 'Why should I help? My spiritual superior has left the man alone; why should not I? It will be a disagreeable business—will cost some money and time. Poor fellow! I shall have to leave him!' There are those who would do good if it were not too much trouble, and if it cost them nothing; as it is, selfishness wins the day; and they too pass by on the other side.

It was not without a reason that these types of character are taken from the class that the 'lawyer' would hold in respect: and the utmost possible contrast follows. A certain Samaritan—a stranger—an enemy, who had come down from worshipping in a different Temple—one of a class whose churlish unkindness Jesus had so recently experienced (ch. ix. 53), nay, whose name of scorn had been applied to Himself (John viii. 48). Compassion conquers prejudice, bigotry, fear; makes the Samaritan patient, helpful, generous, self-denying. He delays his journey—produces from his store the costliest remedies (wine to cleanse the wounds, oil to soothe their smart), gives up his time, which to a busy man is often a greater sacrifice, dismounts that the beast of burden—the ass—may carry him, and stays the night to care for him at the inn—perhaps at Bahurim on the road—until the crisis of danger is past. (Note: the inn was not like that at Bethlehem, a caravanserai, where travellers took care of themselves; it was a house in the care of a host, Roman-fashion, like our modern inns). Nor was the Samaritan content with this. He had charged himself with the care of this poor man, and provided means for his maintenance awhile, with promise of more. The two pence (denarii) representing two days' wages of a labouring man) would probably suffice until the Samaritan should come again that way, having finished his errand at Jericho. So our Lord dwells not only on the tenderness and readiness, but on the completeness of this act of compassion.

III. THE APPLICATION. Read vers. 36, 37. The Lesson here seems a little different from that which we should expect. The lawyer had asked virtually, Who is the neighbour whom I am to help? Christ's answer is by describing the deed of the neighbour who helped. In truth the relation is mutual; the Samaritan acting a neighbour's part; as though he said to himself, 'This wounded Jew is my neighbour.' And, plainly, if the Samaritan owns the Jew, the Jew must own the Samaritan. This the lawyer acknowledges, though he cannot bring himself to say, 'The Samaritan'; only, He that shewed mercy on him. The great lesson in the word likewise is that no differences of nation, creed, or circumstance should be suffered to stay the helping hand. Our neighbour is any and every one who comes across our path, and to whom we can show a kindness. The opportunity creates the obligation.

> Are there no deeper truths inculcated than the simple duty of neighbourly kindness and help? The question is best answered by remembering that the great type of human brotherhood and love is in Him who took upon Himself our nature that He might unite all men in one bond of love. It is for Christ's sake, pre-eminently, that we own this 'neighbourly' tie. In pursuance of this thought the simple narrative has often been employed as a parable of redemption; an application to which its details lend themselves in a remarkable way, although it is by way of illustration rather than of interpretation. The descent from Jerusalem, the city of God, to Jericho, the doomed city (Josh. vi. 17), suggests the Fall; the robbers and their cruel work illustrate the powers of sin and temptation as they beset humanity, and leave it more than half dead. To no purpose do Priest and Levite pass by, sacrifice and ceremony cannot restore; and human nature still lies prostrate and bleeding until He who was 'despised and rejected of men' passes by, and tenderly raises and gently soothes, providing in His Church the means of grace, and promising to perfect His work when He comes again. Such use of the parable, if kept within due bounds and not mistaken for doctrine, will be useful; otherwise it degenerates into mysticism, prompts unwarrantable interpretations, * Godet. The O. T. passage has heart, soul and might; heart being rendered in the LXX. by the word here used for mind. Our Lord in Matt. xxii. 37, has heart, soul, and mind, in Mark xii. 30, heart, soul, mind and strength (might).

† Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 424. Farrar says 15 miles.

‡ Josephus says that in his time there were in Jericho 12,000 priests.

and takes off the attention from the practical, moral teaching of the parable, Go and do thou likewise.

QUESTIONS.

1. How did Christ elsewhere answer the same question as that of the lawyer? How did the Apostle Paul answer a similar one? Show that the answers agree.

2. "Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy" (Matt. v. 43). Does this maxim represent the spirit of the ancient Law?

3. Which parables of our Lord are peculiar to St. Luke? Name any special characteristics which they possess.

4. "Go and do thou likewise." What bearing had this command upon the lawyer's first question?

A SHAWL FOR MOTHER.

I.

NOT August had given place to the last week in September. There had been a good deal of wind and rain lately, and some of the trees were already almost bare. But the last few days had been very fine, clear, bright, and dry; and the woods were becoming glorious in clothing of gold and crimson.

The Anderson children had put up a petition that the utmost advantage might be taken of the beautiful weather, and accordingly on the Wednesday half-holiday the party was assembled at a very early dinner to give time for the proposed afternoon's expedition. While they were still at dinner a servant came into the room:

"Please, ma'am, little Steadman has come to ask if you have any work for him?"

Mrs. Anderson was in a hurry, and she was busy carving. She answered quickly, "No, no, Jane. He must not get troublesome. Tell him there is nothing for him to do here to-day, and most likely there will not be for some time to come."

And then she went on with her dinner, for she was in haste to set out with the three elder children for the long walk through Chesnut Wood, whence they meant to climb Redstone Hill, and come home along the cliffs.

"A most splendiferous plan!" said Gerty.

"Yes," said Harry, "and you can't think what a heap of cakes and apples I saw mamma putting into her bag. They'll taste ever so delicious on the top of Redstone Hill!"

"Will they indeed?" laughed Mrs. Anderson, who had just come up unperceived. "How do you know that my bag is going with us? But this is certain, if you are not quick in getting those boots of yours done up, neither we nor the apples and cakes will get to the top of the hill to-day. Where is your button-hook?"

"I—I—don't know."

"Oh! dear, dear, my sad little untidy boy," said the mother gently, as she knelt down and did up the stiff buttons herself.

"I will look for it, and look for it, and look for it, when we come back, till I find it," whispered Harry penitently, and then he got his hat, and the happy party set off, although they were indeed not destined to get to the top of the hill that day.

Chesnut Wood was an especial favourite with the children on account of the many squirrels which had their dwellings there, and Gerty and Harry had no sooner reached the edge of the deep tree shadows than they hushed their voices, and slackened their hasty steps. Their more sedate sister, with her mamma, soon came up with them, and then the whole four penetrated into the depths of the wood, and in silence walked on, looking hither and thither for their bushy-tailed little favourites.

At last Harry spied one springing from branch to branch of a tree before them, whilst in the same tree sat another, cracking away at the hard shell of a nut, with its sharp brown teeth, in a most business-like manner. Harry pressed Gerty's arm to enjoin silence, and signed to his mamma and Sylvia.

They all stood still and watched the pretty spectacle. There was nothing to be heard but the soft rustle of the swaying branches and crisp withered leaves. The squirrels were too well accustomed to that sound to be frightened by it. No doubt they considered it a pretty musical accompaniment to their feast and play.

But all of a sudden both they and their human watchers were alike startled by something very different breaking through the stillness. The squirrels scuttled away in double-quick time, whatever that may be, and the children looked at each other and whispered, "Who is that?"

Just as the nut-eating squirrel had finished its meal, and was beginning to wash its face in the most graceful manner possible, a voice had been heard close at hand, saying aloud with rather a sorrowful tone:

"Oh, dear, I want thirty-nine more twopences before I'll have enough. How shall I ever get them all?"

Those were the words that had made the timid little squirrels scuttle away as if they had heard a gun go off, and had even startled the children by their unexpectedness.

Very quickly, however, Gerty gathered back her courage, and ran forward to see who was the "tiresome thing" who had frightened away the squirrels. Mrs. Anderson and the others followed her. And in the midst of a little clearing, where three worn-out old forest giants had been cut down, they came upon Neddy Steadman.

The little lame boy was seated on one of the tree stumps. On a second, about a yard or so before him to the right, were arranged a number of pennies in a circle. On the third stump to the left, was a very large circle of fir-cones placed two by two all round. And with his hands on his knees and his head stretched forward, Neddy was gazing at this fir-cone circle as though, as Gerty whispered mischievously, "it were a slug or a blackbeetle."

But, as you may imagine, he did not give his unexpected companions very much time to note that especial expression, for even before Harry had regained breath to shout, "Why, it's Neddy!" Neddy had seen them, and started up with a cry and a blush from his seat.

Kind-hearted Mrs. Anderson, some months before, had found the poor child sitting under a hedge in one of the lanes with a most sad-looking, little woe-begone face. And when she questioned him he almost sobbed out his little story; how he had wished to earn some money, but was so little and weak nobody would have him, not even to frighten away the sparrows. And then Mrs. Anderson had offered to give him the twopence for helping to weed the garden paths, and carry the gardener's tools and basket hither and thither for him, or do anything he might require. It need not be said that Neddy had given a joyful yes to the offer, and little and weak as he was, he was so earnestly anxious to earn the promised payment, that even grave, stern Tooms had confessed that he had really been of use to him. And so the lame boy had got his pennies; but there was not sufficient work to keep him always employed, and he had been told that he must look elsewhere.

"Why, what a lot of pennies you have got, Ned!" Harry added admiringly, as he walked up to the penny table. "But they would look more still if you put them all separate instead of two together."

A smile darted over Neddy's crimson face as he said softly, "Please, Master Harry, it wasn't to make them look a lot that I put them out like that. It was only," with a weary little sigh, "to see how few they were to what I want to get."

"Oh!" said Harry. It did not sound very sympathising, but he did not see what else there was to say, seeing that his mamma had told him he must not tease Ned with questions as to why he was longing so especially just now after pennies.

Gerty had been told this too, but curiosity now got the better of politeness, and she exclaimed:

"Oh, please, Neddy, do tell us why you want a heap of twopences. Please do, to make up for frightening away the squirrels."

"Hush, hush," cried Mrs. Anderson almost sternly. "Gerty, my child, you are forgetting yourself. Don't tell us anything, my boy, that you do not like, and don't look so sorry about the squirrels. You had as much right to speak in the wood if you chose as we had to please ourselves by being quiet, and besides that we were sadly wasting our time with them."

"Oh yes, so we were; I forgot that," said Gerty with sudden compunction. "And I'm sorry I pressed you to tell about your pennies, Neddy; I really am, only I did so want to know."

Neddy looked at her with a bright smile. He was not accustomed to get much sympathy from any one but his toilworn mother, and it seemed to bring a little bit of unexpected sunlight into his grey life to see those bright-eyed rosy-faced children looking with such interest at his earnings, and to find them showing a real wish to know what he meant to do with them.

A few weeks ago he would have been too shy to speak about his affairs, but since he had been working up at the Manor House he had almost lost all fear with kind-hearted Mrs. Anderson and her children, and after twisting his shabby cap about for a few moments in his hands, he ended by holding it out as a pointer towards the pennies with the short explanation:

"Please, Miss Gerty, they's to help buy mother a shawl when the cold weather comes; and I don't mind telling you at all. Whenever I can earn twopence I save it for her."

"Thank you," said Gerty in a low voice, still half-ashamed of the way in which she had asked for the information.

Harry's feelings, however, were very different. He had speculated about those pennies till his curly head had got quite troubled about them, and he found it a most perfect relief to know what they really were intended to be used for. "But I did think," he said aloud, "that they must be for a fishing-rod, or a butterfly-net, or something for yourself."

Neddy smiled again as he murmured softly, "They would be nice. But oh! this will be a deal nicer, if"—and his face clouded once more—"if only I can get it."

"Oh, you must," cried Gerty impulsively.

"I do hope you will be able," said Florry, more quietly. "But what made you think of trying to buy such a big thing?"

"Why, miss, mother had saved up the money to buy herself one, when her other went quite all to bits last winter. But one day she happened to hear some boys laughing at my old clothes as I came home from Sunday-school. I didn't mind a bit—they'd often laughed; but mother did, so on Monday she went out and bought me some new things, and then all her money was spent, and she had nothing for herself, and not a bit of chance she'd be able to save enough again this year."

Here Neddy stopped with a sob, and Mrs. Anderson said gently:

"And then you determined to try what you could do?"

"Yes, ma'am. I went out the very next day to try to earn some money. I went all round to the farmers and the village shops, and they all said the same—they'd lots of work for strong folks, but none for a little lame chap like me. And then I went into the lane at t' back of home, that mother mightn't see how miserable I was, and while I was sitting under the hedge——"

Here Neddy broke off once more, and looked up with grateful, tear-filled eyes at Mrs. Anderson, while Gerty finished his sentence for him, exclaiming:

"Oh, yes, I know. While you were sitting there crying, mamma found you, and helped you to earn the first twopence towards your mother's shawl by giving you work in our garden. But you need not work any more, for now we know what you want we'll give you the rest of the money between us. Here's six more of the twopences to clear away some of those fir-cones, and I've six more at home which you shall have."

As the little girl spoke, she eagerly held out a shilling towards little Steadman, her mamma smiling approval at her ready generosity, and Florry and Harry fumbling hastily in their pockets for more contributions to the shawl fund.

But to the sore disappointment of Gerty, and the surprise of all the others, the lame boy, instead of taking the offered gift, drew hastily back as if he supposed shillings would bite, and he trembled, turned red and pale by turns, and seemed on the point of bursting into tears.

Gerty looked up at her mamma, grievously vexed and astonished at this unexpected reception of her kind present, and mutely asking for an explanation.

"What is it, my boy?" asked Mrs. Anderson wonderingly. "What is the matter? Do not be afraid to take the money; my little girl has free leave to do as she likes with it."

"Ye—yes, ma'am," stammered Neddy, twisting his cap about more than ever. "It's—not that, ma'am. But you—you see—if—it's—give to me that—won't be nothing—I—I want to be able to earn it."

And then the tears would come. He could not keep them back any longer, as the thought of the almost impossibility of that same earning rushed into his sad little mind, and they streamed down his cheeks, and through the thin fingers he put up in an attempt to hide them.

The children grew very grave, and the tears gathered also in their mother's eyes as they rested on the child before her.

Lame, and weak, and helpless, with nothing strong about him but his brave longing to share his mother's burdens, and filled with a bitter feeling of powerlessness to aid one whom his warm young heart loved far better than himself. Poor, little, wan-faced boy! Many a one who secretly buys up a measure of self-conscious pride for saying "Thy will be done," has in reality far less to bear than had Neddy Steadman, who generally bent so patiently under the heavy burden laid upon him.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XI.

1. My first true charity defines,
Where grace in its perfection shines;
Yet with the same was Simon found,
By his iniquity fast bound:
O Jesu, set my spirit free,
But gird me with Thy charity.

2. My second marks the hoary head,
Where Time's infirmities are shed;
Yet before God, the Psalmist sings,
It ranks with earth's most trifling things:
O Jesu, let my days be spent
In peace, and patience, and content!

3. My whole denotes a yoke of sin,
A spirit working fear within,
Till Christ doth in my nature speak,
And every yoke and fetter break:
O Jesu, in my nature shine,
And show Thy God and Father mine!

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

PROSERPINE LODGE.

THROUGH THE LINN.

CHAPTER II.—PROSERPINE LODGE.

THE last rays of sunset fell athwart the western bow-window of Proserpine Lodge, a little house on a hill-side, close to the small country town of Brentwood.

Red-edged streaks still lay on a fading background, lately all aglow with crimson, and shadow was fast creeping over town and landscape, burying houses and trees alike in the grey of approaching night. Proserpine Lodge being on raised ground, the lady seated within the bow-window might have had a good view of the sunset, over buildings near and hedgerows more distant.

Might have had, but had not, since her back was turned to the scenery.

Not that Miss Temple was a woman of the large-boned strong-minded type, systematically trampling underfoot the poetry of life. On the contrary, she was in figure small and slim, in face pallid and passive, with short-sighted eyes of a watery grey, with hair smooth and sandy in hue, with lips rather disposed to a fretful curve. Miss Temple counted herself a person of literary tastes and refined mind. She had duly wept in the past over her favourite Mrs. Hemans, had sobbed over select extracts from Byron, had doted on Thomson. At forty years of age the fervour of youth was naturally abated. Miss Temple could at length read poetry with dry eyes—nay, could even exist without reading it at all.

In the same room, near the fireplace, sat another lady, considerably older than Selina Temple. Her back was not turned to the window, but her eyes were sleepily half-shut, and her head nodded gently forwards from time to time in semi-oblivion. She could not have been far from seventy years old, and was not only very stout but also very infirm. Lady Bartlett and Miss Temple were aunt and niece. Having lost at about the same time, the one her husband, the other her parents, they had decided to live together and console one another. Before that arrangement, the two had been warmly attached. Ten years of daily intercourse had considerably loosened the strings of their mutual affection, while binding them together with the bonds of habit. Neither would by this time have been quite happy apart from the other. Also, Miss Temple found the plan pecuniarily one of benefit, and Lady Bartlett's feeble health disposed her to take things as she found them.

"I had a letter from Richard Majendie this afternoon, aunt. From Richard Majendie." Miss Temple spoke in a raised voice, with rather a sharp twang in it, as if not quite expecting to be heard, and disposed to be annoyed if she were not. Lady Bartlett opened her eyes slowly.

"Yes, my dear—oh yes—I understand. From—whom did you say?"

"Richard Majendie, aunt."

"Sylvester Temple—oh yes. Yes, my dear. I saw him last time he rode over. The time before I was suffering too much. He is a good young man—Sylvester Temple—a very worthy and excellent young man indeed."

"I said nothing about Sylvester. I said I had a letter from Richard Majendie, aunt—Majendie."

"Mr. Majendie—oh, I beg your pardon, my dear. I did not quite catch the word. I am very sorry, but you have such a habit of speaking indistinctly. Now I can always hear what Sylvester says without the slightest difficulty. What did you say was the matter with Mr. Majendie!"

"I did not tell you anything was the matter. I have a letter from him. I thought I would write to him two days ago, and his letter has crossed mine. Very odd how often letters do cross when one has not written for months before. I read my letter to you, so you know all I said."

"Oh yes, my dear." This was a merely mechanical response, and meant nothing.

Miss Temple left her seat and came near the fireplace, where she read the letter aloud in raised tones. Lady Bartlett listened at first with an air of great attention, which speedily relaxed, and she indulged in two or three surreptitious nods under cover of the sheet of paper which occupied her niece's eyes. The cessation of Miss Temple's voice woke her up.

"Now what do you think about it?" asked Miss Temple.

Lady Bartlett's only thought was of ardent desire to conceal her dereliction.

"I might go—no doubt. I might manage to go. If you could do without me, that is to say,—but I am not sure. And I do not know how Vandal would feel. He has such a dislike to railway travelling for himself or anybody,—and yet it is so hard to get him to give an opinion. Vandal has the greatest objection that I ever saw in any man to offering advice, and yet I am sure it is not from want of asking on my part. What do you think about it?"

"Why, you might go, perhaps, my dear," said Lady Bartlett, much more vaguely than appeared on the surface.

"If only there were not that long journey! I am so nervous about travelling alone, and Vandal, I am convinced, would dislike it for me. But, on the other hand, it does seem desirable that the Majendies and I should meet. As Richard says, they have no other relatives, and as he says, he is not young, and the girls may some day need a friend. They will never want money, but they may want someone to take care of them. One cannot count on Maria's health from month to month. As he says, I seem more in the position of aunt than of cousin to the girls, and if need arises, I shall be prepared to act as an aunt towards them. Such a state of things might come. Their mother so delicate——"

"Who did you say was delicate, my dear?" asked Lady Bartlett, vainly trying to follow all that was said.

"Maria Majendie — Richard's wife. She has suffered from some internal complaint for many years, I do not know exactly what. The girls don't know anything about it. The doctors never expected her to live so long as this, but, you see, Richard speaks of her having been well for some time. Well for her, he means of course. I think I had better consult with Vandal about this plan of my visiting the Majendies—consult with Vandal," she cried in shrill tones, having previously dropped her voice, and finding herself unheard.

"Yes, that would be a very good plan, a very good plan indeed, my dear."

"I must see him in the morning. How dark it is growing. The worst of Vandal is that he is always so reluctant to give an opinion. He just shows that he does not like a thing, and makes one uncomfortable, and then won't say what ought to be done. Hush, is that some one coming up the garden?"

She went near the garden and peered out, sheltering her person behind the curtain, and forgetting that the firelight within must betray her.

"Sylvester himself, I do believe. What can have brought him at this late hour?"

Miss Temple returned to the fire, which she stirred into a brighter blaze. Then she sat down, seized a book from the table, and opened it, just as the handle of the door turned.

"Mr. Temple, ma'am."

"Mr. Temple! Show him in, Susan—and, Susan, you can light the lamp. Oh, Sylvester, how do you do? I am very glad to see you. How are you all at home? Your mother quite well? And Brena too? Brena always seems well, and always strong, she has such a happy spirit. What a delightful day it has been, so clear and sunny; but they say the fine weather is very partial: rain in other parts. At least, the newspaper said so about yesterday, and I dare say it is the same to-day. This time of year, the fall of the leaf, is rather trying, so I suppose one must expect changeableness. I have been doing my best to-day to induce my dear aunt to go out, but she is very difficult to persuade. It is quite a struggle to get her out of her arm-chair. That sort of inertia is very natural at her age, very natural, but it must be resisted. People settle down into it indefinitely, and there is no rousing them. Have you seen Mr. Desborough lately? He came to call last week. A very agreeable intelligent man, and he quite grows upon one, on a further acquaintance."

Miss Temple's notion of entertaining visitors was to keep up a gentle pitter-patter of small talk, like a running streamlet, only less musical in tone, leaving limited space for response, till she had said her say and exhausted her leading ideas.

Sylvester Temple, being well acquainted with this idiosyncrasy, leant back in his easy-chair and waited, a half-smile flitting once or twice across his pleasant face, which yet had a touch of unwonted concern about its wonted gravity. He had the air of being seven- or eight-and-twenty in age, and his manner of moving and speaking was markedly gentle, so gentle and restrained as to be almost slow. He made no attempt to interrupt his cousin, but when the flow of words showed signs of faltering, and at length came to a pause, he remarked,

"You have been reading the paper to-day?"

"Why, no, I can hardly say I have. I did take it up, but there were so many interruptions. I had a letter by-the-by from my cousin Richard Majendie, which I was just talking about before you came in. It did not seem to me that the paper contained anything of importance, but I must read it by-and-by."

A keener observer than Miss Temple would have read Sylvester's silence as implying dissent. He said merely, "Your brother has not been to see us lately."

"Has he not? He ought. But, indeed, Vandal always dislikes going anywhere. He has quite a morbid aversion to paying calls and seeing people. He would be delighted to see you any time, I know, but he will not rouse himself to make the necessary effort. It is a great pity. He shirks everything that he is not absolutely obliged to do. Sometimes I think it might have been better for Vandal, if he had been a poor man, and obliged to exert himself."

"He would feel it a trial if he became so now."

"Yes, no doubt. 'Custom makes things easy,' you know, and if one is accustomed to wealth, poverty is harder to bear. Not that one can call Vandal wealthy. He is merely just comfortably off —very comfortably. No need ever to exert himself. But, after all, happiness is not a question of money or of bodily comforts."

"Nevertheless, loss of money is generally felt to be an evil," said Sylvester quietly.

"By those who are wedded to luxury. Now, my home is dear to me, of course," and Miss Temple glanced round with a rather pathetic air. "It has been my home all my life. Every article in the house has some association with my beloved parents. But if Providence called upon me to leave my home, and to become a poor woman, I should feel it right not to murmur. I should accept my lot, and work patiently for my living, as hundreds of women have to do. Such a trial may never come. But if it does, I hope I shall act as a Temple should."

Selina Temple had an unbounded belief in the "Temples." She did not think much of her Majendie relatives, on her mother's side; but to be "a Temple" was in her estimation something to be proud of. Why she so plumed herself on the connection it would be hard to say. The Temples, taken generally, were pleasant people, refined, and not lacking in intellect. Still, they had never peculiarly distinguished themselves either by prowess on field of battle, by might of mind, or by overmastering weight of character, and people were wont to be perplexed by Miss Temple's ardent admiration for her own kith and kin. She knew all these facts, yet none the less believed she "the Temples" to be, as a family and as individuals, unsurpassed by human kind.

"Or as a Christian, perhaps," Sylvester suggested. "It is well to be able to meet reverses bravely," and he spoke in a thoughtful, almost absent tone. "I came in this evening because we are all feeling rather anxious about your cousin, Mr. Majendie. I have an impression—a mistaken one I hope—that he is a large shareholder in the West P. Q. and O. Bank. Did not your brother once tell me that almost all Mr. Majendie's property is invested there?"

"I dare say he may have told you, for it is true. Richard Majendie thinks it a particularly safe bank, I know, for I banked fifty pounds there only the other day, for greater safety. I always bank what I can save, till it reaches one hundred pounds, and then Vandal advises me where to invest. Not that that comes often, of course. Yes, Richard Majendie is a shareholder, and years ago, when I saw him last, he said to me that he wondered sometimes if he were quite wise to embark his all in one craft. Those were his very words, for they made an impression on me. And I don't think he was wise, but I dare say he has not changed. Men don't change, when they get into one way of doing things. What makes you ask? Are there any reports about the bank not being safe? Reports always do fly about so, but I don't believe in them. Vandal always counts it a safe bank, and Vandal understands such things better than most people."

"It has failed."

Sylvester uttered the words slowly. Miss Temple started to her feet, and sat down again.

"Failed! Nonsense! Not that bank."

"It is in the paper to-day. I thought you would have seen it. I am afraid there is no doubt about the matter. Those poor Majendies!"

"And my fifty pounds!" said Miss Temple excitedly. "My fifty pounds, Sylvester! My fifty pounds, that Vandal advised me to put in there! Aunt, do you hear? The bank has failed, and my fifty pounds are gone, and the Majendies are ruined. One can't afford to lose fifty pounds all in a moment." Miss Temple was actually in tears.

"I doubt if yours will be final loss," said Sylvester gravely. "You are a depositor, not a shareholder. The depositors are not unlikely to be paid in full."

"Not unlikely; but that isn't being sure."

"In any case I am glad you are not more seriously compromised. It will be a heavy blow for Mr. Majendie."

"He ought to have had more wisdom. No one thinks it a good plan to have one's whole property in one bank. He did not think so himself at one time. And yet Vandal considered that bank so safe! It seems extraordinary that it should fail after all. I must see Vandal about it this evening. I suppose there isn't anything I can do about the fifty pounds. I don't know how such things are managed—but Vandal will know."

Sylvester volunteered no unasked advice on the subject. He said, after a little break, "I have been wondering whether your brother may not think it well to go north for a few days. Mr. Majendie will need a friend."

"Vandal go north! Vandal!" said Miss Temple, amazed at the suggestion. "Why, Vandal never goes away for anything, and he has a horror of travelling, and he can't bear interfering in anybody's affairs. Besides, it isn't as if he were Richard Majendie's real cousin. There is no relationship."

"Not actually—no."

"And they have not met for I don't know how long. Oddly enough, Richard Majendie wrote to me a day or two ago—the letter only came this afternoon—asking me to pay them a visit. But he will not want visitors now, and I don't see how I am to afford a long journey, after losing fifty pounds all at once. If only I had never banked there! I can't imagine what Vandal was about to give me such advice. I must see him this evening. But you will take a cup of tea, Sylvester."

Sylvester was not much of a tea-drinker, nevertheless he accepted the offer, thinking it as well that Miss Temple should have time to cool down before seeing her brother.

Vandal Temple sat alone in his study, a small delicate man, hollow-cheeked and sallow-complexioned. Books and papers lay about him, not carelessly strewn, but neatly and daintily arranged. Pigeon-holes, elastic bands, and dockets, were largely in favour. Dust was in that study a thing unknown; but woe had betided the unfortunate servant who had ventured to move book or paper, and had not restored it to its proper position on table or shelf. Happily for Mr. Temple's peace of mind, Mrs. Marcet, his housekeeper, knew better than to admit there any novice.

It must not be understood that Vandal Temple was an ill-tempered man. He was a good man, and a man of gentle spirit, albeit not seldom a little fretful in tone. To gusts of heat or annoyance he was not given, but possibly his servants shrank none the less from awakening his displeasure because that displeasure was quiet in expression.

Vandal was a bachelor, and was commonly counted a particularly unsociable bachelor. He had little liking for society, less from shyness than from simple distaste. He was a man of sense and information, though both the sense and the information lay somewhat beyond the reach of the outer world. People in general knew Miss Temple's half-brother only as an invalidish little man, odd and reserved in his ways, and altogether unattractive. He was a good deal laughed at behind his back, and was sensitive enough to have shrunk from the same had he known it.

A peal at the front-door bell roused Mr. Temple from a brown study. It was neither a soft nor a vigorous peal, but possessed the irritating petulance of sound resulting from a sharp yet uncertain pull at the wire. Mr. Temple looked up slowly, his brows contracting, and an anxious furrow coming into his sunken cheeks. "I wonder who that can be. People really need not ring so loud. I shall give orders among the tradespeople."

Selina Temple broke in upon him and his thoughts. I use the term "broke in" advisedly, for her entrance brought a small crash of sound and a general sense of bustle. Vandal placed his hand on his forehead, and wore a look of suffering, partly nervous, yet in some degree genuine.

"My dear sister—I beg of you——"

"Yes, but really, Vandal, I cannot help it. I must speak to you to-night, and if you will keep that horrid little table near the door one must expect it to be knocked down now and then. The bank has failed!"

"There are more banks than one in the world," remarked Vandal, with a sickly smile. "However, your meaning is unfortunately clear. I have read to-day's paper."

"And my fifty pounds, that you advised me to put there!"

"I beg your pardon, Selina. It is my principle never to offer advice."

"You said it was as safe a bank as you knew of, and that you had perfect confidence in it."

"I have perfect confidence in nothing earthly. If you quote my words, please to be exact. I said it was, in my estimation, as safe as any bank with which I was acquainted. No bank is, or can be, perfectly safe."

"You said that if you had a spare fifty pounds you would rather deposit it there than anywhere."

"True. But I did not advise you to deposit yours there. I recommended you to decide for yourself."

"Well, if that isn't advice I don't know what is," said Miss Temple, who was labouring under the common desire to blame somebody for her own act. "When I say to anybody, 'I should do so-and-so in your place,' I mean it for advice of course. But you are always so odd about things."

Mr. Temple rarely argued with his sister. He had found the practice to be unproductive of good results, and liable to ruffle his own peace of mind. Also, he had been known to complain that Miss Temple's mind was not sufficiently logical to follow a sustained line of argument. He no sooner believed her to be convinced than she began over again from the beginning.

"At all events, I took it for advice, and I followed it," sighed Miss Temple.

"I do not think you need disquiet yourself about your fifty pounds. You will probably have it all."

"So Sylvester said—'probably.' But how? And you can't be sure."

"It is a bank of unlimited liability. The shareholders will be called upon, till the depositors are paid in full. You are happy in being only a depositor."

"I wish there were no such things as banks," said Miss Temple.

"You would prefer the old-fashioned plan,—a coffer at the foot of the bed."

"A coffin! What a dreadful idea! Did people keep money in coffins, before there were banks?"

"A coffer, I said—a chest."

"Well, I suppose the Majendies will be ruined, at any rate," said Miss Temple despairingly. "Vandal, I wish you would walk back with me this evening. I don't care to go alone in the dark, and Sylvester came with me. You will not mind, I know, and we can talk about the bank as we go, and about the Majendies. I want you to explain to my aunt about it all too. She is worried, and I can't make her understand."

Vandal rose with an expression rather like that of a hunted animal. He closed his book, and laid it on one side; wiped his pen, and put it away; locked a drawer in his writing-table, and carefully pushed back his chair a matter of some three inches. Then he raked out the lower ashes in his fireplace, put on the guard; looked gravely round to discover if aught remained undone, and announced that he was ready.

The walk from Mr. Temple's house to Proserpine Lodge occupied a quarter of an hour. Miss Temple talked most of the way, and Mr. Temple listened, or appeared to do so. If his attention wandered, she remained in happy ignorance of the fact. There was some excuse for Vandal being one of the class of men apt to inveigh against the nature of the feminine tongue. He had had an unfortunate experience of the same in his half-sister, as well as in his step-mother. He was wont to advance a good many sage arguments to show the advisability of his having quitted their roof, and set up an independent ménage; but perhaps he was himself scarcely aware how much the ceaseless dropping of words, torturing, inquisition-like, his fastidious and irritable brain, had had to do with the matter. Vandal was afflicted with an intense love for almost perpetual silence, and an intense aversion to the sound of the human voice. Unfortunately, his boyhood's training—that of a spoilt and petted invalid—had fostered instead of checking this weakness.

They reached Proserpine Lodge, and went in—"for a talk" as Miss Temple expressed it, after talking all the way through the village. Vandal inwardly shuddered, but submitted. He knew it must come sooner or later. So he sat and listened patiently, while Miss Temple worked the matter threadbare, and presented it before him in all its bearings. She could not be happy till she had "had it out," as she said; and if the amount of counsel he gave was small, the amount of relief to herself was large.

Vandal was detained late, despite certain efforts to escape. He consented to remain "for once" until after supper, though the remaining "to supper" was a mere phrase, since he never ventured to eat what was not prepared for him by his own cook. He sat, rather dolorously, breaking a biscuit into pieces, and listening still. Miss Temple had by this time talked herself into good spirits. She was convinced that her own fifty pounds would be repaid, and that Richard Majendie would prove to be very far from ruined.

At this stage the front-bell rang sharply, and a telegram was brought in. Miss Temple opened it in a flutter of alarm, and read:

"'From Mrs. Canynge'—that is the Majendies' clergyman, Vandal—at least, I mean, the clergyman's wife. I remember the name quite well—Mr. Canynge. 'From Mrs. Canynge. Mr. Majendie dead—suddenly. Wife very ill, not expected to recover. Can you or your brother come?'"

Miss Temple looked at Vandal, blanched, sobered, horror-stricken, for once wordless.

"Poor things! Poor things! This is awful, Selina! One dead, one dying. Surely there is some mistake."

"See for yourself. What does it mean?" she asked, subdued and tremulous, too much startled for tears. For Richard Majendie was her cousin, and there had been a time in years long past when Richard Majendie had been the dream of her girlish heart. She had never quite forgiven him for loving another, perhaps, but at this moment there could be no place for aught but cousinly sorrow.

"If the mother does not recover I don't know what will become of those poor girls," said Vandal slowly.

"I don't know how I am to afford to take them in," said Miss Temple. "But I dare say she will get over it, poor thing. It is very sad anyway. Of course you will not go to them, so I must."

Vandal seemed to be weighing the matter. "I am not sure," he said deliberately. "I almost think—under the circumstances—that I should be the best person—notwithstanding my disinclination."

"You!" said Miss Temple, amazed.

"It will be an effort. A journey is a great trial to me," said Vandal in a suffering voice. "I may be the worse for it for weeks after. But there are times when self must be forgotten. Such a call is not to be disregarded."

"You or me she wants to go," said Miss Temple.

Vandal felt that he would not in sore trouble wish for Miss Temple's presence.

"No, I think I will go. Not both of us, Selina. One or the other, as you say. A business head will be needed, to look into your cousin's affairs. I feel that it is incumbent on me to go."

And though he spoke with the air of a man about to take a fatal plunge, Miss Temple knew that he was not to be turned from his purpose.

THIS INSCRIPTION IS PLACED OVER THE DOOR OF AN OLD HOUSE IN COIRE.

"FROM narrow things to great." The words might stand
Fit motto for Death's portal, grim and black,
From which we shrink and shudder, and look back
With yearning eyes on this familiar land
Where we have lived and loved, enjoyed and planned.
But think we that upon the other side
This gate is life; beyond, it opens wide
On everlasting hills, aglow with light,
Caught from the lustrous shinings of God's face,
Scenes of surpassing beauty and delight,
Rivers of pleasure, noons without a night,
Marvels of glory and surpassing grace?
Ah, fools and blind, to tremble at the door
Through which we pass to joys for evermore.

THE KING'S WINDOWS;

OR, GLIMPSES OF THE WONDERFUL WORKS OF GOD.

BY THE REV. E. PAXTON HOOD.

IV.—THE BALANCING OF THE CLOUDS.

IN the whole Kingdom of Nature are there any objects more suggestive, more wonderful, from some points of view more inexplicable, than clouds, cloud-glory and cloud-gloom? Woods, mountains, and seas have been called Nature's three great poems; to these we will add clouds. From their many-coloured flocks and masses, fresh and wonderful thoughts seem perpetually to come. As we lift up our eyes we may say, "There go the chariots of God, in which He rides forth to inspect his fields and gardens, his meadows and orchards, his forests and plains. They are the pitcher with, and from which, He waters the sultry glebe; they are the pipes through which He conducts the moisture of the firmament. They are the storehouse richly filled with oil, and butter, and corn and wine." They are like the broad hand of God which He opens to supply the "desire of every living thing." They are his curtains which He draws over the plants that they may not be withered, or consumed by heat. They are his arsenal in which He keeps his artillery of thunder and lightning, striking the mind with reverential awe, and sometimes inflicting punishment.

Mr. Ruskin, in the last volume of his "Modern Painters," says, "Has the reader any idea of what clouds are?" He goes on to say, "I believe we do not know what makes clouds float."

This is, perhaps, a little hyperbolical. And yet the poet Wordsworth, in well-known lines, in which he describes the consolations which he had received from the poor leech-gatherer of the moor, expresses very much the same idea, when he says:

> "Motionless as a cloud the old man stood,
> That heareth not the loud winds when they call,
> And moveth altogether, if it move at all."

But, indeed, the more we regard them, the more we see the wondrous Providence which arranges them. In all poetry, in all literature, there is not a more wonderful passage, at once descriptive of the philosophy, the very science and poetry of the cloud, than the words in the thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh chapters of the book of Job: "Behold, God is great, and we know Him not, neither can the number of his years be searched out. For He maketh small the drops of water: they pour down rain according to the vapour thereof: which the clouds do drop and distil upon man abundantly. Also can any understand the spreadings of the clouds, or the noise of his tabernacle? Behold, He spreadeth his light upon it, and covereth the bottom of the sea. For by them He judgeth the people; He giveth meat in abundance. With clouds He covereth the light; and commandeth it not to shine by the cloud that cometh betwixt." "Also by watering He wearieth the thick cloud; He scattereth his bright cloud: and it is turned round about by his counsels; that they may do whatsoever He commandeth them upon the face of the world in the earth. He causeth it to come, whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy. Hearken unto this, O Job: stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God. Dost thou know when God disposed them, and caused the light of his cloud to shine? Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of Him which is perfect in knowledge?"

These are very wonderful words, and we are not much wiser about clouds now than men were in the days of Job. The analogy in the verses we have quoted is the Providence which governs human life, the difficulty of reading God in the arrangements of Providence. We cannot understand the balancings of Providence; but can you understand that which would seem to be a much more simple thing, do you know the "balancing of the clouds"? We know that the clouds remain suspended so long as their pressure is exactly balanced by the counter-pressure of the air which is underneath them; but the law, the equilibrium, and the causes which destroy the balance are so subtle in their operation that our knowledge of these matters is extremely superficial; so that the question may be asked now, we suppose, with as much confidence as in the day when Elihu put the question, "Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds?" Only that we see the balancings of the clouds do wonderfully illustrate that law of circularity, so concisely stated by the preacher: "All the waters run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again." And if all the waters run into the sea, and the sea is not full, it is because, as another Scripture says, God "calleth for the waters of the sea, and poureth them out again from the clouds on the face of the earth." Thus wonderful is the way in which an equilibrium, or balance is preserved by Divine arrangement. And all changes are included in one uniform sphericity, the circulation of the sap, the circulation of the blood, the occultation and culmination of planets, night and day, summer and winter. Nature seems to know little of straight lines; she moves in spheres, they are her line of beauty; nations and civilisations rise, and advance and decline, and fade, and fall; has it not been said that every death is a new birth, and every grave a cradle? Every retrogression is an advance, and death, which seems the final retrogression, is the radiant rising of the morning star of immortality. Like children falling to sleep and crying to retain some loved possession, so we fall to sleep in tears, and wake to find the jewel of immortality on the breast.

Infinite is the hand which balanced the clouds; is it not wonderful to know that while the clouds are charged with electricity God has made it so that every blade of glass, every little spiral leaf, is as if millions or billions of steel needles, or lightning rods, were all silently disarming the clouds, and bearing their influences harmlessly to the earth? We might regard the clouds as a kind of guncotton, and our readers know what a dangerous substance that may be; take cotton or any other vegetable fibre, steep it in nitric or sulphurous acid, and you have an explosive substance which is often used as a substitute for gunpowder. Our readers will well remember how a few years since a slight explosion shattered all the works at Stowmarket to ruins. But our readers will also remember that the kind medicine of surgery called collodion is only a preparation of guncotton attenuated in ether, and it is one of the finest and most healing influences for external wounds and abrasions of the skin; and this collodion is also the fine glue which the photographer spreads over his glass to fix his shadowy and spectral likeness. Is it not wonderful to think how all these diverse attributes meet in the balancing of the clouds? Clouds are the moisteners and the healers of the earth; from the rain-cloud they spread out their gentle fomentations, moistening and healing; they are a blessed medicine. Again, in their gorgeousness they are spread out, as Elihu says, "like a molten looking-glass," and they hold the artillery which shakes terribly the earth when God thunders marvellously with his voice—

"The thunders roll; be hushed, thou prostrate world."

"Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds? canst thou send lightnings, that they may come, and say unto thee, Here we are? Who can number the clouds in wisdom? or who can stay the bottles of heaven?" These ancient questions, also in the Book of Job, are almost the repetition of that which gives the subject of our paper. And of course, these all suggest that mystery of mysteries, electricity, which seems almost as insolvable a secret as the very soul of man. The clouds are the high road and pathway of the lightning; from the bosom of the cloud it leaps forth shining and smiting, as the Hebrew poet said, "like a glittering spear." What wonderful stories are told us of the effects of lightning shimmering forth from the disturbed cloud, and all tending to enhance our conceptions of the power of the marvellous Hand which balances in such perfect order those mighty armaments of the skies! Arago tells how once a cobbler, or shoemaker, was sitting at his stall, working away with right good will, while a storm was going on; the lightning suddenly entered his shop; with courteous graciousness it passed him by, but in one second of time it transmuted without transforming every iron thing in his shop, it magnetised all his tools. Our readers can imagine the dismay of the poor fellow; it was as if the black magician of the old story had entered the hammer, pincers, and awl,—attracted all the needles, pins, tacks, nails, and sparrowbills; there they were all firmly adhering to the larger tools. Surely, we cannot wonder that the poor fellow thought that one of the two things had happened, either that everything in his shop was delivered over to the devil, or else that he was dreaming it all.

In our own country, in Wakefield, a merchant had placed in a box a number of knives, forks, and iron tools, intending to pack them up and to send them away to the colonies; in came the lightning; in a second the box was opened, the articles all spread upon the floor, and when they were picked up it was found that every article was magnetised, some subtle properties had been imparted to all; each thing might have served the purpose of a mariner's compass—all had been affected by the mysterious current. What is this delicate and most subtle power? Think of it melting a pair of bracelets on a lady's wrist and leaving the wrist itself altogether untouched! Talk of delicate attentions after that! And yet this has happened.

Jerome Cardan, however, tells of eight reapers, all eating their dinner under an oak tree; by one flash of lightning they were all struck, yet not one was disturbed; they sat still; they were all dead; but there they all sat still! When discovered, one was still holding his glass in his hand, another was in the act of putting a piece of bread in his mouth, a third was stretching his hand towards a dish. In an instant death had come upon them, life was suppressed so instantaneously that all the muscles continued rigidly unmoved. The illusion, so much like life, would have been perfect and complete, only the second of death had completely discoloured their bodies, so that they appeared like statuary sculptured out in black marble. The wonderful story was for a long time disbelieved, but the catastrophe has been repeated since; and we believe in our own day ten reapers were similarly struck in a storm while taking shelter under a hedge.

What is this mysterious power which so awfully but gently kisses the soul away? When we see animals or men cease moving, thinking, living, thus suddenly, without any appreciable change in their appearance or in the mechanism of the organisation, it suggests, says a lively writer, M. Fonville, "the image of a cage, the doors still closed, no danger done to a single wire, and yet the inhabitant gone, the bird flown." However did the bird get out of the cage? Not the slightest trace of any wound or scar, no touch, no burn, no contusion, no hint of the way in which the mysterious bird escaped from its confinement, and yet gone!

It is evident that we could fill pages with stories of the curiosities of thunder-storms, and illustrations amusing or amazing, entertaining or terrible, of these feats of electricity. Amusing and amazing indeed. In the reports of the British Association for 1858, we have the singular account of a lady, a married lady too, who was so charged apparently with electricity that any one attempting to kiss was saluted with a spark from her lips. Visitors received a shock when they shook hands with her. Indeed, the curiosities and wonders of electricity are quite innumerable, whether we refer them to the grand and overwhelming displays of the thunder-storm, or to the more sportful manifestations which play round the parlour or the lecture-room. But what is electricity? We seem as far as ever removed from answering that question.

This, however, we may dimly see, that an entrance into, and some acquaintance with the laws which regulate the "balancing of the clouds," introduces us to some of the most subtle mysteries of the universe. Faraday, in one of his lectures before Prince Albert, on magnetic and diamagnetic forces, says, "The exertions in physical science of later years, have been directed to ascertain not merely the different natural powers, but the manner in which they are linked together, the universality of each in its action, and their probable unity in one." And he closed this lecture by saying: "Such are the recent additions to our knowledge, respecting the manner in which the magnetic force exercises its governing power over matter; and when we thus see it extended to all matter, animal, vegetable, or mineral, living or lifeless, and when we see it thus making strange or striking distinctions between the same kind of matter, as it may be in the amorphous or crystalline state, and when we remember that the earth itself is a magnet, pervaded in every part by this mighty power, universal and strong as gravity itself, we cannot doubt that it is exerting an appointed and essential influence over every particle of matter, and in every place where it is present. What its great purpose is, seems to be looming in the distance before us, the clouds which obscure our mental sight are daily thinning, and I cannot doubt that a glorious discovery in natural knowledge, and of the wisdom and power of God in the creation, is awaiting our age, and that we may not only hope to see it, but even be honoured to help in obtaining the victory over present ignorance and future knowledge."

Thus, storms which have usually been regarded as the caprices of nature, and the variability of the weather, are found to be as subject to law as the pathway of our world in its orbit, giving to us the changes and the order of the seasons. But all this, and all those prophetic anticipations to which Faraday points, are slow unveilings, for we cannot go far with God at once, we only see parts of his ways; we are like dwellers on a plain, who sink with fatigue as they strive to ascend or to descend alternately the ramparts of a mountain ridge, their muscles have become infirm by long inaction. Thus, as one has said, the thought of God is rest, but to keep company with God is weariness. And therefore it is said, "It is the glory of God to conceal a thing," and again, "He holdeth back the face of His throne, and spreadeth a cloud upon it." Everywhere He seems to work behind the clouds; search is the law of earth, vision is the law of heaven.

We have referred already to the circularity of matter, and of all nature as illustrated in the singular transmutations of cloud-land. One of our poets has set this forth in words of singular beauty, in his poem called "A Cloud." Every line almost of the lengthy poem expresses a natural truth; the last verse more especially describes the balancing of which we speak:

"I am the daughter of earth and water,
And the nursling of the sky;
I pass through the pores of the ocean and shores;
I change, but I cannot die.
For after the rain, when with never a stain
The pavilion of heaven is bare,
And the winds and sunbeams with their convex gleams
Build up the blue dome of air,
I silently laugh at my own cenotaph,
And out of the caverns of rain,
Like a child from the womb, like a ghost from the tomb,
I arise and unbuild it again."

But several of our poets have given to us some of the most glorious cloud-paintings, and no wonder, for what are they but darkened glasses, enigmatical windows, through whose opaque splendour we obtain some of the finest glimpses of the magnificent presence of the King? It was not to be thought that Wordsworth, living so immediately and constantly in communion with nature, moving to and fro, not less by night than by day, among the mountains, could be unimpressed by these magnificent mysteries; and long as the quotation is, perhaps our readers will suffer us to give them what we believe to be the finest piece of cloud-painting to be found in the compass of English words. No doubt the imagination of the writer projected from itself many of the forms of extraordinary brilliancy the eye beheld.

"A step,
A single step, that freed me from the skirts
Of the blind vapour, opened to my view
Glory beyond all glory ever seen
By waking sense, or by the dreaming soul!
The appearance, instantaneously disclosed,
Was of a mighty city—boldly say
A wilderness of building, sinking far
And self-withdrawn into a boundless depth,
Far sinking into splendour—without end!
Fabric it seemed of diamond and of gold,
With alabaster domes, and silver spires,

Clouds, mists, streams, watery rocks and emerald turf,
Clouds of all tincture, rocks and sapphire sky,
Confused, commingled, mutually inflamed,
Molten together, and composing thus,
Each lost in each, that marvellous array
Of temple, palace, citadel, and huge
Fantastic pomp of structure without name,
In fleecy folds voluminous enwrapped.
Right in the midst, where interspace appeared
Of open court, an object like a throne
Under a shining canopy of state
Stood fixed; and fixed resemblances were seen

CLOUD-LAND. [From a Photograph.

And blazing terrace upon terrace, high
Uplifted; here serene pavilions bright,
In avenues disposed; there, towers begirt
With battlements that on their restless fronts
Bore stars—illumination of all gems!
By earthly nature had the effect been wrought
Upon the dark materials of the storm
Now pacified; on them, and on the coves
And mountain steeps and summits, whereunto
The vapours had receded, taking there
Their station under a cerulean sky.
Oh! 'twas an unimaginable sight!

To implements of ordinary use,
But vast in size, in substance glorified;
Such as by Hebrew prophets were beheld
In vision—forms uncouth of mightiest power
For admiration and mysterious awe.
This little vale, a dwelling-place of man,
Lay low beneath my feet; 'twas visible—
I saw not, but I felt that it was there.
That which I saw was the revealed abode
Of spirits in beatitude."

"The sky," says John Ruskin, "is the part of creation in which nature [or nature's God] has done more for the sake of pleasing man, more for the sole and evident purpose of talking to him and teaching him, than in any part of her [his] works, and it is just the fact which man regards with least attention. Every essential purpose of the sky might be answered, so far as we know, if once in three days, or thereabouts, a great ugly black rain-cloud were brought up over the blue sky, and everything well watered, and then all left blue again till next time, with perhaps a film of morning and evening mist for dew. But instead of this there is not a moment or a day in any of our lives when nature [or her God] is not producing scene after scene, picture after picture, glory after glory, and working still upon such exquisite and constant principles of the most perfect beauty, that it is quite certain it is all done for us, and intended for our perpetual pleasure. Yes, the sky is for all, sometimes gentle, sometimes capricious, sometimes awful, never the same for two moments together, almost human in its passions, almost spiritual in its tenderness, its appeal to what is immortal in us is as distinct as its ministry of chastisement or of blessing to what is mortal in us is essential."

Thus, not merely in the teachings of science and in the visions of imagination, but in the offices and exercises of faith, clouds have Divine meanings. All things are synthetic, that is, they have a Divine unity: God has a synthesis, or principle of unity, for a plant, for a flower, for the mountain, and even for the clouds. He who sets the planets to music, so that we speak of the music or harmony of the spheres, teaches us by the balancing of the clouds that He has a synthesis or principle of harmony also for human lives. Job was taught that clouds which sweep over the human soul, and envelope it in gloom, have also their Divine ends and meanings, their balancings not less assured, not more outside of Divine guiding and directing than the clouds which sweep over the face of the sky. Well do we remember when we first saw a singular etching by the great German etcher, Retsch, called "Cloud-land." It was a very cunning piece; we could not at first make out what the painter meant by it, it seemed merely a mass of floating clouds, nothing but clouds soft and shadowy; but if you sought and looked long you perceived that every cloud contained an angel's face, angel's wings, and what at first seemed only a mass of gloom looked out upon the spectator as it were hundreds of angel eyes and angel wings. Shall it not be so, not only with Job, but with all our poor human lives, if God comes nigh to us in his cloudy chariot? Will not the time come when we shall look at them and find that for us they have turned into angels?

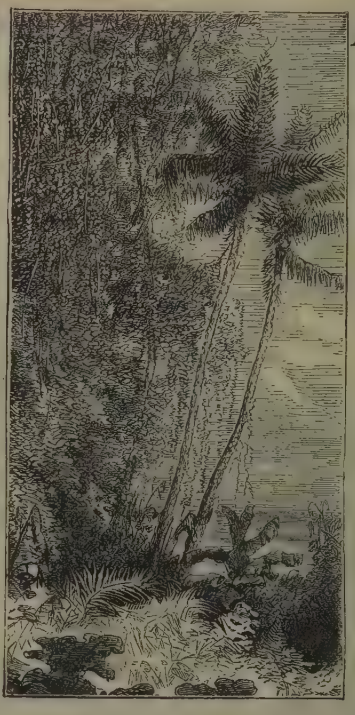
"We shall see the lights of heaven
Gleam through the rain and mist,
And the feeling of joy come o'er us
The soul cannot resist.

And through the long days of labour,
And nights devoid of ease,
We shall hear in our soul the music
Of wonderful melodies.

And the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares that infest the day,
Shall fold up their tents like the Arabs
And as silently steal on their way."

MY BOYHOOD IN THE EAST.

IV.—THE RESCUED ORPHAN.



AMONG the specialities of the little island are pony palanquins. In ordinary conceptions of this Eastern vehicle "bearers" are associated with them. And in India proper to travel by one is to lie in an oblong box, and be carried by a pole longitudinally fixed through the upper part of it, on the shoulders of men. But here a race of sturdy and lively ponies from Acheen, takes the place of "bearers," and you enter a palanquin, not to lie down to be carried, but to sit face to face with your friend, and be briskly drawn by a smart little horse. But how is it managed? Not by a coachman on his box, but by a black groom, who runs at its side, with his right hand on the reins, and a whip in his left, and thinks nothing of a trot, without halt, of three or four miles. My story takes us to the "attap" hut of one of these grooms. They are almost always Madras men and Hindoos. The hut is occupied by the groom and his wife and two children, a daughter and a son. The man is fairly well-to-do, and the wife is zealous in her religion.

There was an idol in the hut, and every day before it cowdung was burnt, an offering supposed to be of peculiar sacredness and efficacy. But the daughter, Luchmee (named after a goddess), was allowed to go to the Mission Girls' School, and there she learned of the true God, and the wickedness of idolatry. Hers was an earnest nature, and she began to neglect presenting the usual offering to the idol. The mother observed it, and one morning she bade her bring it and burn it at the shrine. The girl obeyed. But when the mother took her hand and said, "Now kneel with me," the girl sobbed, and said, "Mother, I cannot. This is not God. I can only worship the true God, who made the heavens, and the earth, and me." The mother was enraged, stamped on the ground in her fury, vociferously demanded obedience, but in vain. She then seized a hatchet, and shouted, "Bow down, or I will cleave your head."

The girl rushed from the hut, ran to the Mission House, and there lay concealed under a bed. The mother followed, loudly demanding her child, threatening to appeal to the magistrate, and watched the house for hours, in the hope of seeing and seizing her. Evening arrived, and the mother remembering that her husband would soon be home for his evening meal, returned to the hut. He was there. Finding the rice not ready he became angry, and she replying to his upbraidings by angry complaints of her daughter, provoked him into ungovernable rage, and suddenly, seizing the hatchet with which the woman had threatened her child, he struck her dead. He was tried for the murder and executed.

Luchmee and her brother were now orphans. But both were pitifully regarded by the "Father of the fatherless," and by Him the hearts of his servants, some in India, and others in England, were moved, and the children found a home in the Orphan School, and both grew up to be disciples of Christ. One is now a respectable gentleman in her Majesty's service, bringing up his family in the fear of God, and zealously seeking to extend his kingdom, and the other has passed away to its bliss and glory in the heavenly world.

But the orphan to whom reference is specially intended in the heading of this chapter was not of Hindoo lineage, but the child of Malayan and Mohammedan parents. The power of the belief in Kismet, or fate, which prevails in the East, and specially among Moslems, is well known. I remember one evening watching some officers at a game of quoits in a field in the country, when suddenly the alarm gun at the fort was fired. Everyone mounted his pony, some riding to the fort, and others to collect and conduct to it a "company" of sepoys. But as we rode we soon saw the cause of the alarm. The native town was on fire, and the sky red with the reflection of the flames. Arrived at the outskirts of the circle of the conflagration we found the people standing about, gazing on the destruction of their homes and all that they contained, and quietly saying, "Alas, alas! It is Kismet." It was left to British tars to drag timbers out of the flames, and officers were actually using their canes to compel the owners to remove such property as was rescued.

I have spoken of the island as producing sugar-cane. A tall, graceful reed it is, nearly two inches thick, growing to the height of sixteen or eighteen feet, with long green leaves springing from knots about eighteen inches from each other, curving downwards, and at the summit from the midst of them rises a handsome lilac flower. Near one of these plantations stood a native hut, and as my father was passing by to visit the district school, he thought he heard sounds like the moaning of a child in pain. The door of the hut was shut, and there was no one to be seen anywhere. He opened the door, and there found, on some leaves spread on the ground, an infant girl who seemed to be dying. Nothing else was there, not a mat or stool, jar or cup, grain of rice, or drop of water. The child was breathing feebly, the eyes fixed, and the jaw fallen, and the little hands stiffening in death. He immediately called for help, and learned the story. Alas! it was the common one. The father and mother had died of fever and been buried; everything they possessed had been carried away by the neighbours, and the sick child left to die! It was Kismet. But as she was slowly passing away there was an eye that pitied, and hence came the hand of help. The dying child was soon brought to our house. Can those who saw her then ever forget the scene? There she lay on the couch watched with weeping eyes by eager children, tenderly nursed by their mother, who cooled her fevered limbs and poured milk into her parched mouth, till at length the little one looked back the smiles of the faces around, and cried for food.

The young life was saved. She was put among the girls of the Orphan School, learned to read and write, and sew, and sing, and pray, and afterwards became the teacher of the school. Some years afterwards the pitiful lady that had thus ministered to the dying child, received from her the following letter, written in a "hand" that would become any accomplished lady:

"MOST EVER DEAR MADAM,

"As Mrs. —— is going to write I enclose you a few lines, to return many, many, many thanks for the parcel you kindly sent me, with which the children and myself are very much pleased; and oh, dear madam, how glad I was to hear that you are still remembering me! and may I never forget all the kindness which was shown by you, dear madam! I always pray to the Lord daily for the help of his Holy Spirit, to teach and guide me in the one true and only way of happiness, and to keep me from sinning against Him. May the Lord bless me and these dear children in this world and in the world to come! A great many of the Chinese men have been baptised in the mission chapel, and a woman and five of the girls; and I trust that God will help them by his Holy Spirit daily to keep close to Him who is their Lord and Saviour. May the Lord bless you, my dear madam, now and for evermore!

"Custom," says Lord Bacon, "is the principal magistrate of man's life. Certainly, custom is most perfect when it beginneth in young years; this we call education, which is in effect but an early custom." Another wise man, speaking with Divine authority, says, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." "These words," saith the Lord our God, "which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up."

Faith.

FAITH is the soul's clear sight, the inner eyes
That gaze abroad with more than mortal powers
Beyond the limits of this world of ours;
Through the dark valley that betwixt us lies
It sees the pearly gates of Paradise;
The golden streets, the fair immortal flowers
That bloom perennial in angel bowers,
And catches glimpses of the heavenly prize.
The shadows fly before its prescient ken,
As melt the mists before the rising day;
Through the thick gloom it tracks a shining way
From the dim "now," to the eternal "then."
Faith is a growth of pure immortal birth,
Oft mixed with doubt as virgin gold with earth.

JOHN ASKHAM.

SHORT MODEL PRAYERS.

IV.

"Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved: for Thou art my praise."—Jer. xvii. 14.

THIS prayer is one which may very possibly be felt appropriate after the prayer we last considered. We may feel that by God's grace our heart has indeed been "turned." We view things in a different light from what we once did. Our hearts are in the main turned away from the world and its vanities, and towards our God and Saviour.

But we long for more spirituality of mind. We desire to feel always what we only feel at some favoured moments, but instead of this, our too frequent tendency is to slide back. When we would do good, evil is present with us.

It is as if some disease in our souls prevented their healthy and vigorous walk along the road to which we have now been turned.

We look at other Christians, and we wonder if any can feel as we do. Is not a spiritual life much easier to them? Are we not mistaken in thinking we are children of God at all, if we have still so much evil within?

Oh, how graciously does God in his word provide an answer to such fears, a remedy for such a state? If you look at the seventeenth chapter of Jeremiah you will see a little before the prayer we are now considering, at the ninth verse, a description of man's heart: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." You have begun to know a little of this truth, and you have been led earnestly to desire that renewing of the heart which the Holy Spirit alone can effect. Well, here is the very prayer you need. Grant that you have a "wicked" heart, take it, just as it is, to Jesus Christ, the Great Physician, and say, "Heal me, O Lord." Just as you might go to any physician and say, "I feel ill: I cannot work, or walk, or eat, or sleep, as a person in health would do. I don't know what my complaint is, but I know I am ill, do heal me;" so, go to the Lord in prayer, and lay before Him your frequent faults and failings, your want of spiritual appetite, your coldness and deadness of heart, and say, "Heal me, O Lord." Say it in faith, adding the words "And I shall be healed," and be assured you will receive the healing you desire.

The prayer continues: "save me, and I shall be saved." It is prompted by the same feeling. It means, "Save me from the enemies of my soul, from the devil and his crafts and assaults, from the snares of the world around me; and above all, save me from myself, my old self, my evil self, my deceitful and wicked heart."

Never be deterred from prayer by any state of mind. And while you are thus asking to be healed and saved, try and recall God's former mercies, and add, "For Thou art my praise." While you can find nothing in self to praise, you can always find plenty in God. The very act of dwelling on His attributes, His love, His mercy, His holiness, His past help in our hours of need, will increase our faith, and our expectation of present help, and will of itself exercise a healing effect on the soul.

Thoughts of the holy, loving God to whom we are appealing, will cast out evil, vain, worldly thoughts, which were perhaps troubling us before. "In Thy light we shall see light," says the Psalmist. Having poured out a hearty and believing prayer for healing, rise from your knees, cheered and comforted with the certainty that you will be healed and saved, and begin already to say to the Lord "Thou art my praise."

Sabbath Thoughts.

THE STORMY WIND FULFILLING HIS WORD.

"Who walketh upon the wings of the wind."—Psa. civ. 13.

WE may always believe that the stormy wind fulfils God's word, but sometimes we are allowed to see as well as to believe that it is so.

Take, for example, the case of Jonah. In opposition to God's command, he refused to go to Nineveh, and went into a ship to go to Tarshish in order to flee, as he vainly thought, from the presence of the Lord. "But the Lord sent out a great wind into the sea; and there was a mighty tempest in the sea;" Jonah's purpose was frustrated; his disobedience was punished; a great lesson was given not to him only, but to all who sailed with him; he was prepared, by a strange and effective discipline for his mission to Nineveh; and the mighty wind that changed his life and his career has been recorded for the instruction of all lovers of the word of God as a memorable instance of the Lord's dealings, never to be forgotten by His Church.

Turn now to the gospels, and we shall find in the Saviour's own history some remarkable instances of the wind obeying His voice. On one occasion, when the disciples in their little fishing-boat were abroad on the waters of the Lake of Galilee, storm and tempest arose. "The ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves: for the wind was contrary" (Matt. xiv. 24). Then it was that Jesus came to them walking on the waters, and at His voice, as soon as He and Peter had entered into the ship, "the wind ceased," that wind which had indeed been contrary to the disciples before, but was only fulfilling, as an obedient servant, the commands of its Lord both when it raged and when it fell.

A similar storm is described by Mark and the other evangelists, as being experienced by the disciples on the same sea, when the Saviour was on board their vessel, but asleep on a pillow. How grand was His rising! He spoke to the angry elements as their Lord and Master; "He rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm"—a calm not more great and solemn, more peaceful than that which His Spirit breathes into the heart when His voice is heard saying, "Peace, be still," to the tempest of passion and rebellion, and His own presence in the chastened soul tells that the storm of affliction has led to the cry for mercy never raised to Him in vain.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

APRIL 17.

THE PHARISEES REPROVED. LUKE xi. 37–54.

GOLDEN TEXT, MATT. xxiii. 3.—'All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say and do not.'

CONNECTION.—This is somewhat difficult, as the discourse with which the Lesson is closely connected (v. 37: As He spake) is given in substance by Matt. (xii. 22–45) and Mark (iii. 22–30); much earlier in our Lord's ministry. Accordingly, the passage is placed by Harmonists (as Robinson) before the sending out of the Twelve and the other occurrences that led up to the Transfiguration. On the other hand, the manner and severity of the denunciations are especially characteristic of Christ's later ministry, when the opposition of His enemies had become more bitter, and the time had come for the full utterance of 'Woe!' to a guilty people. We see reason then, on the whole, for assigning the discourse to the period immediately succeeding Christ's visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles. Whether he had left the neighbourhood of the City for Perœa there is nothing to show. It is observable that much in the present Lesson was repeated by our Lord during His last days in Jerusalem (Matt. xxiii.), a decided instance of the same discourse being given by Him, in varied forms, on different occasions.

I. PURIFICATION.—Read vers. 37–41. A certain Pharisee, like Simon, ch. vii. 36. To dine, rather, to lunch. The word denotes the midday meal. Sat down (reclined) to meat (food), took his place on the couch at once, without any formalities. At this the Pharisee was shocked, or pretended to be so. For what reason? What were the customs of the strict party among the Jews before meals? See Mark vii. 3. Our Lord purposely omitted this ablution. The act was one of superstition rather than of cleanliness. He knew the character of those with whom He had to deal, He knew also, as appeared afterwards (vers. 53, 54), that the invitation was given with no friendly purpose; and His omission was a parable in act. His host marvelled, no doubt expressing his astonishment in some discourteous way. Then our Lord spoke with terrible indignation! The cleansing was all outside. The washed and polished goblet was full of foulness and poison! Such was the contrast between the outer and the inner life of those Pharisees. Ravening means plunder; covetousness and extortion were among the great sins of the class (ch. xx. 47.) Ye fools! To neglect the spirit for the form is utter folly in the sight of Him who made both. Give alms, etc. The one test of a change would be such overcoming of selfishness as would make them generous. So with the young ruler, ch. xviii. 22. Of such things as ye have, a phrase variously interpreted; but the true sense seems to be, according to your ability. And behold, all things are clean, i.e. your nature will be purified, not because of your almsgiving itself, but by the new spirit which shows itself in this new generosity. 'That which defiles is selfishness, that which purifies is the unselfishness of love.'

II. A THREEFOLD WOE TO THE PHARISEES.—Read vers. 42–44. Here we have a sketch of the Pharisaic character in three several points. 1. Scrupulousness about trifles and neglect of the highest obligation. Mint, rue, etc., the smallest garden produce. The Law enjoined tithes to be given of 'corn, wine and oil' (Deut. xii. 17), but the Jewish ritualists, perhaps interpreting 'seed' (Lev. xxvii. 30) quite literally, were punctilious in setting aside every tenth stalk of the commonest herb for the priesthood. Nor was this in itself objectionable. (Little duties are in their way important), but when judgment (righteousness) and love were at the same time neglected, this precision became contemptible hypocrisy. See James i. 27, where the word for 'religion' means ceremonial or 'sacrificial service.' This is Christian ritualism: purity and charity. 2. Overweening desire for preeminence. The uppermost seats in the synagogues were the platform seats (as we should say) ranged in a semi-circle fronting the congregation. Here the chief men of the town or village sat, on each side of the chest which contained the roll of the Law. Greetings in the markets or streets were the homage paid to superiors. These were formal and elaborate to an extreme. 3. Unsuspected impurity. Our Lord in His later discourse called the Pharisees 'whited sepulchres,' Matt. xxiii. 27. Graves level with the ground were marked by whitewash, that no one might step on them and so be ceremonially polluted. This was renewed yearly in the spring; our Lord here speaks of it as worn away, leaving the soil or grass apparently like the rest. But beneath are the rotting bones, and he who passes that way is unconsciously defiled. So in the hearts of these hypocrites there was a silent unsuspected world of iniquity; and they corrupted those who came unwittingly within their evil influence, as their young disciples, etc.

III. A THREEFOLD WOE TO THE LAWYERS.—Read vers. 45–52. The lawyers were a class of scribes whose business it was to expound the moral and ritual Law. One of them was brought before us in the previous Lesson. Here another makes common cause with the Pharisees, and brings down upon himself and his class a corresponding sentence. 1. The first crime charged against them, was laying on others obligations which they themselves evaded. These burdens were those of duty and service. In the later Discourse (the Golden Text) our Lord's words are They say, and do not. There our Lord is careful to recognise the importance of the precepts themselves, at least to a certain extent—'Do as they say, but not as they do.' This was to the people; but now, more directly, the teachers themselves are reproached for their tyranny and insincerity. Many things in the requirements of the Jewish teachers were unbearable from their severity, Acts xv. 10. 2. Next, they are charged with a persecuting spirit. Strange contrast between the honour paid the dead and the treatment of the living! To our own day there remain in the Valley of Jehoshaphat some of the stately sepulchres of the prophets built in the ancient days by the Jews.* Your fathers killed them; and you, though you build their sepulchres, are your fathers' true children still! Our Lord discerned the persecuting spirit already at work, the spirit which was so soon to bring Him to the cross, and which His followers would have to encounter. To this the following words refer. The Wisdom of God: either the Spirit of inspiration speaking in the Old Testament generally, or the Divine Voice in Christ Himself. The latter seems the right interpretation. The words were afterwards uttered again by Jesus (Matt. xxiii. 34) with the solemn I say unto you. He predicts the persecutions that should befal His first followers—persecutions which should as it were gather up all the malignity of the past, and concentrate on that generation the result of ages of cruel opposition to God's messengers. See Acts vii. 52, where Stephen in like manner charges the Jews with endorsing and repeating the deeds of their fathers (1 Thess. i. 14, 15). Abel . . . unto Zacharias,—the first recorded martyrdom in the Old Testament, and the last. For the death of this Zechariah by command of Joash, see 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21. In Matt. xxiii. 35, he is called the 'son of Barachias,' a mistaken marginal note having anciently been inserted by some copyist in the text. Zechariah the prophet, the son of Berechiah, was an entirely different person. The martyr Zechariah was the son of Jehoiada. His last words were, The Lord look upon it and require it! So of Abel's death, The voice of his blood crieth unto Me from the ground! utterances to which this "woe" of Jesus is a solemn response. Between the altar of burnt-offering and the temple, the Sanctuary. 3. The third charge against the lawyers is that of arrogant exclusiveness. Ye have taken away the key of knowledge, have denied the people access to the treasures of heavenly wisdom. It was the business of the Scribes to open the stores of knowledge. Hence their emblem was a key. Compare Matt. xiii. 52. See, on the contrary, the supercilious language of the Pharisees, 'This people, that knoweth not the Law, is cursed,' John vii. 49. If the people did not know, whose fault was it? It is added that these Scribes themselves are ignorant. Ye entered not in yourselves. Not those who really know, but only those who pretend, endeavour to keep others in darkness. True knowledge, especially of the ways of God, makes a man generous and large-hearted. There is a longing to share with others the heavenly treasure.

IV. Plotting of the Scribes and Pharisees.—Read vers. 53, 54. As He said these things unto them. The best copies here read, 'When He was gone out thence.' So Alford, etc. Jesus rose from the table and went forth, followed by those whose anger had been aroused by His words of woe. They began to urge Him vehemently, eagerly, fiercely, and to provoke Him—proposing to Him 'catch-questions,' as afterwards, ch. xx. 20; Mark xii. 13, to entrap Him if they could into some unguarded utterance, that they might have ground of procedure against Him. No doubt the very invitation of the Pharisee had been part of the plot; and the whole occurrence is noticeable as having been the first deliberate and combined manifestation of hostility against Jesus. Yet His enemies were compelled to proceed by craft rather than by open force—the next verse (ch. xii. 1) showing a popularity that would have rendered it unsafe to use any violence.

Questions.

1. Are there any other instances in our Lord's ministry of the substantial repetition of a discourse?

2. What do we learn from the Gospels of the ceremonial ablutions practised by the Pharisees?

3. Show by citation of passages from Christ's discourses that hypocrisy was the one sin most hateful to Him.

4. On what occasions did He pronounce woes against His hearers?

5. Name the chief martyrs of the Old Testament times.

6. What light is here thrown upon the gift of 'the keys' to the Apostle Peter (Matt. xvi. 19)?

A SHAWL FOR MOTHER.

II.

JUST now it was little wonder that Neddy should feel that all things were against him, and that he should be altogether overpowered by despondency. All places but the Manor garden had been closed against him before, and now he had just been told that even those gates were to be shut to him for some time to come!

Mrs. Anderson's heart smote her as she thought of the hasty message she had sent down an hour ago to the young boy who had not come as a beggar, for which his infirmities might even have been fair excuse, but with an entreaty to be allowed to work. She heartily wished that she could recall that message, and blot out, as though it had never been, the consequent sorrowful hour that the widow's child had suffered.

But Mrs. Anderson's pitying and self-accusing thoughts were all suddenly put to flight by a new circumstance. Excitable, sympathetic little Gerty found the present aspect of affairs quite too much for her feelings, and after giving one or two premonitory sniffs, she suddenly broke into a most doleful sort of howl, following it up by exclaiming passionately and peremptorily,

"Mamma, don't! You mustn't look like that, mamma. You mustn't cry any more, Neddy. Tell him he mustn't cry, mamma. Don't let him."

Gerty's commands proved wonderfully successful. Neddy was so startled that he did leave off crying, and looked up with an astonished stare, while a smile struggled into Mrs. Anderson's face as she drew her little daughter to her, and began to stroke the hot cheeks soothingly.

Then Neddy gathered up his money from one tree stump, and swept the fir-cones off the other, and the whole party sat down to carry on the conversation more at their ease. It need scarcely be said that before that talk was over there were smiles on every face taking the place of tears.

Although no more help was wanted in the garden just now, there was some one at the present moment in the Manor household who was much in need of a little assistance, and such assistance as even the lame Neddy could give. The boy who cleaned the knives and forks, and boots and shoes, had cut his hand very badly the day before, and although the other servants were very willing under the circumstances to perform his duties for him, it would be quite as well to provide a regular substitute for the next few days.

"So," said Mrs. Anderson to little Steadman, "if you like to do that work, for the next week to come, for two shillings, you are very welcome, and it will be a real relief to me, although the matter had escaped my memory when you came up, a while since, to ask for employment. I have little doubt that in the meanwhile we shall think of something else in which you can help us after James is able to do his own work again."

And then Mrs. Anderson sprang up from her seat with the wish to hurry away from the burst of grateful, almost incoherent, thanks which Neddy was pouring forth with flushed cheeks and glowing eyes.

But after all, she did not get away so quickly as she had intended. Florry ran to her whispering rather enigmatically:

"Please, mamma, here's the bag, and couldn't we leave it here. There won't anyway be time to get to the top of Redstone Hill now, and I'm sure there's enough for all, for Harry said you put in a great deal, and the bag is so heavy."

Harry and Gerty heard part of Florry's request, and the sight of the cake bag, which she held up to enforce it, told them the rest, and they at once eagerly seconded the petition, Harry turning to Ned, almost before his mamma had time to give her ready consent, to exclaim:

"Neddy, Neddy, you're going to have a picnic with us! That's another good thing. You can't think how—how—jolly—picnics are."

Perhaps Harry would have been rather surprised and disappointed if any one had told him that the orphan boy knew more about picnics of some sort than he did himself, that most of his meals were eaten out of doors—that is to say, that Neddy used generally to carry the dinner, slices of dry bread, to a field in the neighbourhood of the place where his mother might be at work, and there at midday she used to join him, and the two would eat their poor meal together, quite happy in each other's society.

But whether or no a knowledge of these facts would have disappointed Harry Anderson, he was most thoroughly satisfied with the guest's appreciation of the good things that came out of that well-stuffed bag. So generously, indeed, had it been filled, that when the pleasant meal was ended, to the perfect satisfaction of all the feasters, there were still apples, cake, and jam-puffs for bestowal upon Neddy to carry home to his mother.

When he kissed her before he slept that night, he said with a deep, sweet thrill of joyousness in his voice:

"Oh, mother darling, isn't our heavenly Father good to us? If He gives me many more such happy days as this has been, I expect I shall be learning to jump and dance in spite of my lame leg."

III.

The hot summer days were passed—autumn had given place to winter. While the three Andersons are giving utterance to little growls about the chillness of the morning, the discomfort of which they feel as little as most people, seeing that a good portion of warmth from the big nursery fire has been stealing into their snugly-curtained rooms for an hour past, Mrs. Steadman and Neddy are standing together shivering, without growling, in their utterly fireless, thin-walled little cottage.

The widow had wisely put into a coal club during the summer months, and she and Ned could certainly have had a fire this bitter morning had they chosen, but, by the time it had burnt up they would both have had to leave it; and if they made spare now, they had agreed they might have a downright good blaze some Sunday when they were alone together in their little home.

And as Neddy looked round the mite of a living room, in his imagination he pictured the sparkling fire dancing over those bare walls and across the carpetless floor, and lighting up his mother's face, and he smiled happily, for to his mind that picture of his poverty-stricken little home was beautiful.

Then he turned back to his mother, and held up to her the pin to fasten the old rag of a shawl which was all the protection she had against the ice-laden blast blowing out of doors.

The mother took the pin, and doing so stooped to give her boy a good-bye kiss.

"Good-bye till night, my heart's treasure," she said fondly; "mind you get home before dark comes on, I get so afraid of your slipping this weather. And set light to the fire directly you come in; it's all ready, an' 'twill be cruel cold as the day wears. You'll do as I tell you, won't you, dear?"

"Yes, mother. Oh, yes, mother dear," answered Neddy, recovering from a sudden fit of abstraction into which he had fallen. "What is it, mother dear?"

Mrs. Steadman smiled in spite of her aching cold feet and fingers and longing for a cup of hot tea. "What is it?" she said, half laughing. "I believe it's that secret of yours that is filling your head too full even to let you listen to your mother."

Neddy's face flushed. "Oh, mother," he exclaimed quickly, and in a tone of some little pained reproach; "if my head is full of my secret it's only because it's all to do with——"

He stopped abruptly, checking himself with a sudden clenching together of his lips as if he were absolutely frightened lest another word should slip out between them in spite of him. Mrs. Steadman stared, as well she might at his agitation. Her boy had never hid a secret from her, of any kind, before the day he asked her to let his purpose with regard to his precious first earnings be a secret from her for a time. That had seemed to her queer enough, but as the cold weather had come on she had been still more surprised to note how careful he was not to let her know how many days he got work, or was forced to idle, and how carefully he hid up his savings from her.

But the mother could not feel hurt, for all these four months and more her child had showed her, if possible, even more loving care and tenderness than ever, and now, inquisitive as she could not help being as to what he was going to be about, she soon controlled herself, and giving him another kiss said:

"There, there, laddie, don't ye look downhearted at what I said. Whatever else your head may be full of, I know that it's full of love for me, an' that's all I care about."

Neddy clung to her a minute closely. "And you won't mind, mother, about my keeping my secret from you just a wee bit longer?"

"Nay, then, nay, my bonny, to be sure not. Keep it to ye for always if you will. Don't forget to light the fire when ye come back."

And with that parting injunction for her child's comfort Mrs. Steadman hurried off to the day's charing, payment for which was to provide the next dinner.

Three hours later, as she was shaking some mats in the yard of her employer's house, she saw the Andersons' carriage pass, well crowded with occupants. And she sent a silent blessing after them, for the kindness her child told her they had shown him during the past months. She would have been most wonderfully astounded had she known that comfortably seated in that handsome carriage, amidst the Andersons, was the little lame boy himself.

As the weeks had passed on, Mrs. Anderson, her husband, and her children had got more and more interested in the feeble but determined little worker, who would get through the tasks for which he was to be paid, and get through them well, however long they took him to accomplish. His last piece of employment had been dusting all the books in Mr. Anderson's library, a business that Mr. Anderson had never before entrusted to any hands but his own, and Neddy so fully justified the confidence placed in him that he was promised work of a similar kind another time.

One way or the other, week by week, ever since that picnic in Chesnut Wood, little Steadman had earned his weekly two shillings, and at last he had not only the tearfully-longed-for and prayed-for eight and sixpence with which to buy the red and black plaid shawl his mother had intended to buy for herself with the money she had laid out instead upon new clothes for him, but seventeen and sixpence besides.

"And all of it shall go for things for mother, please, ma'am," he said with his shy bright eyes lifted to Mrs. Anderson's sweet kind face, as she paid him the last week's well-earned wages.

And then they had had a quiet confidential chat together as to what the things were that "mother" most wanted, and how it would be best to get them, so as to prevent her knowing anything of the matter until the due time came for their presentation.

The upshot of the conference had been that instead of the eight shillings and sixpenny shawl, one of the same pattern, but twice as expensive and twice as warm, was to be bought, and the remainder of the money was to go towards the purchase of a good pair of serviceable boots. And still more, Neddy was to be driven into town with the other children, and to have the benefit of Mrs. Anderson's help and counsel in his shopping. And thus it was it came to pass that Neddy was in the Andersons' carriage when his mother looked after it, still pondering what her boy's little mystery might be, and if the three or four shillings he might perhaps have earned were to be spent upon some unusual luxury.

* * * *

Now it so happened that Mrs. Steadman's birthday fell near the end of the year. There was no particular reason why she should remember it. One day to her was very much like another. And yet she had always tried to contrive some little treat for Neddy on his birthday, and the child with natural inquisitiveness, would never quite let her forget her own. She was surprised, however, this morning to see through the half-open door of her room that a bright fire was already burning in the outer kitchen parlour.

The fact was that Neddy was in such a state of happy excitement that he had been hardly able to sleep all night, and he had felt it quite a relief to get up with the first faint twilight, and busy himself softly in making all the preparations possible for his mother's comfort.

She was scarcely dressed when a tap came to the door. "Who in the world can it be?" she exclaimed.

"Oh, I know, mother," answered Ned, breaking suddenly into a joyous peal of laughter, and hurrying to open the cottage door.

Two people stood there—the housemaid and the boy from the Manor House, both with full hands.

"We have come to wish you a pleasant time, Mrs. Steadman, and you, too, Neddy," they both exclaimed, as they stepped quickly in, and deposited their parcels on the table. Then, with a cheerful "Good-bye, we are wanted back again; we mustn't stay," they turned, shut the door after them, and ran home again across the snow, leaving Neddy stroking one of the parcels, and his mother staring in amazement at them all, if a covered dish of hot eggs and bacon on two big rounds of toast can be reckoned as a "parcel" at all.

But parcel or no parcel, the two people for whom that dish was intended said a very hearty thanksgiving over it, and enjoyed it thoroughly; and as for the other parcels, I will not tell you what was said and done about them between the widow and her only child, lest you might begin to cry as Mrs. Steadman did when she at length learnt the whole of her lame boy's loving secret.

It had been proposed by Neddy's kind friend that the shawl they had bought should be sent in the morning, so that it might come as a surprise to his mother. But Mrs. Anderson had another motive; she wished also to reward the little lame boy's self-denial by a gift much needed. In one parcel was the widow's shawl, bought with the children's money which he would not take in the place of work, in another boots for the boy. That was indeed a happy morning. As the two sat down to their frugal meal, they felt as rich in their mutual love as if they had been possessors of unlimited wealth. Nor did they forget to render thanks unto their Father in heaven, from whom descendeth every good and perfect gift.

   One only is each creature's due,
   But once young David carried two;
   While beasts, in vision, might have seven,
   But John without one went to heaven.

2. My next may be by estimation
   The costliest thing in all creation;
   Yet from a common rock 'twas riven,
   And caused the death of holy Stephen:
   'Tis rough or polished, round or squared,
   With hardest substances compared;
   Man's heart resembles it too oft,
   And only God can make it soft.

3. Now for my whole, 'tis God's Anointed,
   For nature's grandest place appointed;
   By Israel's builders first rejected,
   Then for the sovereign power selected:
   By Jews and Gentiles cursed and slain,
   By God's own power He lives again,
   Exalted high for evermore;
   O may our souls His name adore!

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

HIS ONLY INHERITANCE. [A. M. Rossi.

His only Inheritance.

IF any gaze upon my pictured theme
(Yon ragged mortal perched beside the wall)
And smile in ridicule, as who would deem
So mean a subject worth no thought at all,
How little have they felt or understood
The links that bind us in one brotherhood.

Therefore to these I speak not; pride of station,
Some giddy pinnacle they lived to win,
Removes from them the wonderful vibration
Of that dear touch which "makes the whole world kin;"
Can it be thus? No—no—I speak to all,
Since none is free from Nature's subtle thrall.

Look where the little urchin, wrapped in thought,
Would that his garments wrapped him half as well—
Enjoys a transient gleam of pleasure caught
From his brief past. That boyish heart must swell
Often with grief and fear; now for a space
He's happy, gazing on his mother's face.

'Tis not the friendly sun he feels above him,
Nay, but her kiss that thrills him with delight;
Poor mother! you were all he had to love him,
So we may gather from his woeful plight.
O that strong love—whose influence remains
For ever in the breast where once it reigns.

Hence comes it with this poor possession left
Which gives him back the semblance of her smile,
The child of sorrow lonely and bereft
Cheats his grim guardian a little while;
Proving the poorest garb, the meanest form,
May hide a soul gentle and true and warm.

Haply she was not fair nor even comely;
Only his mother, and her lips are mute.*
His mother! tender word, so sweet, so homely;
And dead—ah, there's the "rift within the lute."
From rich to poor a bond of union goes,
And sympathy takes root in common woes.

THROUGH THE LINN.

CHAPTER III.—DREAM AND REALITY.

TWENTY-FOUR hours had passed away since Lettice, in gladness of heart, had trodden the path between the Vicarage and her own home, when before the front door of that home stopped a fly with a small portmanteau on the box.

"Shall I ring, sir?" asked the man, coming to the window.

"No—yes—no, thank you," responded Mr. Temple's thin nervous tones. "Shutters all closed—dear, dear, how sad. No, thank you, I will just get out and ring—less flurry that way. Open the door, if you please."

Vandal stepped out slowly, bearing in one hand his best hat-box, in the other a roll of shawls. He put them down upon the upper step, pulled the bell-handle, and stood shivering in the chilly breeze. Fraser speedily responded to the distant tinkle.

"Is—is—Mrs. Majendie—I mean—can I see Miss Majendie?" asked Vandal, scarcely knowing how to frame the question.

"Miss Majendie and Miss Violet are at the Vicarage," said Fraser in a low voice.

"Indeed! At the Vicarage?"

"They went this morning—I mean Miss Majendie did. Miss Violet was taken last night. Will you step in, sir?—I believe it is Mr Temple?"

"Yes—yes; and you have not forgotten me? I remember you, Fraser, all these years. But tell me—how is—how is Mrs. Majendie?"

Fraser made no answer. There was an attempt only at speech, voice failing him.

"I see, I see," said Vandal, stepping forward, and laying kindly on the man's arm his little thin girlish-looking hand. "Yes, I see, and I feared as much. But it is heavy upon you. And you have been a faithful servant to them for so long."

"Twenty years and over I've lived here, sir; and a man never had better master nor——"

Fraser fairly broke down and turned away.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said huskily, recovering himself. "I'll call Mrs. Deane, sir, if you please; you'll remember Mrs. Deane, maybe. Will you step into the drawing-room, please, sir?"

Mr. Temple followed, treading softly, into the darkened parlour. He sat down there in an easy-chair, with an oppressed and distressed look, waiting for the advent of Mrs. Deane. She came in speedily, a plump matronly person with a pleasant face; but, as with Fraser, her usual colour was lessened, her usual cheeriness was under a cloud. Her busy step had grown slow, and her whole look was sorely downcast.

"This is very sad, very melancholy, Mrs. Deane. I could not have believed it! Mrs. Majendie too!—so soon—poor things!"

"My mistress didn't live many hours after poor master, sir," said the housekeeper sorrowfully. "It was too much for her, you see, sir, coming in and finding him like that. We all knew she was delicate, and couldn't stand much; and never was one more tenderly sheltered than she has been. But nobody ever dreamt such a thing as master having heart-disease."

"Does the doctor suppose it to have been that?" asked Mr. Temple.

"He says so, sir, and I suppose he ought to know. I don't see for my part what else it could be. Master wasn't one, as you may say, to care so much for his worldly goods that he couldn't live without them. I think he would have borne it as brave as any man if he had but had a word of warning. It was the suddenness of it that struck him down. You see, sir, he didn't see the paper that day—yesterday I mean, only it seems so long ago—he didn't see it at the usual time. The man forgot to leave it, or lost a copy, or something, and he brought it later, and Miss Majendie took it into the study, and stood talking to her father, little thinking they were the last words she would ever have with him. He must have opened it after she was gone, and just seen the bank had failed; and the doctor thinks the excitement was too much for him. It was just the loss of everything to him, so they say; but Fraser and I, we don't think it was that master wouldn't have borne up under the loss, only it was the shock, and his poor heart wasn't in a state to bear it."

"No, no—I understand," said Mr. Temple. "Mr. Majendie was a good man—poor fellow—and he would have recognised God's hand with submission. Yes, I am sure he would. But with Mrs. Majendie—was it heart-disease in her case also?"

"I don't really know exactly, indeed sir, only she's not been strong for years; and when she went in, and found master dead—poor master!—she just seems to have knelt down beside him, and gone off unconscious. They couldn't bring her properly to again. She just lingered on for ten or twelve hours, and the doctor wasn't without hope for a while that she might struggle through, but she never really rallied. I only know she never spoke again. It was terrible to see her suffer for some hours, but they said she looked up at last, and gave Miss Lettice one of her sweetest smiles, and then seemed to die off like a little child, with a sort of tired sigh. I wasn't in the room just then, but I'd been in a deal."

Mrs. Deane sobbed aloud for some seconds.

"You'll excuse me, sir," she faltered, trying to recover herself. "We have been so happy all together—and it's heart-breaking work. But God knows best, and some day maybe we'll see the reason. Maybe you'd like just to step across and look in the study."

Mr. Temple felt shaken, and rather shrank from the move, but he would not refuse what she evidently wished. He went slowly after her across the passage, and stood in the deserted room, listening mournfully, while Mrs. Deane enlarged on all items of the scene which had taken place there a few hours earlier. This was the chair, and that was how Mr. Majendie had sat, and here his hand had grasped the fatal paper, and there Mrs. Majendie had sunk down beside him. It seemed a relief to Mrs. Deane to expatiate on the particulars which another in her position could scarcely have borne to face. Mr. Temple found it far from a relief to listen, however.

"And Miss Majendie and Miss Violet? How about those poor children?" he asked, hoping to give a turn to the conversation.

"Well, sir, Miss Majendie did keep up wonderful, and I must say it. She had her wits all about her, like a woman of forty, and wouldn't allow no screaming, and had her mother carried upstairs, and poor master laid on the sofa, and the doctor sent for, and everything tried that could be tried, without one bit of hesitation. We just had all to do what she told us. Mrs. Canynge wasn't long in coming, and she had poor little Miss Violet taken straight off to the Vicarage, with Anne to see after her, for the child was sobbing herself ill, and nobody able to give her a thought. Miss Lettice never left her mother's side till all was over. And then she came downstairs, as steady as could be, and spoke to Fraser and me, and asked about Miss Violet, and went into the study, and looked with her own eyes at the paper lying there on the table. I don't know as she had taken in before about the failure of the bank, and the loss of the money, but I heard her say in a sort of hopeless way to Mr. Canynge, who was by her, 'It doesn't make any difference; everything is gone now;' and he said, 'Not everything,' and she said, 'Yes, everything was, except Miss Violet; and Miss Violet would die of grief too.' He told her she must comfort Miss Violet, and with that she came to me, looking so dazed and white, poor dear, and took both my hands, and said, 'Mrs. Deane, I'm going to Miss Violet; she is all I have now, and I must comfort her!' And I was crying so, I couldn't speak; and all at once Miss Lettice went off into such an agony of sobbing, I never heard anything like it—no, never, and I hope I never shall again," said Mrs. Deane, sobbing herself at the recollection. "It never stopped for two hours, and nothing we could do or say touched her. I almost thought she would die too, but Mr. and Mrs. Canynge they said it was better than the calm before. And when it was over she did look a bit more natural-like, and they took her straight off to the Vicarage, and put her to bed with Miss Violet; and I couldn't help thinking it was God's mercy, when I heard the poor dears were both sleeping, with their arms round one another. But it's very terrible, sir. Miss Lettice is scarce more than a child, and has never known the meaning of sorrow before."

"Does Miss Majendie expect me?" asked Vandal, after a pause in token of sympathy.

"I don't know about Miss Majendie, sir, but Mr. Canynge does, for he told me he had got your telegram. They are rather put to it for beds at the Vicarage, but he told me to say they would give you a corner somehow, if you didn't mind being cramped —unless you should so happen to be as well content here. There is room enough, and we would do our best to make you comfortable; but it is dull and sad, and you would maybe prefer the other."

"Not at all—not on any account. They have trouble enough already, and for myself I prefer the quiet. A house cannot be too still for me. The house of mourning is better than the house of feasting, you know,—not that the Vicarage is in any sense that just now. Perhaps I had better step across to the Vicarage, and have a word with Mr. Canynge. I am greatly fatigued, so I shall not be long. I think I will ask you, while I am gone, kindly to prepare for me—or after I return, rather, since it will not take long——"

"Some tea, sir? And perhaps a mutton-chop after your journey."

Vandal shuddered. "Tea, no! I never touch tea, never! Poison—rank poison—a slow poison, Mrs. Deane. No, no tea for me, or mutton-chops either. A little gruel, very carefully made—just a teacupful. You don't happen to have a tin of rusks in the house?—no, of course not. Well, well, just a tiny piece of dry toast, two inches square. I shall need nothing else to-night. I never eat much. Thank you; I am sorry to give you the trouble. Gruel very thin and very hot, please; but I think you had better not make it till I return, since I cannot time myself to the moment."

Lettice was able to come downstairs for a cup of tea that afternoon. It was strange, perhaps, but the blow did not seem to have affected her health. Though the brunt of the shock had fallen on her, and she had sheltered Violet, yet Lettice was not ill, while the younger child was shaken and unhinged to a degree which caused grave uneasiness. Lettice had slept through many hours, after her one passionate outbreak of sorrow; and since waking she had sat for hours more on Violet's bed, holding the child in her arms, soothing her grief and restlessness, even singing softly to her sometimes. Violet was at length sleeping again, a flushed and uneasy sleep, and Mrs. Canynge with difficulty persuaded Lettice to leave Anne beside the little slumberer. Lettice consented only under condition of being called the moment Violet should awake, and followed her friend downstairs.

Mr. Canynge was out, paying a necessary parish visit. The kettle boiled busily on the fire, and Mrs. Canynge's dainty gilt-edged china service for three stood on her low basket work-table. Lettice was well used to all this. The one item in the scene utterly changed seemed to her to be herself. Was she verily the same girl who had sat beside Mrs. Canynge not twenty-four hours earlier, talking lightly of her own sunny life? The same? Lettice paused on the rug, and gazed listlessly at her own face in the glass over the mantelpiece, a face set in lines of rigid mournfulness.

Mrs. Canynge came and took both her hands, seating her in Mr. Canynge's large armchair.

"Now, my dearie, you are going to have a cup of tea, and some thin bread and butter. Violet will not wake yet."

"I don't think I can eat, Aunt Jeannie."

"I think you can. For the sake of that poor child upstairs you have to keep up your strength."

Lettice lifted her dry eyes slowly. "Poor little Violet! Isn't it strange that I can see her cry so, and not cry myself? But I don't seem to have any tears or any feeling left. I have been wondering to-day if I shall ever cry or smile again."

"There is nothing more benumbing than a heavy blow," said Mrs. Canynge. "And I think you have cried away all your tears this morning."

"Did I? I remember crying once, but was that only this morning? Yes, I remember. It seems a week ago."

Mrs. Canynge silently poured out and gave her the tea. Lettice ate and drank as she was told with the submission of utter indifference. Then she sat, with her cheek resting against Mrs. Canynge's hands, and her eyes watching the fire.

"Is it all true?" she said presently. "Aunt Jeannie—are you sure it is true? May it not be some horrible dream? I can't believe—I can't see it to be real."

"My poor darling!" was all Mrs. Canynge could say.

"We can't both be dreaming the same dream, can we?" said Lettice, looking in her face. "But I might only fancy you to be sitting here and talking to me. I have wondered so often to-day whether after all I may not wake up and find the whole a dream."

"It is true, Lettice—all too true, my poor child."

"Yes—so I know really. Only when their faces and voices come before me, I can't always believe it. It seems too terrible. And yet I am not all selfish," said Lettice, with a strange expression. "I have been thinking that it is best for them—for them, Aunt Jeannie. He would have grieved so to leave our home—and mother—mother could not have lived without him. I can see that, and I can quite believe that it was in love to them that God took both together. Not love to me, but love to them. Isn't it strange that I can talk of them so quietly? But I feel as if it had all happened a year ago at least, and as if I had grown old since. If only I could be sure that I should see them again."

"The same way by which they went is open to thee," whispered Mrs. Canynge, dropping tears freely, while Lettice was calm.

"Yes—in a sense I suppose. But you don't know how this has seemed to put me far far away from God. I suppose I was so before, only I did not know it. I have loved all that was mine first, and Him second—and that isn't real love to Him at all."

"But He has loved you first, Lettice. I for my part can see no mockery in a sorrow-stricken child creeping back to its father's arms," said Mrs.

Canynge. "My dear, do not listen to the voice of the Tempter. It may be no lesser blow could have brought you back, but you'll come now—all the more instead of the less because you haven't anything else to cling to."

Lettice made a sorrowful motion of dissent or hopelessness, and then gave a nervous start. "Someone is coming," she said.

"Only John." And it proved to be Mr. Canynge, but not Mr. Canynge only. Behind the tall vicar came, hesitatingly and deprecatingly, the little figure of Vandal Temple.

"My dear, Mr. Temple and I met outside, so I brought him in at once. Lettice here! I did not know."

He had not expected to find her there. She gave him one look, held out an ice-cold hand to Mr. Temple, and went from the room without a word.

"Best so—don't keep her," said Mr. Canynge. "I had no idea we should find her downstairs. Poor child! You come to a sorrow-stricken village, Mr. Temple. The hand of God has visited us heavily. Mr. and Mrs. Majendie have been friends to all around them, and if you were to go with me to-day from cottage to cottage, you would be under the impression that in every house there must be one lying dead. It is heart-aching work."

"How does Miss Majendie bear up?" asked Vandal, after declining anew a cup of tea.

"Lettice! Wonderfully so far! Hers is a strong nature, body and mind too. A blow of this description must leave its effects somewhere, whether on health or character or both—where I don't yet know. At present she seems to concentrate all her thoughts on her little sister. I doubt if she has at all faced her position."

"The longer we can keep her from looking forward, the better," remarked Mrs. Canynge.

"Well, yes, within certain limits. We are anxious to keep them for a month or six weeks before they go to —to Brentwood. It will break the change for them."

Mrs. Canynge had pleaded for three months, but her husband counted this undesirable. It would only be making a fresh home, he said, to be afresh quitted —only riveting new ties to be anew sundered.

The reference to Brentwood was of deliberate purpose. Mr. Canynge saw a slight change pass over his visitor's face. Vandal woke to the fact that the responsibility of the girls' future would rest upon himself and his sister. He said dubiously, "You are not, I suppose, aware what provision has been made for them!"

"But for this failure, they would have been left in positive luxury. Now, I fear, the whole will be swept away. I should not be surprised to find, when all demands have been answered, that the two are completely penniless. I suppose you are aware, Mr. Temple, that your sister is their appointed guardian."

"I—no—no, I did not know it. My sister alone?"

"I believe your name was added later. It was no doubt to your sister that Mr. Majendie looked for a mother's care, if anything should happen to himself and his wife."

"True—yes—just so," faltered Vandal, in sore perplexity, for he was utterly in the dark as to what his sister would say. He began to wish he had allowed her to come with him.

"Your sister appears to be absolutely the only remaining relative of the girls, unless we may count you another. Lettice might, it is true, fight her way in life as a governess. She has not been trained for it; still, she is clever and well read. But that would involve separation from Violet, and I verily believe that under such a separation the little one would pine away. She is a most frail child, and seems to be completely devoted to her elder sister."

"No one—I am sure—no one could think of separating the two," said Vandal. His one aim throughout the conversation following was to avoid committing himself by the giving of advice or promise. By answering vaguely and shortening his stay as much as possible, he escaped the danger he dreaded. "I will write to my sister," were his parting words. And write he did, that very night, despite fatigue, in his extreme anxiety to let her decide for herself. He disposed of his gruel first, regretfully conscious that it was not prepared by the accustomed hand. Then, with some groans over the necessity, he indited the following letter, in his tiny prim copper-plate writing:

"My dear Sister,

"I have arrived safely after a most fatiguing journey, and found, alas, that Mrs. Majendie only survived her husband a few hours. Your—perhaps I should say our—two young cousins are at the Vicarage, well cared for by kind friends.

"Richard Majendie appears to have died suddenly on seeing the tidings of the bank failure. Mrs. Majendie found him dead in the study, and never rallied from the blow. I would write more fully, but I am greatly over-fatigued, and feel myself far from well. Travelling is a serious matter for people in my state of health.

"Mr. Canynge informs me that Lettice and Violet are left to your guardianship. He had this knowledge from Mr. Majendie. The will has not yet been read. They have no house but yours to go to. I have avoided making any promises, but I can see no other plan to be possible. I am willing to take my share—a definite share—of the burden, by paying you the sum of 50*l.* per annum towards their support. I feel no doubt as to your decision in this matter. It seems to be God's will that you should undertake the charge of these unhappy orphans. No doubt you will find your reward in the interest of their companionship.

"The only other alternative would be for Lettice to become a governess, but Mr. Canynge does not think the little girl's health would endure the separation from her sister. They appear to be warmly attached, judging from accounts. Lettice is a fine-looking girl.

"Excuse more, as I am really unequal to further exertion.—Your affectionate brother,

"V. T."

Miss Temple's answer came by return of post. The sheet was somewhat besprinkled with ink spots, and the handwriting showed excitement:

"My dear Vandal,

"Your letter shocked me dreadfully, I couldn't have believed such a thing. Both dead in one day! it is quite unnatural, and I do not understand it at all, and I feel sure somebody must be to blame. Why did they not get a doctor sooner?—or give some restoratives?—it seems so extraordinary, people never know what to do in an emergency, it was very wrong indeed that the news of the failure was not broken to him more cautiously, and what could Lettice have been about to let her mother go and find her father like that? Of course it was enough to kill her, such a shock would kill me any day, people can't stand the sort of thing, and Lettice is old enough to have managed better, it is very distressing. You seem to take it very quietly for granted that I am to give a home to the two girls, whether or no they have a penny of their own, but it is not quite so easy a matter as all that, I am not rich, and this failure robs me of fifty pounds all at once. Fifty pounds is no small matter, as you seem aware when you talk of sparing it out of your own income, I am sure I do not know what is to be done, and I do not see at all why Richard made me their guardian, he never showed any particular liking for me or confidence in me before, I am sure, but I suppose it was just because there was nobody else he could turn to. Of course Lettice cannot go out as governess, the idea is absurd, the Temples have not come to that yet. I hope, if the idea is mentioned that you will say I could not consent to it for a moment, I don't see why those friends at the Vicarage should not keep the girls, it would seem quite natural so much as they have been thrown together, but friends often make a great profession, and fail just at a pinch, I am sure I do not know what is to be done, of course they must go somewhere, and I suppose it would be thought odd if I did not have them, it is very trying that is all I can say, Lettice was not at all a pleasant child so I hope she may have improved. I shall not give up the spare room of course, they must sleep in the room next to the servants, it is quite comfortable. I hope you will send further particulars directly, and all about how soon it must be, for you do not tell anything, and I am all in a flutter, and I do not know what has to be arranged. Believe me, my dear Vandal,—Your very affectionate sister,

"Selina Temple."

"Singular that she never understands the proper use of the comma," sighed Vandal, after wading through this effusion.

LIFE MORE ABOUNDING.

AN EASTER MEDITATION.

"I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."—John x. 10.

THESE words of promise are sealed by the fact of the resurrection. As first spoken, they illustrate how often a truth is greater than its setting. They form part of the parable of the Good Shepherd, and in that association may be interpreted as a promise of pasturage and defence to the flock. He shall lead them beside the still waters, and make them to lie down in green pastures; and his own strong arm shall be their protection against the ravening wolf as well as against all "thieves and robbers." Beautiful images are these of peace and safety, an assurance of hope to those who wander in desert places, and suffer from perpetual alarm or cruel assault. But the words have much wider scope; they cannot be limited by any figure or parable; they are burdened with the fulness of a Divine revelation.

Never man spake like this man. St. Paul wrote: "The life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me, and gave himself for me." The saintliest, the noblest of men could not say more. But Jesus Christ declares with communicative energy: "I am come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly." He is bread of life, He is water of life, He is vine of life. All his miracles declare it. He gave sight to the blind, with all the abundance of fresh thought and feeling that the outer world inspires. The lame man moved with a new alacrity, the palsied recovered strength, and "many that were sick of divers diseases" lived again in perfected health. The very dead rose from the bier or came forth from the tomb at his word. "I am come that they might have life." His deeds attest it. All these miracles—even the multiplication of the loaves—are increase of life. And yet the greatest miracle does not unveil the full abounding, eternal life which Christ came to bestow; it is but symbol, pledge, promise of still more glorious things.

This offer of life is in compassionate response to human needs; it is in harmony also with man's aspirations. How many of our activities have expansion of life as their aim; the development or enlargement of nature's resources. Yet what multitudes languish in the struggle for existence! How the soul shares the infirmities of the body!

> "'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
> Oh life! not death for which we pant,
> More life and fuller that we want."

When death approaches, how is this cry silenced in profounder questionings, to which there is no sufficient answer but in the resurrection of Christ.

The life that the gospel offers is not a life bounded by the years, with its best fruits to be plucked in death, and the grave as its final reality. Christ hath brought "life and immortality to light." "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me shall not die." It is characteristic of the hopes which the gospel inspires that these great words—the sublimest consolation ever uttered, the pathetic heritage of all the ages—should have been spoken first to a sorrowing woman alone by the wayside. So it is that Christ approaches the individual soul. He came not with vague generalities about the race, not with misty speculations about an uncertain future, but Himself embodied the truth He taught. He was Love incarnate; He was Life, the brightness of the eternal glory. "I lay down my life. . . I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." The ancient world had its conceptions, many and various, of other conditions of existence; its unseen divinities, its shadowy realms of the dead; its hierarchies of spirits; its visions of the judgment hall, and the purgatorial ages; its dreams of pre-existence; its doctrines of transmigration. And did not Plato discourse of immortality? But these religions and philosophies appear as vanity before the full revelation of Jesus Christ. This is the supreme, peculiar fact, the seal of his teaching, greater than all the miracles: "He rose again the third day."

"I am come that they might have life." The power of the resurrection is in these words. It is the same Jesus who was to die and rise again that is speaking. "He was delivered for our offences; He was raised again for our justification." With Him our humanity shakes off the dust and lives. He comes that man may have life, by faith in His atonement. The sinful soul lies under condemnation, and must die: Christ opens the prison door, and bids it go forth in hope. All sin is limitation, but the salvation of the gospel means enlargement. It is the restoration of the inward nature to health. Christ finds the soul afflicted, and arrests the fatal disease. He discovers the rankling wounds and heals them. The conditions of life are changed at His coming; there is vitalising sunshine where before there was gloom. New impulses of hope begin to move, new fountains of joy to spring. There is "more life and fuller" wherever He appears. The contradictions of character are subdued or harmonised, and the soul is spared the waste of conflicting motives. The paralysis of doubt gives place to energy, which is the fruit of clear knowledge or clearer faith. In all these ways, and many more, Christ brings "life, and life more abundant" to His disciples. His processes are not always the same, they are sometimes acutely painful, but the end is "life." And in that hope the soul learns the lessons of patience and fortitude which shall prepare it for new activities. The very name Jesus is promise to His people. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus makes free from the law of sin and death.

The fulness of earthly blessing does not satisfy. There are moments when we feel within us strange possibilities of being—a life "more abundant" that is transient. A ravishing strain of music, for example, seems sometimes to lift us into a larger and more subtle sphere. Or we have gazed upon some beautiful landscape, or mountain scene, and found it for ever fixed in our memory by the intenser life in our look. The thrill of a great joy is a revelation of capacity. And who that has watched by the bedside of a dying friend, does not remember the awful intensity of those solemn hours? These moments of intenser life show us the reserve within. We begin to understand how

> "Man is one world,
> And hath another to attend him."

Faith also may have its hours of ecstasy, its days when familiar thoughts become instinct with divine power. But now the soul is bound by physical conditions. How shall it be when "the natural body is raised a spiritual body?" No experience qualifies us to answer. The imagination can but conjecture. Yet here the Divine promise has complete fulfilment. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." This is life triumphant. This is life sovereign—over death, and all that pertains to it. The intenser life of earth exhausts and wearies; the "abounding life" of heaven exalts and rejoices.

It is noticeable how the apostle Paul may be said to sum up his teaching on the blest estate in this idea of life—an abounding life, for ever with the Lord. Said one who was about to die, "Now I am going to begin to live." And another who has since passed within the veil pathetically expressed the same thought:—

> "On that wonderful day
> When I am still on the bed,
> Smile through your weeping and say:
> Gone by the upland way!
> Do not say I am dead.
>
> Say I am done with the flowers,
> Blown no sooner than shred
> Under the trampling hours;
> Tell of the windless bowers;
> Do not say I am dead.
>
> Speak of that life in the vast,
> Fresh from its Fountain and Head;
> Say, 'Tis the dying is past!
> Say, He is living at last!
> Do not say I am dead."

The words of lofty promise remain; they are for earth. We may whisper them over our battle-fields and in our charnel-houses, but the disciples of Christ know them to be true. They are for every sick-chamber and for every death-bed. They are for all whose task is difficult, or whose lot is hard; for all faint and weary ones; for souls oppressed and tempted, as well as for the stronger spirits whose busy energy needs refreshment. They are for all who can by faith receive them—the words of Him who "was dead and is alive for evermore:" "I am come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly."

MR. FRANK BUCKLAND ON FISHES.

THE completion of this volume* was the last labour of Mr. Buckland's busy and useful life. He could not have left a more fitting memorial. As Inspector of British Fisheries he obtained the official position for which his previous studies and pursuits had qualified him. Never were official duties performed with greater zeal and enthusiasm, and the annual reports of the Department had little of the Blue Book dulness about them. In this volume he has left on record his views as to the importance of the "Great Fish Farm" of Great Britain. Such another Director of this great industry will never be found, but even the most unqualified of officials cannot go far wrong if following the directions of the author of "British Fishes." But it is for a higher merit that we notice the work in these pages, and this will be best told in the author's own words:

"I have another object in writing this book; it is to endeavour to show the truth of the good old doctrines of the Bridgewater Treatises, which have so ably demonstrated the Power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation.

"Of late years the doctrines of so-called 'Evolution' and 'Development,' have seemingly gained ground amongst those interested in natural history; but, to put matters very straight, I steadfastly believe that the Great Creator, as indeed we are directly told, made all things perfect and 'very good' from the beginning; perfect and very good every created thing is now found to be, and will so continue to the end of time.

"I am very willing to prove my case by holding a court at any time or place, before any number of people of any class. I would empanel a jury of the most eminent and skilful railway and mechanical engineers, while the only witnesses I should call would be the fish fresh from the deep-sea trawler, the city fish-market, or the fishmonger's slab. I would adduce from them evidence of 'Design, Beauty, and Order,' as evinced in such as the electric organs of the torpedo—the gun-lock spine of the file-fish—the water reservoirs and spectacles of the eel—the teeth of the gilthead, bream, and throat-teeth of the carp and bream—the anchor of the lump-sucker and remora—the colouring of the perch and bleak—the ichthyophagous teeth of the pike, shark, and silvery hairtail—the tail of the fox-shark—the prehensile lips of the dory and sprat—the nose of the barbel and dog-fish—the resplendence of the Arctic gymnetrus and scabbard-fish—the dagger in the tail of the sting ray—the nest of the stickleback—the armour plates of the sturgeon—the nostril, breathing powers, and store of fat in the salmon—migrations of the salmon, herring, pilchard, sprat, and mackerel, etc.—and, above all, the enormous fertility of fishes useful as food to the human race.

"I am satisfied that I should obtain a verdict in favour of my view of the case, namely, that in all these wonderful contrivances there exists evidence of design and forethought and a wondrous adaptation of means to an end. A full acknowledgment must necessarily follow that these were due to the immediate creation of 'The Lord and Giver of life.'"

These sentences were penned within two days of the writer's lamented death; in fact, were nearly, if not quite, the last words he wrote. The testimony comes worthily from the man. Among observers of nature he had a high place, and was a true representative of the class of naturalists at the head of which is Gilbert White of Selborne. All his works were leavened with this reverent spirit; refreshing in tone amid the conceited babble of materialism. This tone will appear in two or three extracts on points to which he has referred in the preface already quoted.

Teeth of Fishes.

"It is among the teeth of animals that we find examples of the most beautiful mechanical designs, whether for tearing, crushing, grinding, etc., a subject so eloquently elucidated by the greatest of modern anatomists, Professor Owen. In fact, so wondrous is the variety of teeth, and so excellent is their adaptation to the work they have to perform, that I think it must puzzle the followers of Darwin's doctrines to account for their beauty of structure as well as the ease and smoothness of their action.

"Among fishes more especially is the structure of the teeth most noticeable. In fact, hardly any fish can be examined without our finding that he carries an armament of teeth either in his jaws or else in his gullet, the structure and working of which are most worthy of the attention of all who are willing to believe what they see, and, above all, recognise creative design in the most humble of beings."

Migrations of Salmon.

"I consider the salmon to be a sea-fish proper; nevertheless this sea-fish ascends the rivers and streams in order to deposit its eggs, for unlike other sea-fish it does not breed in the sea. Secondly. Having ascended to fresh water, it deposits its eggs on gravel, where in due course they hatch out and become young fish. Thirdly. These young fish, after a certain time, descend to the sea as smolts in the months of May and June; some of them migrate the first year, some the second, and some the third. These small fish, having arrived at the sea, remain there a certain time—some a few months, some a year; they then begin to return to the river as grilse. The parent salmon, having spawned, descend to the sea in a wretched and miserable condition, many dying on the road. These are called 'kelts' or 'slats.' They then recover their condition and return again to the rivers. In every stage of their existence, salmon are surrounded by enemies innumerable, and it is really wonderful that they do not become extinct. They are, however, so prolific, that when care is bestowed upon them, and their enemies kept under as much as possible, they will increase in numbers and size in a most wonderful manner.

"Every female salmon, as a rule, carries about 900 eggs (the hard roe is the eggs) to a pound of her weight; thus a 36lbs. fish would contain 32,400 eggs, a number exceeding the population of Reading, i.e., 32,313. A great many casts of salmon containing eggs can be seen at my museum. In all cases the weight of the fish and the number of eggs are given.

"It will be perfectly impossible to understand aright the natural habits of the salmon unless we regard them from the proper point of view, viz., that the goings and comings of these curious migratory creatures are independent of human interference, and that they simply obey the Divine laws which have been laid down for them from the beginning of time."

A remarkable example of the wonderful adaptation of means to end is found in the structure of the eel.

The Common Eel.

"The eel, as is well known, will live a long time out of water. This habit is of the greatest service to him, as sometimes it is necessary for him to migrate from place to place by an overland route. To enable him to live out of the water the eel has a most elaborate yet simple form of mechanism, by means of which he is enabled to keep his gills moist even though he is not in the water. It will be observed that immediately, or if not very soon after, an eel is taken out of the water, two great swellings will take place each side of the head, and that if the eel is placed back in the water this swelling will immediately disappear. Let us now take a dead eel; we shall find close to the pectoral fins a slit in the skin which acts as a valve. If we take a probe and pass it through this slit we find that it enters a large cavity; next, take a pair of scissors and cut open this cavity, inside we shall find the gills proper. It is this cavity which the eel has the marvellous power of filling with water, and keeping a supply which shall not allow the gill fibres to adhere together, and thence of necessity stop respiration. This cavity is of course made of a large and loose skin-like membrane, which holds the required quantity of water; but in order to enable him to fill and empty this cavity, an elastic yet firm mechanism of some kind is absolutely necessary.

"See for yourselves what a beautiful piece of machinery is provided by the Creator. A framework of very delicate bones, each bone connected with its neighbour by an elastic membrane of the consistency of gold-beaters'-skin, forms a fan-shaped covering over the gills; its action is very like, if not exactly the same as, the action of an umbrella. When the eel wishes to take in his water-supply, he, as it were, opens the umbrella-shaped framework and fills his reservoir; when he wishes to expel the water, he, as it were, closes his umbrella, as his reservoir is no longer required to come into action."

The materialists of to-day, as of former times, ascribe all these structural fitnesses and beauties to the development of brute matter, under blind laws or forces. This is supposed by some naturalists to show high intellect, but we agree with Mr. Buckland in thinking it contrary to science as well as to common-sense. The argument from design is not obsolete, and with old John Ray we love to see "the Wisdom of God manifested in the works of Creation."

The Eagle's Nest.

"FOR THE LORD'S PORTION IS HIS PEOPLE;
JACOB IS THE LOT OF HIS INHERITANCE.

AS AN EAGLE STIRRETH UP HER NEST,
FLUTTERETH OVER HER YOUNG,
SPREADETH ABROAD HER WINGS.
TAKETH THEM, BEARETH THEM ON HER WINGS;
SO THE LORD ALONE DID LEAD HIM."—

THE RELIGIONS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD.

BY GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., CANON OF CANTERBURY.

RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT GREEKS.

III.

AMONG the deities external to the Olympic circle, the most important were Dionysus, Leto, Persephoné, and Hades or Aidoneus. Dionysus is generally admitted to have been derived from an Oriental source. The word probably meant originally "the judge of men," and referred to a special function of the god, who was thought to pass sentence on the souls of the departed when they reached the other world.

Essentially, however, Dionysus was the god of inebriety, the deification of drunkenness, as Ares was of violence, and Aphrodité of sensual desire. He was viewed as the creator of the vine, or at any rate as its introducer into Greece; the teacher of its culture, and the discoverer of the exhilarating properties of its fruit. The worship of Dionysus was effected by taking part in his orgies, and these were of a furious and ecstatic character, accompanied with exciting music, with wild dances, with shrieks and cries, and sometimes with bloodshed. Both men and women joined in the Dionysiac rites, the women outdoing the men in the violence of their frenzy. "Crowds of females, clothed with fawn-skins, and bearing the sacred thyrsus, flocked to the solitudes of Parnassus or Cithæron, or Taÿgetus, during the consecrated triennial period, passed the night there with torches, and abandoned themselves to demonstrations of frantic excitement, with dancing and clamorous invocation of the god. The men yielded to a similar impulse by noisy revels in the streets, sounding the cymbals and tambourine, and carrying the image of the god in procession."[1] Every sort of licence and excess was regarded as lawful on these occasions, and the worship of the deity was incomplete unless the votary reached an advanced stage of intoxication. Dionysiac festivals were fortunately not of frequent recurrence, and were not everywhere celebrated in the same way. At Athens women took no part in the Dionysia; and with men intellectual contests, and the witnessing of them, held the place of the rude revels elsewhere too common. Still, the influence of Dionysiac worship on Greece generally must be regarded as excessively corrupting, and Dionysus must be viewed as, next to Aphrodité, the most objectionable of the Greek divinities.

Leto, or Latona, as the Romans called her, when they adopted her into their pantheon, was, on the contrary, one of the purer and more elevating influences. She is wife of Zeus by a title quite as good as that of Hera,[2] and is a model of motherly love and wifely purity. Separate and peculiar function she has none, and it is difficult to account for her introduction among the Olympians. Perhaps she is to be regarded as ideal womanhood. Silent, unobtrusive, always subordinating herself to her children, majestic, chaste, kindly, ready to help and tend, she is in Olympus what the Greek wished his wife to be in his own home, her very shadowiness according with the Greek notion of womanly perfection.[1] Mr. Gladstone suggests that she is a traditional deity, representing the woman through whom man's redemption was to come;[2] but there scarcely seems to be sufficient foundation for this view, which is not supported by any analogies in the mythologies of other nations.

Persephoné, the Roman Proserpine, was the queen of the dead; far more than her shadowy husband, Hades, the real ruler of the infernal realm. She was represented as severely pure and chaste, even having become a wife against her will, and as awful and terrible, but not cruel. She occupied no very important post in the religion, since her sphere was wholly the nether world, which only very slightly engaged the attention of the Hellenes. Hades, or Aidoneus, had a high rank, as the brother of Zeus, and in some sort his co-equal; but he was as shadowy as the realm over which he presided, and to most Greeks was simply magni nominis umbra—"the shadow of a great name," which they must reverence when they heard it, but not a deity who to any extent occupied their thoughts, or received their worship.[3]

It would be easy to occupy many more pages with the Greek minor deities, but our limits compel us to refrain, and to turn at this point from the objects to the character of the worship, and to the real practical influence of their religion upon the Greek race.

In the main, the Greek worship was of a joyous, pleasant, and lightsome kind. The typical Greek was devoid of any deep sense of sin—thought well of himself—did not think very highly of the gods, and considered that, so long as he kept free from grave and heinous offences, either against the moral law or against the amour-propre of the deities, he had little to fear, while he had much to hope, from them.

[3] Compare Döllinger, "Jew and Gentile," vol. i. p. 93: "The people did not trouble themselves much about Hades, and they saw no altars dedicated to him. There was one image of him at Athens, but he had hardly anywhere a regular worship."

He prayed and offered sacrifice, not so much in the way of expiation, or to deprecate God's wrath, as in the way of natural piety, to ask for blessings and to acknowledge them. He made vows to the gods in sickness, danger, or difficulty, and was careful to perform his vow on escape or recovery. His house was full of shrines, on which he continually laid small offerings, to secure the favour and protection of his special patron deities. Plato says that he prayed every morning and evening, and also concluded every set meal with a prayer or hymn. But these devotions seem not to have been very earnest or deep, and were commonly hurried through in a perfunctory manner.

Practically the religious worship of the Greeks consisted mainly in attendance on festivals which might be Pan-Hellenic, political, tribal, or peculiar to a guild or a phratria. Each year brought round either one or two of the great panegyries—the festivals of the entire Greek race at Olympia and Delphi, at Nemea and the Isthmus of Corinth. There were two great Ionic festivals annually, one at Delos, and the other at the Panionium near Mycalé. Each state and city throughout Greece had its own special festivals, Dionysia, Eleusinia, Panathenæa, Carneia, Hyakinthia, Apaturia, etc. Most of these were annual, and some lasted several days. A Greek had no "Sunday"—no sacred day recurring at set intervals, on which his thoughts were bound to be directed to religion; but so long a time as a week scarcely ever passed without his calendar calling him to some sacred observance or other, some feast or ceremony, in honour of some god or goddess, or in commemoration of some event important in the history of mankind,[1] or in that of his race, or of his city. And these festivals were highly attractive to him. Generally they were joyful occasions from first to last, celebrated with music, and processions, with gymnastic or orchestral competitions, or with theatrical contests. Ordinarily they included sacrifice, and feasting upon the victims sacrificed. Even when they were professedly of a mournful character, like the Spartan Hyakinthia, the opening days of which were days of sadness and of gloom, they commonly concluded with a more genial time—a time of banqueting and dancing. Accordingly, the Greek looked forward to his holy days as true holidays, and was pleased to combine duty with pleasure by taking his place in the procession, or the temple, or the theatre, to which inclination and religion alike called him. Thousands and tens of thousands flocked to each of the great Pan-Hellenic gatherings, delighting in the splendour and excitement of the scene, in the gay dresses, the magnificent equipages, the races, the games, the choric, and other contests. "These festivals," as has been well observed,[2] "were considered as the very cream of the Greek life, their periodical recurrence being expected with eagerness and greeted with joy." Similarly, though to a minor extent, each national or even tribal gathering was an occasion of enjoyment; cheerfulness, hilarity, sometimes an excessive exhilaration prevailed; and the religion of the Greeks, in these its most striking and obvious manifestations, was altogether bright, festive, and pleasurable.

But, just as sunshine cannot exist without shadow, so even the Greek religion, bright as it was, had its dark side. Calamities befel nations, families, or individuals, and were attributed to an offended god or a cruel Fury. A sense of guilt occasionally visited those who had committed great and flagrant crimes, as perjury, blasphemy, robbery of temples, incest, violation of the right of asylum, treachery towards a guest-friend, and the like. A load under these circumstances lay upon the conscience; all the horrors of remorse were felt; avenging fiends were believed to haunt and torture the guilty one, who sometimes earnestly sought relief for a long term of years and sought in vain. There were indeed rites of expiation appropriate to different occasions; most sins could be atoned for in some manner or other; but the process was generally long and painful,[1] and there were cases where the persistent anger of the fierce Erinyes could not in any way be appeased. When a nation had sinned, human sacrifices were not unfrequently prescribed as the only possible propitiation;[2] if the case were that of an individual, various modes of purification were adopted, ablutions, fastings, sacrifices, and the like. According to Plato, however, the number of those who had any deep sense of their guilt was few: most men, whatever crimes they committed, found among the gods examples of similar acts,[3] and thought no great blame would attach to them for their misconduct. At the worst, if the gods were angered by their behaviour, a few offerings would satisfy them and set things straight,[4] leaving the offenders free to repeat their crimes and so to grow more and more hardened in iniquity.

At the position which the "mysteries" occupied in the Greek religion it is impossible for us, in this slight sketch, to do more than glance. The mysteries were certain secret rites practised by voluntary associations of individuals, who pledged themselves not to reveal to the uninitiated anything which they saw or heard at the secret meetings. They were usually connected with the worship of some particular god, and consisted mainly in symbolical representations of the adventures and circumstances connected with the god in the mythology. They contained nothing that was contradictory to the popular religion, and little that was explanatory of it. The various mysteries had each its own apparatus of symbols and formularies, by which the mystæ knew each other, as freemasons do; but they only vaguely hinted at any theological dogmas or opinions. The Greek greatly affected these secret rites; and it is said that but few Greeks were not initiated in some mystery or other.[5] "Their attractions lay in their veil of secrecy, transparent though it was, in the variety of feelings brought into play by lively dramatic representations, in the rapid transition from anxiety and suspense to serenity and joy, in the combination of all arts and artistic enjoyments, of music and song, the mimic dance, the brilliant lighting-up, and effective decoration."[1] It can scarcely, however, be said that the mysteries exercised any salutary or elevating influence on the Greeks generally. The moral conduct of the initiated was no better than that of others; and Plato thought that participation in the Eleusinia served only to strengthen and make a man secure in unrighteousness.[2]

A BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

HOW true it is in the great field of the world's spiritual necessities that "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty," so that often where the strength in merely human power turns back in dismay from the battle against sin, the power of Divine love working through a weak woman's heart, obtains the most decisive victories. The short but beautiful life of Miss Warne at Portsmouth affords a very remarkable illustration of the fact.

Through a seemingly slight accident when a child, she was laid upon a sick-bed, and the affliction lasted for a number of years. When about the age of fifteen she recovered her strength sufficiently so that she was able to walk on two crutches, and then joined the church, entered the Sabbath-school, and became a most efficient teacher. The love of Christ seemed to burn in her soul with intense fervour, and she became noted in the school for her power over the roughest of the boys.

Some eight years ago she began work in a mission-room at Rudmore, a district of Portsmouth, where there is abundant evidence of great drinking and great wretchedness. Fishermen, bargemen, and the big, rough lads who are so often the torment of the police, and the terror of quiet people in our seaport towns, form the principal part of the population.

Many good Christian workers had laboured in the place, and some had left it utterly disheartened, before this physically weak but spiritually strong, wholehearted Christian young woman put her hand to the work amid all its noise and sin. Her one weapon was the Word of God, as it tells the story of the wonderful love and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ.

She began her work in the mission-hall at Rudmore by inviting a few small children to come and hear about the Saviour of sinners, and then visited their homes during the weekdays and the intervals of service on Sabbaths, and her simple earnestness and physical helplessness made a strong impression on parents and children alike. Very soon the big boys, sailors, bargemen, in the roughest of garments, came in and listened in quietness to her loving speech. Gradually the numbers increased, until there were seventy in her class of the ragged and wretched, who were tamed down in her presence as if a spell held them in eager silence. Then girls and women mingled in the gathering, and that led to the formation of a female class, mothers' meeting, a sewing class, and educational work of various kinds. Visiting the people at their homes during the day, and busy in the evening at the various classes, guiding and encouraging, she spent her life here as a benediction from God among the poor. Truly she spent a "long life in a short time," and the weak body in which the burning soul lived was soon dried up with the holy flame.

When about thirty-five years of age she was laid aside for some months with illness, and then the message "Come up hither" called her home to rest with God. Three hundred of those whom she had gathered from the streets and taught to be useful members of society, as well as led to the Saviour, followed her funeral to the cemetery and strewed her coffin with flowers; and it was computed that seven hundred of those whom she had influenced for good by her life of Christlike simplicity and loving-kindness mingled their tears at her grave.

One old man, well known in the district, was crying and sobbing like a child. A friend asked him why he was weeping so sorely. "Oh," said he, "she was more to me than mother and father! She taught me to read, and led me to my Saviour. I was sunk in the lowest depths of sin; nobody cared for me, everybody despised me, and I despised myself. But she came to me, took me by the hand, and lifted me up, taught me to respect myself, and told me of the love of Christ. She was indeed my true friend." Thus this young Christian woman, although a cripple, made her life beautiful with works of the noblest graciousness among the sinful and sad, and left a bright example of how the love of Christ as the strongest of moral forces, when yoked to the weakest instruments, may lend to all the grandeur of the noblest enterprise.

"A sun hath set, hath quickly passed away,
From earth's dull night to heaven's refulgent day.
Long will the eye, with heartfelt loss deplore,
And o'er thy grave the silent tribute pour.
Yet not vain sorrow, but a purer woe,
With pleasure mingled, bids the tear to flow,
Though thou hast ta'en thy flight to realms of bliss,
We mourn thy loss, left in a world like this."

"KEEP INCHING ALONG."

A QUAINT message comes to me to-day across the sea from Africa. It stirs pleasant memories, and well fulfils the loving commission given to it to encourage and strengthen my heart. Thus it runs: "Tell dear Mrs. Spurgeon to keep inching along, Jesus Christ 'll come by-and-by."

I must explain the nature of this uncommon communication, and why it so interests and touches me. When our two coloured brethren, Messrs. Johnson and Richardson, were on the eve of departure for missionary work in Africa, they came with their wives to our dear home to bid us farewell. A very pleasant and memorable time we spent together, their Pastor encouraging them in the work to which they had devoted their lives, and their love and sympathy overflowing to him and to me (then very sick), in return. At the request of my dear husband they sang to me some of the strange, sweet songs of their captivity, for they had once been slaves; and all who heard these plaintive melodies sung in the Tabernacle at their farewell

[1] Döllinger, "Jew and Gentile," vol. i. p. 196.
[2] "Republic," § 6 (quoted by Döllinger, p. 200).

meetings will agree with me that sweeter, yet sadder, melodies could scarcely be imagined. My heart was especially attracted by a peculiar air, to which they sang as a refrain these most curious words:—

"Keep inching along, keep inching along
Like a poor inch worm,— Jesus Christ 'll come by-and-by."

It is impossible to describe the weird pathos with which they invested these few sentences, and my interest was so aroused that I asked if some special history attached to this strange song. Then they told me how in the sorrowful days of their bondage they would stealthily gather together, night after night, in one of the low, miserable huts they called their home, and sitting crouched on the floor, hand clasped in hand, in darkness and terror, they would pray with one another, and in muffled tones would whisper this very song. Sing it aloud they dared not, for fear of their master, who would have exacted full payment by stripes for such an assertion of nature's rights, but rocking to and fro in time to the wailing melody, they found a "fearful pleasure" in the disobedience which brought spiritual comfort to their oppressed souls.

The glorious hope of future deliverance excited and enraptured their hearts. "Sometimes," they said, "one of our number would forget the caution and silence so essential to our safety; and a voice would ring out in the darkness, jubilant and clear, 'Jesus Christ 'll come by-and-by!'" Then all would sit trembling after such an outburst, lest they should be discovered by the shout of anticipated triumph, and angels might have wept for the poor, down-trodden souls, and have longed to bring the sweet chariot, "coming for to carry them home."

"Will you sing to me in whispers as you sang then?" I asked, and they very sweetly complied with my wish, though, blessed be God, their surroundings were now so happy that they could give but a faint copy of the terrible reality. I shall never forget that pitiful hushing of their voices! There was not a dry eye in the little company when the song was ended; but we wiped our tears away, soon remembering that the cause for sorrow no longer existed. The "poor inch worms" are now free, noble, educated men and women; they can sing, and pray, and preach as loudly and as long as they please, and are bound for the land of their fathers, with the intention of exercising these privileges to the full, and making known the gospel of the grace of God to their kindred, according to the flesh. The Lord go forth with them and prosper them.

The echoes of that singular song have lingered with me ever since, and many a time have they comforted my heart. Day by day the work of the Book Fund* has "kept inching along," and though prevented by my weakness from taking giant strides, how gracious is the Lord to allow His unworthy child to creep even inch by inch along the pleasant road of service for Him! I should like to send forth fifty parcels weekly—I should like each parcel to be a complete library of theological lore, so that very soon not a true minister in the land should faint and fail for lack of knowledge; but as my highest aims cannot be fulfilled I will thankfully and joyfully do what I can, and with the Lord's blessing resting on the books sent out in His name, my ten to twenty packages a week will not fail to accomplish His good purpose. Thus, cheerfully, gladly, I "keep inching along," and for me, as surely as for the greatest saint on earth—"Jesus Christ 'll come by-and-by."

MRS. C. H. SPURGEON.

* From the last Annual Report of Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon's Book Fund. The Book Fund makes grants to "poor pastors of every evangelical denomination, who are in actual charge, wholly devoted to the ministry, and whose income from all sources does not exceed 150*l.* per annum." Upwards of 8,000 volumes were thus given last year, and nearly as many sermons, truly a valuable gift to poor ministers. The books were distributed between 286 Baptists, 180 Independents, 358 Methodists, 88 Church of England clergymen, 49 Missionaries, 71 Evangelists, and 12 Presbyterians. A new Report has since come into our hands, from which we see that this good work is continued and extended. The Report is published by Passmore and Alabaster, Paternoster Buildings.

THE SOUL'S IDEAL.

"We know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is."—1 John iii. 2.

"Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son."—Rom. viii. 29.

"We all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image."—2 Cor. iii. 18.

"Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself."—Phil. iii. 21.

"When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory."—Col. iii. 4.

"Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature."—2 Peter i. 4.

WORDS like these awaken high thoughts. They remind us of our high and holy destiny. They cheer us with promises infinitely precious, and raise within us longings which come from the Spirit of God Himself. He it is who in His revealed word has taught us how glorious is the future of the sons of God through Christ Jesus our Lord, a future wrought out for us by His blood and His righteousness, and to be at last accomplished in us by making us like Himself! Blessed be God these hopes are no dream of enthusiasm, but real and true, inspired by the Spirit of truth, and designed to purify and elevate our whole nature, for "every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as He is pure."

How many evil tempers would be subdued, vain thoughts banished, impatient murmurs silenced, desponding fears put to flight, earthly desires corrected, and holy desires implanted and cherished in our souls, if we would set before us, and maintain there steadily, the perfect ideal of the character and life of Jesus, in the blessed hope that the day will come when we shall be "like Him, for we shall see Him as He is!"

"A hope so great and so Divine
May trials well endure,
And purge the soul from sense and sin,
As Christ Himself is pure!"

COVETOUSNESS. LUKE XII. 13–31.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 15.—'And He said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.'

CONNECTION.—The present discourse is immediately connected with that considered last week. As Jesus left the Pharisee's table, His opponents were pressing around Him with their vehement and bitter words. A large, excited crowd was soon gathered, including many of Christ's disciples, who no doubt made their way to His side, eager to protect Him. To these He speaks first of all, bidding them to be of good courage and wait for the end. By degrees the silence and attention of the rest are won; but at a pause in our Lord's words one of the company appeals to Him, and gives to His teaching a new direction.

I. A SELFISH REQUEST REBUKED.—Read vers. 13, 14. This man was strangely absorbed in his own interests! Perhaps he thought he had been wronged, and brooded over the trouble till he could think of nothing else. While others were listening to the sermon, he was meditating about his brother's injustice, and scheming how to get the coveted share of the inheritance. Jesus had spoken of Divine providence caring even for the sparrows (ver. 6), and the man immediately applies the lesson to his own particular need. Egotism is wonderfully ingenious! So he broke in upon our Lord's teaching with this personal matter.

> What the case exactly was, we cannot tell. It has been suggested that the speaker was a younger brother who rebelled against the elder's having a double share, Deut. xxi. 17, and demanded an equal partition.

Note, the man appeals to Christ as to a scribe or rabbi, 'learned in the law.' The public teachers of the Jews often had such matters submitted to them. But Jesus shows at once that His instructions and authority had nothing to do with things like this. His kingdom was 'not of this world,' and the touch of indignation in His reply proves that the appeal was unbecoming and selfish.

[Compare the words of the Hebrew to Moses, Exod. ii. 14; and note the difference between the offices of Moses and Christ, Acts vii. 35. Alford.]

> It has been justly noted that for our Lord to interfere in worldly concerns, would have been to encourage the false notions of the Messiah prevalent among the Jews, and to lead them to regard Him as a temporal King and Deliverer. Compare Matt. xxii. 21.

II. THE LESSON AND THE PARABLE.—Read vers. 15–21. Beware of covetousness—literally, 'the desire to have more'—a grasping spirit. Scarcely any sin is more solemnly denounced in the word of God than this. It is 'idolatry,' Col. iii. 5; it excludes from the kingdom of Christ, Eph. v. 5; it is 'a root of every kind of evil,' 1 Tim. vi. 10. No sin puts on so many fair disguises, it calls itself frugality, carefulness, industry, care for one's family, and the like; but its root is in sinful SELF. It utterly withers the true life of a man. That life consists not in what he has, but in what he is. It is of heaven, and its food is heavenly. (Yet how significant, that our answer to the question, What is he worth? is usually the mention of a sum of money!) 'Man doth not live by bread alone.'

> There are three different words used in the New Testament for life. That employed here means life in its essence and principle; in ver. 22 it is animal life, 'the soul,' in viii. 14 it is life in its outward relations, 'living.' See Trench's New Test. Synonyms, under the words ζωή, ψυχή, βίος.

The Parable of the Rich Fool that follows enforces the lesson with thrilling power. Observe, although the man was rich, it is not said that his riches were obtained unfairly, or used oppressively; they arose from the natural increase of the soil, they were the gift of Providence. But the man thought of them as his own. See the word MY repeated five times: my fruits, my barns, my fruits and my goods, my soul. Philo the Jew has the remark that 'to say MINE befits none but God.' But to this rich man his possessions were his life. As he looked over his waving crops and calculated his harvest returns, he thought only of his own enjoyment. Barns.—'Thou hast barns enough,' exclaims Ambrose, 'the bosom of the needy, the houses of widows, the mouths of orphans and infants.' In these store up thy goods, thou shalt find them again in heaven! In ver. 19 the four words in the original are very expressive, Rest, eat, drink, enjoy (Farrar). The Epicureans drew the same inference from the uncertainty of life, 1 Cor. xv. 32; this rich man, more in conformity with Jewish notions, from the expectation of lengthened days. How sudden and awful the change! Thy soul, 'thy life.' Not only the fact, but the announcement of the swift-coming death, made it so solemn. The man who had so vauntingly said mine, is left to ponder the question whose? (Psa. xxxix. 6). And there was that other question. Where shall I be? 1 Tim. vi. 7. There is, however, that which we can 'carry out,' riches that are toward God. In fellowship with Him, living to Him, we become truly rich. Matt. vi. 21.

III. GENERAL APPLICATION.—Read vers. 22–31. Here our Lord repeats part of His Sermon on the Mount, Matt. vi. 25–33, with a few inconsiderable variations. Note, the words are addressed to His disciples, lifting them to a higher range of thought. To all the multitude He had shown how foolish it was to set their heart on riches; now He advances to a deeper and more difficult lesson, for those who have already attained to true life;—that of entire trust in God with respect to earthly things. Take no thought, i.e. 'be not distracted.' In Phil. iv. 6, Be careful for nothing, the same expression is in the original.

> It has often been noted that the word thought in the English of the seventeenth century was often used of harassing and anxious care. (See 1 Sam. ix. 5; Psa. xciv. 19; and Lumby's Glossary of Bible Words in Eyre and Spottiswoode's Teacher's Bible.) No doubt in the forthcoming Revision the word will be replaced by one more suitable to modern readers.

Life, as noted above, is here the physical life. This is more than meat—(food) and the body more than raiment—the argument being that as God has given you the greater, He may be trusted for the less. Consider, lit. consider well. The ravens, in Matt., 'the birds,' here more specific and graphic. Comp. Psa. cxlvii. 9. Fowls, used in Scripture of birds generally. Stature here probably means age. To add one cubit (18 or 21 inches) to a man's height, would not be that which is least, but on the contrary, a large increase. Life is a journey, which we cannot prolong one step beyond the destined termination. The lesson from the lilies refers not so much to the life itself as to life's adornments. In Matt. the appeal is prefixed 'Why take ye thought for raiment?' 'Do your utmost, you will not surpass the field-flower in beauty—

why then should you distract yourself about a little more, or a little less in your attire? Seek what is divinely beautiful, the ornament of great price (1 Tim. ii. 9, 10; 1 Peter iii. 4); and for the rest, God will care for it.' Cast into the oven, cut down with the grass and dried for fuel, in the scarcity of wood. Such is the end of the millions of flowers which in the season make the plains of Palestine so gay. Naturalists are not agreed what particular flowers are intended by the lilies. Sir Joseph Hooker would apply the word to 'the tulip, ranunculus, pheasant's eye, and especially to the anemone, the floral glories of Palestine.' *

The command not to be of doubtful mind, is very impressive, the figure being taken from a boat rocking on the waves. 'Do not live as those who rest on no firm foundation,' James i. 6. This is the character of the nations of the world, the heathen; who have no security like yours, whose gods, by their own confession, have left them to themselves. You have a firm foundation: Your Father knoweth. Trust Him therefore! It is almost needless to say that our Lord's words do not inculcate either idleness or indifference. He speaks to those who, as His disciples, are faithful and diligent in the discharge of life's duties, and tells them that they may then without distraction of mind, or any sense of insecurity, leave the result with God. But there is one supreme object of earnest care. Seek ye first—first in time, seek now—first in importance, seek beyond all else, the kingdom of God, i.e. that condition of things, both in yourselves and others, in which He shall rule, that state of mind which is willing subjection to His authority; while you endeavour to win others to the same. Matt. adds and His righteousness, conformity to His righteous will. Live for this, and all these things—life, food, raiment—all that He sees to be needful shall be added unto you, lit., 'given over and above,' 'given to boot,' as the old writers say. Tradition attributes to Christ the saying: Ask the great things and the small shall be added to you; ask the heavenly things, and the earthly things shall be added to you.

QUESTIONS.

1. Show by Scripture example the criminality and awful consequences of unchecked covetousness.

2. Ver. 15. How does the Bible describe, negatively and positively, this 'life' of man?

3. Illustrate the bearing of our Lord's instructions on secular, social or political questions.

4. 'Thy soul shall be required of thee' (lit., as in margin, 'they require thy soul of thee'). Give parallel expressions from Scripture; and show the contrast, in the death of the servants of God.

5. What are the various lessons of trust that are taught by the birds and the flowers; and how to be understood, in accord with the dictates of Christian prudence?

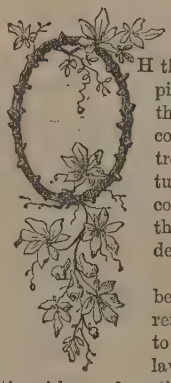
THE CATERPILLAR AND HER FRIENDS.



"H that I could fly!" sighed an immense caterpillar, as she lay between some large stones at the foot of the old garden wall, "Oh, that I could fly and get out of reach of all the troubles that meet me down here at every turn! I scarcely dare to move from my corner, lest one of those monsters who call themselves men, come past and stamp me to death with their ugly feet."

"If man treads on you, it would probably be by accident, and chiefly your own fault," remarked a grasshopper, who had happened to have paused for breath at the corner of the lawn. "It would require an acute eye to distinguish you from the stones around you. Why do you make yourself just the colour of the stones?"

"That is my only security," replied the caterpillar. "Men are so cruel they would think nothing of crushing my tiny form, beautiful as it is (though I say it who shouldn't!) to atoms, for wanton mischief. Or, if I escape their eagle glances, the birds seem never to have anything better to do than to keep on the constant watch to catch me at the first unguarded moment! I am obliged to change my colour wherever I go; green when on the grass, grey on the stones, brown on the gravel; all to avoid certain destruction. Now if I could only hop like you, Mr. Grasshopper, I should have some chance of getting out of the way of my enemies."

"You are just as safe where you are," replied the grasshopper gravely; "you are blessed with a voice so low that you can use it without fear of its attracting attention, whereas I, if I but venture to say a word, I am pounced on by the idle boys in a moment; and very hard work I often have to get out of their way! I assure you that my legs—long as they are—are often quite wearied with it, and I wish I could shuffle along like you! It is always hop, hop, hop, whether I am tired or no."

This was indeed looking at the matter from a new point of view. The caterpillar remained silent a moment, then she said in her usual depressed tone, "But you are able to get above obstacles. You at least can look on them from a height although not such a lofty one as the birds, or even bees and butterflies."

"Yes, but it is only for a moment," replied the grasshopper. "I am hardly up before I am down again. If you were me you would not think it worth the trouble!"

"I should think it worth the trouble," retorted the caterpillar. "If you knew what it was never to be off the ground, and always to have to toil over, step by step, every little roughness, you would wish for a change in your condition as I do." And again the poor little creature murmured, "Oh, that I could fly!"

"You will have your wish one day," said a dragon-fly, catching the caterpillar's last words, as he darted past like a flash of light.

"What did he say?" asked the caterpillar eagerly.

"Why, that you will have your wish and fly some day!" laughed the grasshopper.

"Oh, what rapture! can it be true?" cried the caterpillar, tremulous with some strangely new sensation of hope springing up in her breast.

"Of course not! The idea of your ever being able to do such a thing when you have not even wings—why, he was just chaffing you!" cried the grasshopper.

"I can't, I won't believe that," said the caterpillar. "He looked too steadfast and earnest on his own bright way to take pleasure in deluding one so low, so miserable, so sad as me. Oh, that he had not gone away so quickly! Oh, that he would return, and I would ask him!"

But the dragon-fly was far on his way, casting his bright beams hither and thither as he went; for he knew his life's day was short, and was anxious to do as much as he could in it; and he never returned.

The grasshopper grew impatient, and longed to stretch his long legs; but it seemed unkind to leave the caterpillar in trouble, so she lingered still a minute beside her.

"If I were you," she said at last, "I would try and be content with what I am, and not fret after being what you never can become."

"Content to be stamped on, and kicked out of the way, or be eaten by the birds, or starved to death in this hole. Content to lead a life of perpetual danger. Impossible!" retorted the caterpillar angrily. The disappointment of the hope—that strange hope which the dragon-fly's message had given her—was harder to bear than the dreary hopelessness that went before.

"Well, the birds you envy so are in perpetual danger of being shot by man, and I suppose that is as bad as being crushed."

"It is not so ignominious," groaned the caterpillar, but the grasshopper did not notice the remark.

"Or if they escape being shot, they are snared in traps or nets; and the bees are smoked to death in their hives; and the flies are caught and eaten by the birds. Oh 'the world is very evil,' and we, alas! are in it."

The caterpillar sighed. She had never thought of this before. "I should, however, like to be like you," she said, eyeing with envy the agile form of her companion.

"You would soon wish to be out of my shoes if you were in them," returned the grasshopper. "Why, every time I jump I am liable to be pounced on by one of the birds which you envy so much. I should be frightened to jump, only that it is my nature, and I must do it; and, somehow, one gets accustomed to take one's chance," and away she hopped till she was out of sight. She meant to return, but she forgot the way, and so never came back to the caterpillar.

The poor little thing lay still for awhile; and when hunger forced her to seek some other spot, she went silently in quest of it.

"I wonder that the grasshopper never returned," she mused, as she slowly pursued her way. "Perhaps," and she shuddered at the thought, "she has been eaten by one of the birds. Well perhaps after all I am best as I am. If only I knew that the dragon-fly was right! I think he must be, for he could have had no motive to tell me what is false; and his words were like the flash of light that radiated from his form as he swept past me. I wonder if he was always able to fly."

"Are you speaking of the dragon-fly?" asked a snail, who was sticking to the wall hard by, and had been a silent listener to the foregoing conversation. "Why he has only just got his wings. He was a grub in yonder pond only a few hours ago, for I watched him rising to the surface, and wondered what he could be."

"Then how could he know about me?" asked the caterpillar.

"I don't know," answered the snail. "Maybe it was just a message he was told to give you."

"Who told him?"

"I don't know. Perhaps the same who sends the wind. Listen how she makes the trees bend and sway, as she whispers through their boughs."

"It does not give a bright message like the dragon-fly," said the caterpillar.

"No. Maybe the trees need a different message to you. But depend upon it, each living thing has its message in time. The plants have the sun's bright rays; the earth the dew; the ponds and rivers the soft-falling rain; the clouds their mists from earth; and you, your message from the dragon-fly."

"And what message have you had?" said the caterpillar.

"I have not received mine yet," answered the snail, "but I feel sure it will come presently, and I am waiting for it."

Her tone of patient assurance soothed the caterpillar.

"I will wait and trust too," she said; "though it is very difficult to believe that—as the dragon-fly said—I shall have my wish and fly some day."

She was growing strangely drowsy, and had hardly energy to climb up into the stem of a cabbage close by, where she nestled herself comfortably to sleep. Gradually a wondrous change passed over her. The snail waited and watched, and watched and waited.

"She has received her message maybe," thought she. "I wonder what it is!"

The snail was not kept long in suspense. One morning there was a movement among the cabbage-leaves where her friend lay, and a beautiful butterfly sprang out. The caterpillar had its wish at last. She no longer crept slowly and painfully over each tiny obstacle, but flew over them; and as she fluttered from flower to flower in her new-found happiness (was it ungrateful?) she forgot the old life—or, if she did remember it, it was with the feeling that her early life had been appointed for the best, and that all comes well at last to those who possess contentment and the "patience of hope."

Gen. xl. 20–22. Matt. i. 18; xiv. 6–10. John ix. 4. 1 Thess. v. 2.

1. My first is the coming of Jesus below,
   At Bethlehem's manger, in weakness and woe;
   The Evangelist tells how Messiah began
   To breathe and to think and to act as a man;
   Derived from the Fathers, ordained to be King,
   Divine and yet human, his advent we sing.

2. My second is properly nothing but light,
   But yet comprehends all the darkness of night;
   'Tis the time when the work of the hands may be done,
   To begin with the morning, and end with the sun;
   And it tells when Messiah shall rule with his rod,
   In the glory and power of the kingdom of God.

3. My whole is a season of dancing and mirth,
   To flatter the proud, or to honour true worth;
   Twice only in Scripture its record we see—
   When a baker was hanged, and a butler set free;
   And again when a prophet was robbed of his life,
   To please a vile woman, a wicked man's wife.
   But if such a season should fall in your way,
   I wish—many happy returns of the day!

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

THROUGH THE LINN.

CHAPTER IV.

"I DON'T know how the last few weeks have gone, Lettice, and I don't know either how John and I will do without you both. But you will write often, child, and tell us everything."

It was early in November, a dull day over head, and a muddy one under foot; also the wind was cold. Lettice stood at the window of the Vicarage drawing-room, looking out upon the dead leaves which lay along either side of the pathway, just at that hour in the afternoon when day meets night. Violet lay sleeping on the sofa beneath a plaid shawl, a very white and fragile specimen of her kind. She had been ill enough to cause anxiety, and could scarcely yet be called recovered, though sufficiently so for travelling. Mrs. Canynge had entered the room noiselessly, and her voice broke with suddenness upon the reverie of the pale grave girl in the window.

No. 1408.—APRIL 23, 1881. PRICE ONE PENNY.

"I shall write, Aunt Jeannie. I am a bad correspondent, and never express myself easily. But I think I shall be able to write to you. It will be my only pleasure."

"Don't be too sure of that. Life must necessarily look sad to you now, I know; still, my dear, you are young, and you will make new friends."

Lettice's "Oh no," carried a sound of impatience.

"Why not?"

"I can't,—I never make friends. I care for nobody in the world, except Violet and you—and Mr. Canynge of course, and the poor people here."

"You know no others yet. Don't steel your heart against them beforehand, that is all. You will find you have more of life and warmth in you yet than you think, though it's no wonder you feel stunned and numbed by all you have gone through."

"It is not that," said Lettice. "It is not want of life in me. I wish it were. Sometimes I am almost vexed and angry to feel how much of energy I have left. Why am I not knocked down by it all like Violet?"

"You are strong and she is frail—body and mind too. There is a great difference between you."

"I think I could feel safer for the future if I were more crushed," said Lettice. "Sometimes I feel as if that dreadful week had so stirred and changed me, that I am frightened for myself—frightened of what I may be brought to say and do. There doesn't seem any restraint—except just the dread of bringing trouble to Violet. I think I could be reckless for myself."

"There may be restraint, my child, if you will put yourself into the strong keeping of your Father's hand. You'll need it, Lettice."

"Yes, but it is not mine,—that 'keeping' I mean," said Lettice calmly. "No use to deceive myself or you, Aunt Jeannie. The religion that I had in my happy days does not serve me now. I suppose there was something unreal about it. But I want to ask you a question. Do you remember that talk we had just before it all happened,—that last last talk of my happy life, and how you likened me to a sunny river, and said I must expect to come some day to a waterfall or linn?"

Mrs. Canynge nodded assent. She had thought often of it since.

"You promised to tell me your meaning some day, and I said I would claim your promise before a week was over. I did not, though I remembered, but I could not bear it then. I can now, and I don't feel as if I could go away without knowing. I have had it so much in my mind. Was that week a linn to me? What is a linn?"

"I think it would be better to wait, and let me describe it some other time, by-and-by, when you come again to pay us a visit."

"No, I can stand it now. I am not like other people, and I can bear a good deal that other people can't. You won't refuse me, this last evening? I have a sort of fancy that it may be a help to me. All looks so dark now, and such a mystery. What is a 'linn'? You spoke about the Linn of Dee, I remember,—the river Dee."

Mrs. Canynge looked thoughtfully out of the window into the dusk, standing there by Lettice's side with the red firelight shining behind.

"Well, I'll tell you," she said. "Whether it is wise I can't say, but I can't say you nay, and I will do as you wish. If you can't stand it tell me to stop."

Then, after a glance to see that Violet still slept, and a pause for recollection, she went into it abruptly.

"First you see the broad quiet river, flowing softly onward, widespread over a stony golden and brown bed, not deep, but happy and singing and reflecting the blue sky overhead, with never a thought as it were of what lies near,—and how should it have? That is the character of the Dee, above and near the Linn. Then suddenly there comes a change. You may see it, looking down from the bridge, or you may stand on the bank either above or below the bridge. All in a moment, without sign of warning, the character of the river's path changes. The wide shallow bed narrows at once to a deep gorge between hard clear-cut rocks. That is the Linn. There is first a sudden little waterfall, and then, through the Linn—this narrow sharply-cut channel, with horizontal strata of hard rock shutting it in inexorably,—through this the waters of the whole river have to pour. And they do pour, not singing, and flowing softly any longer, but rushing in a foaming flood, one great volume of translucent green water, so changed and passionate that one can hardly believe it to be the same river which ran before so placidly."

Lettice's whole face was quivering, but she only said, "Are you talking poetry, Aunt Jeannie? It is quite a story. Go on, please."

"It was a story to me. Then comes another change. The narrow Linn is past, and the turbulent waters suddenly come to a dead pause in a black silent pool, inky, and seemingly stagnant, under overshadowing rocks. Only seemingly stagnant, of course, for there is motion, and by careful watching it can be seen, if I rightly remember,—a slow surface movement. Maybe it is quicker below; for just so fast as the waters rush in, they must in reality rush out, though the impression given is of so complete a pause. But it looked to me as if the waters, wearied and beaten with their passionate struggle through the narrow Linn, must feel as if they had settled down finally into this sad black pool, and did not expect ever to creep out again into sunlight and everyday life. And yet they find their mistake. For you only have to go a few yards farther along the grassy left-hand bank, and you see once more the broad quiet river flowing over its stony bed, smiling and singing as before. Only, one fancies the waters can never be quite the same, after the experience they have passed through."

"You have made me see it all," Lettice murmured.

"I doubt that—without you went there. I am telling you what I saw years ago, and it would be the same now. Rocks and mountains and rivers don't change quickly as men change, only some years the Linn is more full than other years. But I think it might not have spoken so plain a tale to me, had the volume of water flowed high over the surrounding rocks, as it did when shut in between them. And I cannot paint in words the full picture, —the river, and the blue sky, and the stone bridge, and the trees around, and the contrasts of colouring. But you see enough, perhaps——"

"Enough to read your meaning," said Lettice.

"It is not my meaning, child. There is meaning in all God's works, if we would reach it. I think I did that day. I could not help myself, standing there on the bank, and looking down into the narrowed channel, and the harsh rocks, and the fretted rush of those changed waters, with the deep sad silent pool beyond. There came to me one of those strange glimpses into the beneath of things seen, that are sent to us sometimes. Everything would tell its story, if we always had sense to understand; and the Linn of Dee told me a story in plain words that day—a story of life."

"Of my life!"

"Maybe, though I did not know it then. I am not sure that it wasn't a story more or less of most people's lives. For a river does not flow on perpetually the same. It changes, and narrows, and widens, and it has its deeps and its shallows, and there is sometimes the rapid or the waterfall, and sometimes the linn with the black pool after."

"I think I have gone through the linn, and now I am coming to the black pool," said Lettice slowly. "That is just how life at Brentwood looks to me. And I am changed, and there has been tumult enough, whether or no I have shown it. But my black pool will last through life. I shall never be a singing river again."

"Maybe not, my dear child, till you have learnt the notes of heavenly song. Some can't get hold of that, till earth-songs are forgotten."

Lettice's eyes filled, and one little sob caught her breath. "I can't—I can't," she said. "I am all hardness and coldness. But you will—think of me —I know. Life in the black pool won't be bright."

"Maybe not for a while. But the onward movement will carry you out of it in time,—if it is there. Don't be too sure that the black pool must certainly lie ahead, even now. There may be the linn without the pool."

"Ah, you have not seen it so, Aunt Jeannie."

"I have,—at the Linn of Quoich. That is a sight I should like you to see, Lettice, as I saw it, in all its autumn beauty—the waters clear as crystal, and wild sweet woodland scenery around. I can recall the very tints of the trees that day—how one little slender birch on the edge of the stream stood out in full leaf, one mass of vivid gold, while near it another birch showed only a pale yellowish-brown tinting. There was the first bit of linn, with low rocks on either side, and then a widening, and then the rush of pure foaming water through a long narrow sharply-cut channel, passing under the bridge. But no black pool came after there. Don't be too sure, Lettice."

"I see the pool already," Lettice answered. "Aunt Jeannie, have you had a linn ever in your life?"

"There are few who don't know something of the sort, sooner or later. Strange it seems that we should have spoken of the Linn of Dee that afternoon, little knowing what lay before us. One can't explain the connecting-strings in our minds that draw up past recollections. It is a sight I have often recalled, but perhaps not so often spoken about. And after all—after all, Lettice—if God's hand shapes our course, it does not so much matter whether that course is over a golden river-bed, or through the narrow linn."

"Do you think not, Aunt Jeannie? But God's hand always shapes our course."

"In a sense, yes. There is another side to the question. His will may be to lead us one way, and our will may be to go another. Better His way than ours; but if we struggle and resist, He sometimes yields to our wilfulness and lets it be our way and not His. He shapes our course still, no less than before, but the Father's smile, and the Father's blessing are lacking, for how can He be pleased with His child?"

"I do not think I know God in that way," said Lettice quietly. "I believe in His love to others, Aunt Jeannie, but I cannot feel it towards myself. Some day perhaps I may. Hush—Violet is waking up."

And there could be no more conversation. Lettice was back immediately by her little sister's side.

"Five o'clock," remarked Miss Temple, on the following afternoon, as the shrill tones of the little mantelpiece clock drew her attention to the fact. "I declare there is quite a fall of sleet coming on. Those girls will have had a cold journey, poor things. Five o'clock, and the train arrives at half-past. But I never knew that train less than half-an-hour late. It is very bad management. I believe half the accidents come from trains being so irregular, and it ought to be stopped by Act of Parliament. I do not suppose the train will get in before six, and Vandal will have half an hour to wait on that cold platform. It is bad for him. He might just as well have allowed me to send Susan instead. I never knew Vandal take so much trouble before for anyone; did you, aunt?"

Lady Bartlett stirred slightly, and gave vent to a very faint snore.

"Some people really seem to be always sleeping," said Miss Temple rather pettishly. "One might as well look for sympathy from the chairs and tables. If Lettice were the sort of girl I could become attached to, I might find her a pleasant companion. But unless she is greatly changed, I am afraid she will be more of a trouble than a pleasure. Of course I intend to show her all possible kindness, but I suspect it will be needful to make her understand that she cannot manage everything and everybody here, as she has been accustomed to do in her own home. Probably it is the first time in her life that she ever had that lesson to learn. I could not say all this to Vandal; he would think it unkind. Men never understand. But you see what I mean, aunt, and the necessity for—— Really, I might as well be talking to a post. Aunt!"

The monosyllable rang out sharply, with a certain metallic twang in it which usually vibrated through Miss Temple's upper notes. The old lady started violently.

"Yes, yes—yes, my dear. Did somebody call?—is anything wrong?"

"You always seem to think something is wrong when I speak to you," said Miss Temple, failing to unite cause and effect. "Nothing is wrong that I know of, except that Lettice and Violet Majendie arrive this evening."

Lady Bartlett, only half awake, did not catch the words. She looked inquiringly, with sleepy eyes.

"Lettice and Violet," repeated Miss Temple in raised tones.

"Let you do what, my dear?"

"Lettice—Majendie," shouted Miss Temple.

"Ah, poor man, yes—I am always thinking about him. One of the saddest tales I ever heard—poor fellow."

Miss Temple went close in despair, and said, "The girls arrive in half-an-hour—this evening—Lettice and Violet."

"Yes, my dear, yes—of course I know that very well. You told me so this morning. I hope they will be nice girls, and the little one not noisy. I like children, but I can't stand noise. How old are they, did you say?"

"Lettice is just nineteen, and Violet, I believe, about ten. There is a long gap between them. The Majendies lost two babies, younger than Lettice."

Lady Bartlett nodded, in a manner more expressive of drowsiness than of interest. Miss Temple sighed, rang for lights, and took up a book, through the pages of which she failed to make rapid advance.

Half past five came, and despite Miss Temple's expectations of the train being late, her attention became very much on the alert. She fidgeted incessantly backwards and forwards, between fire-place and window, remarking on the weather, and wondering at the delay which she had foretold. Lady Bartlett, at length effectually aroused, sat up and kept watch with her. Six o'clock struck, and she said, "When are we going to have tea?" For late dinner was an institution never yet introduced into Proserpine Lodge. The two ladies dined early, ate heavy tea, and supped at nine.

"It is time now, of course," said Miss Temple. "But Vandal made me promise not to begin till the girls arrived. He said it would be a cold welcome."

"Cold bacon! I should have had cutlets for them after their long journey, poor things. Something hot."

"There they are!"

Miss Temple went out into the hall, a mixture of feelings struggling for preponderance in her mind. She did not gladly or happily accept this charge which had come upon her. She counted it a burden, and felt herself ill-used. Nevertheless she was sincerely sorry for the girls, wished to be a good friend to them, and felt considerable interest in their arrival.

"Here we all are!" said Vandal Temple's thin voice trying to be lively. "Very tired and cold, poor things—but you will make them comfortable, Selina. Have you a large fire in the drawing-room? They are half-frozen, I believe."

Lettice was entirely occupied in helping Violet up the steps, for the child's numbed feet could hardly support her. Miss Temple's "How do you do, my dear?" made her put out her hand, but when Miss Temple would have kissed Violet, the child shrank, and hid her face in her sister's fur sleeve. It was an unfortunate move, for Miss Temple felt herself rebuffed, and she was not of a nature to forget rebuffs easily.

"Spoilt, I see," she remarked.

Lettice's grey eyes gave one subdued flash.

"She is tired and ill, Selina, and unused to strangers. Violet, darling, you will shake hands with cousin Selina, will you not? Where shall I take her, if you please?"

Unintentionally Lettice gave offence by the very first words she uttered. It never occurred to her to address her cousin in any other mode than by the Christian name; but this was a matter wherein Miss Temple stood somewhat stiffly upon her dignities. "A chit of a girl of nineteen to call her Selina!"

Mr. Temple saw the blunder committed, and could have groaned over his own want of foresight in not preventing it. Miss Temple led the way back into the drawing-room, and he took the opportunity to say softly, "My sister prefers being called Miss Temple."

"Why? We are cousins."

"Not first cousins. And you are much the younger. My sister feels herself more in the position of aunt to you both."

"Very well. It does not matter either way."

She followed Miss Temple's lead into the drawing-room, where Lady Bartlett had to be introduced and shaken hands with. Lettice kept one arm supportingly round her little companion. Then, sitting down near the fire, she lifted Violet on her knee, and held her tightly. A wailing sob broke from the child, and Vandal looked distressed.

"I hope she is not given to crying about nothing," said Miss Temple.

"Nothing!" repeated Lettice.

"No, no; she is cold and tired and sick, poor child," said Vandal apologetically, looking from one to the other. "She will be better for tea. Don't cry, little one. Look here—see, pussy has come to make your acquaintance."

Vandal was afflicted with an abject horror of cats, and had never before been known to speak with toleration of this particular tabby quadruped.

But Violet sobbed on, without lifting her face. "We need not be a trouble to you, Sel—Miss Temple, I mean," said Lettice, lifting her own tearless but unsmiling grey eyes. "Perhaps I had better take Violet to our room."

"Is there a fire, Selina?" asked her brother.

"Why, no, of course not, Vandal. I do not have a fire in my bedroom. It is rather an expensive luxury for healthy girls."

Vandal entered on no discussion. He simply rang the bell, and said to the servant, "Light the fire immediately in Miss Majendie's room."

Miss Temple's face clouded. "That grate always smokes for an hour when it is first lighted," she said.

"It will be ready by the time tea is over. Take them into the spare-room, to wash their hands, Selina. That will save a flight of stairs. The sooner Violet has something hot to eat, the better."

Miss Temple obeyed, not quite gracefully. She led the girls up to the spare-room, ordered a can of hot water to be taken there, and left them alone. Lettice laid the weary child on the chintz-covered couch, and knelt down beside her.

"My poor little darling! My own little pet! Violet, my sweet one, you will be good and come and have some nice hot tea. And don't sob so—don't, darling—it makes me so unhappy."

"Oh, Lettice, if you would only take me home! I want mamma—papa—mamma! Oh, take me to Aunt Jeannie!"

Lettice's throat was aching and throbbing with stifled response to the child's cry; but no sob was allowed to rise. "You are tired and faint," she said; "you will be better after tea. Sweet one, you will be good for my sake, and not vex them?"

"I don't like cousin Selina!" sobbed the child.

"We don't really know her yet. I dare say she will be kind. She is giving us a home, you know, and we must not forget that. I cannot keep you in this cold room, Violet—and there is the tea-bell. Let me wash your face and hands, and smooth your hair. I have a brush in my bag."

The downstairs party had to wait five minutes longer before the tall slight girl, in her deep mourning, was seen descending the stairs, with the frail golden-haired white-cheeked child clinging to her. There was no getting the two apart. Miss Temple indicated a chair on either side of the table, but Violet's eyes filled, and she pressed closer to her sister.

"This seat," said Miss Temple. "Why, Violet, you are a perfect baby! A great girl of ten, to cry about such a thing as that!"

Vandal did not venture to propose changing his own position, but he took Violet's little icy hand, and drew her in between Lettice and himself.

"I should not wonder if we two could manage with one chair," he said, "neither of us being very big. Yes—just so. I thought it would do. The vacant chair appears to be bespoken," and Vandal smiled, with a subdued shudder, as the big cat sprang calmly up into the empty seat destined for Violet.

"If you are going to carry on the spoiling like that——" said Miss Temple.

"I wonder who spoils her cats," said Vandal, with a glance at pussy's blinking eyes. Apologetically he added, "Only the first evening."

Lettice gave him one grateful look, and then busied herself in attending to the child's wants. Her own were unthought of, and to draw her into conversation proved impossible. Her answers were chiefly in monosyllables, and nothing made the sad eyes light up, or the grave lips relax.

Tea over, Lettice begged to be excused, that she might put Violet to bed.

"Could not that big girl put herself to bed?" asked Miss Temple, but this was negatived by both sisters. Since parting with their servants, Lettice had always undertaken it.

"Then Lettice will of course come down as soon as Violet is undressed."

"Oh no," broke from Violet piteously.

"I cannot leave Violet alone, thank you."

"Nonsense, Lettice. She will be asleep soon. We have supper at nine."

"I shall not want any supper. You must excuse me, please. I could not leave Violet."

The door had hardly closed behind the sisters before Miss Temple exclaimed, "Absurd!"

"A pretty child—very pretty," said Lady Bartlett. "And Lettice Majendie has an interesting face, if only she would smile."

"A little spoilt creature," said Miss Temple. "But if Lettice supposes that I am going to let her turn everything upside down like this——"

"Have pity upon them, Selina. Think what they have gone through," said Vandal."

"I think you might have a little pity to spare for me," said Miss Temple. "But you seem quite infatuated. I never knew you take so much trouble for anyone before. Lettice may be a fine-looking girl, but to my mind her expression is positively disagreeable."

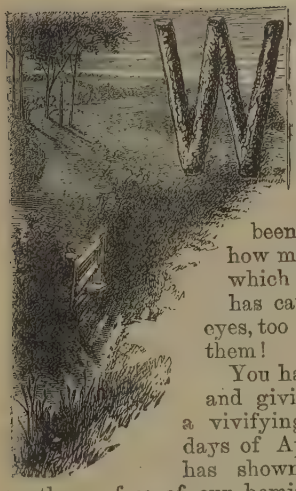
"Do pray manage to live together in peace," sighed Vandal, rising to say good-bye.

THE LINN OF QUOICH.

PARABLES CONCERNING SPRING.

BY PROFESSOR GAUSSEN.

II.



WHAT a striking parable, what an image, brilliant, lovely and majestic at the same time, of this new birth of the faithful have not these first days of the spring lately offered to us! How welcome have been these last weeks; and how many marvels the month which has just passed away has caused to be seen by our eyes, too often turned away from them!

You have seen the sun arising, and giving you with his light a vivifying heat. From the first days of April a breathing of life has shown itself to be moving on the surface of our hemisphere, like as formerly the creating Spirit on the waters of chaos. The earth has seemed to open itself and to bring forth. Instead of that snow which covered it some weeks ago, we have seen come forth in all places a carpet of verdure, as if to fix our regards, and to prepare them by degrees to contemplate the dazzling objects which spring was going to make shine one after the other to our eyes! How the face of the earth has changed in the space of some few days; how this motionless and inert body is become coloured and animated; how it is embellished; how radiant it becomes! We might say that Eden is going to revive; we might fancy that the garden of our first father is going to appear again to our eyes in all its pomp; that a soul has entered into all the objects which surround us; that an emotion of goodness has penetrated them; that they have felt it, that they are animated, that they breathe, and that they move. See how the smallest flower that adorns among millions the gardens of our meadows is more magnificently clothed than Solomon in all his glory. Hear how the birds of the air have resumed with delight their joyous accents; and how they sing above us the melodious concerts of spring; see how all living creatures, awakened into newness of life, render homage together, by their movements, and by their voices, to the goodness, the power, the wisdom of this creating God, "upon whom all beings wait, and who fills their hearts with joy." Everything is full of life; everything seems renewed; and the air itself that we breathe, refreshed by the early dews, embalmed with the sweetest perfumes, seems to us a balm of delight and as an elixir sent from heaven.

Oh, what a subject rich with wonder, with admiration and deeds of favour, for all who can think, for all who can feel! But you especially, you disciples of Jesus, what ought not you to feel, and what ought not you to acknowledge to your God? You who know that He who has made all these things, "has loved you from the beginning;" you who believe that "when you were dead in trespasses and sins, He gave you life by His Well-Beloved;" you who know that you have been reconciled to the Omnipotent One who vivifies all things, who sees everything, and who can do everything in all parts of the world; you who know that He attends you everywhere, that He works for you, that He takes care of you in the minutest circumstances of life!

Oh, disciple of Christ, contemplate this touching spectacle which surrounds thee, and think of what Jesus has done for thy soul. The Bible is still more beautiful than all these things; by it is given to thee to read in the beauties of creation sacred and mysterious things which escape the notice of the natural man, although they are traced by the hand of God himself on every plant, upon every leaf, upon every flower. Contemplate, then, these Divine characters, listen with respect to the lessons from on high, and like the thoughtful and holy Mary, lay them up in thy heart. "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for He hath visited and redeemed his people." The tender mercies of my God have been moved; the dayspring from on high hath visited me; winter was in my soul, but He has made there to dawn the morning of eternal spring; He has been 'pleased' to render me capable of having a part in the heritage of the saints in light.

The spring is a faithful as well as a charming image of the operation of grace in the heart of a disciple of Christ. See how this new birth in nature represents to us with truthfulness that new birth of the soul which the Holy Scripture calls regeneration, the baptism of the new birth, and the renewal of the Holy Spirit.

In the same way as Nature, at the return of the sun, is being set free from the frost which retained her in the bonds of sterility and of death—in the same way as she is in some manner raised from the tomb—so the soul of the faithful man who has known Jesus, "the Sun of Righteousness," has "passed from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God, and from death unto life" (according to the words of the Lord): it is risen again with Christ, born again to a lively hope, and raised as from the tomb. A new light enlightens it; eternal hopes gladden it; the spirit of the love of God shows itself; the preceding frosts melt every day, and will disappear at last; the storms of the passions calm; and the peace of God, the inexpressible conviction of the peace of God, makes itself to be deeply felt, in order to produce in their season "the fruits of righteousness," which, as an apostle has said, "are by Jesus Christ to the glory and the praise of God;" fruits, as he said in another place, which are "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Galatians v. 22, 23). I would repeat it in all my exhortations, because this truth is the first element of the Christian doctrine—you must be born again, the heart must be changed, you must be regenerated by the Holy Spirit, to be able to enter into the kingdom of heaven; and

"HARK! THE BIRDS WITH ARTLESS LAYS WARBLE THEIR CREATOR'S PRAISE;
WHERE IN WINTER ALL WAS SNOW,
NOW THE FLOWERS IN CLUSTERS GROW.
WHAT A CHANGE HAS TAKEN PLACE,
EMBLEM OF THE SPRING OF GRACE.
LORD, AFFORD A SPRING TO ME!
LET ME FEEL LIKE WHAT I SEE."

this regeneration, this resurrection of the soul unto this life, is a work of God as certain and as real as the revival of nature in the spring, and that there must be on the last day the change and resurrection of the body. Do not say, then, as did Nicodemus to Jesus Christ: "I cannot understand these things; how can a man be born again when he is old?" "Marvel not," replied the Saviour, "that I have said, Thou must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth; thou hearest the sound of it, thou feelest its power, yet without knowing whence it comes, nor whither it goes." It is the same with every man who is born of the Holy Spirit.

And can you, I ask, better understand the miracles of the spring? Can you explain how the sun, during millions of years, sheds without interruption, night and day, into all the senses, and in a sphere of sixty millions of leagues, torrents of light and of heat, without having lost any of his brightness and grandeur? Can you understand how at his approach, the earth is awakened from death, the plants retake life, the winged insects go forth from their chrysalis-state as from a tomb, the woods which seemed dead appear to breathe and are being covered with leaves, with flowers and with fruits, as in former times in the desert the rod of Aaron flourished at the voice of the Eternal? Can you understand the birth and growth of a single insect, of a single flower, of a single fruit, of a single blade of grass? No, my brethren, no, you believe in their existence, in these wonders, incomprehensible as they are, and you believe because you see them with your eyes in the book of nature. Well, believe also those of grace, which are of a still higher order, believe those of grace, incomprehensible as they are; and believe them because you read them with your eyes in the book of revelation. You believe in the return of spring even in the midst of the snows and frosts of winter, although you cannot understand how life can succeed death. Believe also, for God has said so, even when you may not comprehend it—believe that he who looks to Jesus, and believes in Him, receives into his soul the principle of a new life and the earnest of eternity.

But, would any of you say now that he does not know how he can be born again? Would he ask how a soul that feels its weakness, its barrenness, its coldness for the service of God, and the rage of passions which torment it, can dissipate this winter of his being, melt these snows and take again a new life?

Well, listen, sincere and heavy-laboured souls, you who desire, and search for communion with your God: this is how you can find repose and renew the vigour of life. Listen: you must cease to seek in yourself, in your own efforts and away from the Sun of Righteousness, a heat and a vital force which is not there and which cannot come but from on high. You must bring your sad state to the rays of His grace: for, as a prophet has said, "He carries healing in his wings." Present then to Him a poor heart that He may give it life. Bring every day your regards to Him alone who can work in you this blessed change, and give you a new life. "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth!" Look then to Him; look to things on high where He lives to intercede for you. Represent to yourself often the greatest, the most perfect, the best of beings, the eternal Son of the Father, directing to you from the height of heaven His watchful eye, with an inexpressible tenderness, stretching towards you the arms of His love, and addressing to you these very touching and encouraging words: All you who are burdened and heavily laden, by the torpor of your souls, and by the overwhelming sense of your misery, come to Me, look to Me, and I will give you rest and peace! Then, my brethren, if you do these things, I declare by the infallible word of God, "who cannot lie," you certainly will be saved.

But will you receive a final lesson? Will you hear concerning the truth which I am preaching to you, a new parable of the spring still more striking if it is possible? It is about this time of the year that the countryman grafts on wild trees the precious branch of a cultivated tree, in order to communicate to them a second nature, that being filled with a purer sap, they may give exquisite fruits instead of the sour, wild, and unhealthy grapes which they did before. Observe, my brethren, what comes to pass in every Christianised heart. Alas! we are all by nature wild trees bringing forth bad fruit. The Scripture teaches us this, and our own hearts convince us of it. In order that we may enter into the celestial Eden, it is needful that the Father of all goodness deign in his mercy to open our hearts by his word, which is a two-edged instrument. He then inserts in them, like a precious branch, the principle of a new nature—the Divine grafting of his grace. He then takes especial care of the new growth, and defends the new man thus regenerated against many dangers.

Oh, my soul! hast thou then received this grace of thy God? Hast thou Jesus Christ dwelling in thee by faith? Art thou grafted on the good olive-tree, thou who wast by nature wild (to speak with the apostle Paul)? Canst thou say as he did, "It is no longer I who live, it is Christ who lives in me"? Canst thou say, as he wrote to the Romans, that thou walkest in newness of life, and that thou art become one same plant with Christ by the likeness of his resurrection? Dost thou feel within thee new principles, a new life, new affections; love for the gifts of heaven, and distaste for the pleasures of the world; love for the word of thy God, and distaste for the conversations that draw thee from it; love for holiness, and distaste for the sins to which thou gavest thyself up in the days of thy ignorance: love for prayer instead of dislike, which thou foundest in it formerly; love for Jesus; love for the souls that Jesus came to redeem; love for all men in return for this all-gracious love which thy God has had for thee?

Oh, my brethren, whoever you are, who can render to yourselves this testimony, take courage. You are entered into Jesus Christ; you love Him; you belong to Him; He has promised to be with you until the end of the world. Take good courage. It is to you that He has said, "Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit may endure." Remain in Him, and He in you; remain united to Him, as the vine is to the branch, and then fear nothing, He will not abandon you.

But also you must imitate the industrious and diligent cultivator who applies himself carefully, after having grafted the wild tree, to crop all the shoots of a bitter sort that the natural branches would still produce, in order that the precious branch which gives to the tree a new life, may receive without detriment the nourishing juice, that it may grow, that it may gather strength, and that at last it alone may put forth vigorous shoots, and give in its season fruits which may rejoice its Master.

Take care, then, says the apostle Paul to us, alluding no doubt to this parable of the spring—take care that you are striving earnestly for sanctification, without which no man shall see the Lord, "looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled" (Heb. xii. 15). Prune with care every day these natural branches, which may stifle the grace grafted in you; mortify in you every day the members of the old man; divest yourselves of the old man and of his works; and having put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him who has formed him, become, as the elect of God, clothed with feelings of mercy, of goodness, of humility, of gentleness and of patience.

Yes, my brethren, be humbled, but do not let yourselves be discouraged by those remains of the old nature, by those branches of bitter sap, which, alas, bring forth still in you too much of bitter fruit. Be deeply humiliated, but do not let yourselves be discouraged, elect of the Lord, "plants on which He has continually his eyes." And every time that at the sight of this law of sin, which still fights in you against the law of your conscience, the deep sighing of a Christian soul shall oppress your heart, and say, "Miserable that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" answer, like the apostle, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Jesus Christ, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit."

Strengthen yourselves, then, in the Lord, fight valiantly, and take courage! Yet some storms, yet some tempests, yet some returns of frosts, yet some miseries, some efforts, some resistances, and the old nature will be completely subdued; and you will see arise that glorious day in which the Father of his family will come and visit his fields. Then when on this terrible day "every tree that brings not forth good fruit" shall be cast away, you will by His grace be transplanted into His glory; and there in the eternal spring of Eden on high, every tear shall be wiped away, all storms shall have ceased. We shall see, we shall hear, we shall feel, what the eye has never seen, and the ear has never heard, and what the heart has never felt!

SATURDAY EVENING.

"The toil-worn Cotter frae his labour goes,
This night his weekly moil is at an end,
Collects his spades, his mattocks, and his hoes,
Hoping the morn in ease and rest to spend,
And weary, o'er the moor, his course does homeward bend."—The Cotter's Saturday Night.

IF your life has been spent in towns, there are some of the aspects of Saturday evening which you have never known, and least of all have you learned to associate with it that sense of calm, placid joyfulness, which seems of its very essence. To those of us whose earlier days have been spent among quiet, rural scenes, the very name of Saturday evening brings restfulness even yet amid the bustle of a great city, to whose ever-surging activities scarce even Sunday seems able to say, "Peace, be still." We close our eyes, and immediately we are back in an old-fashioned village, a centre of farmsteads. At one end of it lay three bosky parks, "Cow-fields" the country folk called them, and on Saturday evenings these were all astir. The maidens seemed to go to their milking more briskly than on other nights: their faces were brighter, and their dress was more neat than usual, and perchance by their side to carry the pitcher home, was some favoured lad, glorious in clean moleskin, and brown with six days' labour in the sun. Young husbands sauntered past our door with little children in their arms, or "toddling" by their side, and went their ways to watch the milking, or wander over the soft grass under the sweet light of a setting summer sun.

As the evening hours went on, the road which ran through the village grew "busy" with young folk going home, in their hands generally a little bundle tied up in a coloured handkerchief; young lads whose work lay miles off trudging homewards, their earnings in their pockets, to spend the Sunday under the parental roof, or to pour some story of affection into willing ears; young lasses who were "at place," coming to spend at least the evening with their mothers.

And by-and-by the village "shop"—that wonderful little shop with everything in it!—grew crowded, as village folks deem crowds. I remember yet the creaking baskets which the women carried, and which were to bear home a week's supplies, bread, butter, eggs, candles, and—most indispensable—the ounce of peppermints, to help out children's patience next day at church. There was no hurrying through the purchases, for the shop was the spot where the parish held levee, and many a family "chat" was held in it, and friends who scarcely ever met elsewhere discussed their household affairs together there, or talked the news of the country-side.

At last the family gathered in the little cottage, and in the "gloamin'," if it was summer, or by the light of the candle, if it was winter, took their evening meal, and each told how it had fared with him or her during the week. The father and mother listened, pleased to hear how their son succeeded in his apprentice-work, or how their daughter had got golden words of approval from her mistress; or perhaps, the talk was interrupted, as the poet Burns tells, by some "neebor lad" whose "rap comes gently to the door." But, above all things, it was a "family" season; and what Christmas Day is in busy London, where households, saving then, see so little of each other, that many a Saturday evening was in days which are not so old, and is still in many an English hamlet and Scottish glen.

Such has been the Saturday evening of the country through generations: calm, but not inactive; restful, but not listless; sweetly linking together the action of the week and the rest of a Sabbath day; the blending made complete, when the father of the family read from "the big ha' Bible," and then knelt in prayer, never forgetting to pray that "the rest of the night" might "prepare for the exercise of the coming day."

"The priest-like father reads the sacred page,
How Abram was the friend of God on high;
Or, Moses bade eternal warfare wage,
With Amalek's ungracious progeny;
Or, how the royal bard did groaning lie
Beneath the stroke of Heaven's avenging ire;
Or, Job's pathetic plaint, and wailing cry;
Or, rapt Isaiah's wild, seraphic fire;
Or other holy seers that tune the sacred lyre.

Then kneeling down, to Heaven's Eternal King,
The saint, the father, and the husband prays:
Hope 'springs exulting on triumphant wing,'
That thus they all shall meet in future days;
There ever bask in uncreated rays,
'No more to sigh or shed the bitter tear,
Together hymning their Creator's praise,
In such society, yet still more dear;
While circling time moves round in an eternal sphere."

I cannot write of these things without recalling one Saturday evening spent among the Highland hills of Scotland. Going out for a solitary stroll, I wandered to the top of a hill which overlooks Loch Tay. Going up the one side, I had seen in the distance the cone-shaped peak, grey and bare, Sinai-like, of Schiehallion; but from the top the fair Loch Tay lay stretched before me, and as, amid the deepening shadows, I looked down on it through the trees, the silent glory of nature seemed to enter into one's inmost soul, and fill it with silent praise. I wandered down to the water's side, and stood awhile on the little knoll where the river Tay issues from its parent-lake, and where, too, stands the sweet church of Kenmore. The church was open, and the church choir was singing the next day's psalms and hymns: and just then the sounds which passed out into the porch where I stood were the simple, quaint strains of "St. Mary's." There was something in the song and its surroundings never to be forgotten—in one's ears, the old melody which Englishmen and Scotchmen have sung for centuries, which we in England sing to the hymn which speaks of "Mercy's gate"—

"A gate that opens wide to those
That do lament their sin;
Shut not that gate against me, Lord,
But let me enter in";

before one's eyes Loch Tay, most peaceful of Scottish lakes; the great "bens" hidden the while in the gathering darkness; the little hills, which form the near view, "rejoicing on every side." It remains to the soul an indestructible picture, a very parable of Saturday evening for the time to come.

So much for the ideal Saturday evening, as the city man will say, who, even to the week's close, half-holiday and all, somehow cannot work himself out of his work-a-day feelings till Sunday morning comes: and certainly there is another side of Saturday evening, with which they whose weakness does not lie towards country life, and who do not "babble o' green fields," are more familiar; a side full of interest, too, and brimful of study in human nature—the Saturday evening of the city. I do not speak of what it is in our West-end—there I scarce think it differs much from other nights; but, as we have been talking of plain people throughout, let us talk of plain people still. The picture now is a less restful picture; it is indeed rather a stage than a picture, and crowds of men and women are seen passing and repassing continually: it is a night of buying and selling, of concert-going, and I know not of how manifold activities. In London, for instance, especially just a little way outside that charmed circle which we call "the city," the main thoroughfares are full of bustle. The shopkeeper has made his windows vanish, and his wares are open to the street, while he himself bawls in your ears the story of their excellence. Woe to you if you linger a little merely to look; his discourse immediately receives a personal application, for this is a night for buying, and not for looking on. The streets are full of purchasers: housewives buying the Sunday's dinner, girls buying some fascinating scarf, the thoughtful lad, perchance, picking up a book at some stall.

Upon such scenes that wonderful man Dr. Kitto, ardent student, to whom nothing human was alien, loved to look. However busy he had been all the week he seldom missed the "glory of the shops" on Saturday night. "This was because," he says, "as an observer of character, I took much interest in seeing the working people abroad with their wives, laying out the money which their week's labour had produced, and in witnessing the activity which this circumstance gave to many streets, and inspecting the commodities there exposed for sale in the open air. I felt that I could enter with interest into the feelings of the various parties pausing, hesitating, or purchasing, at the various shops and stalls, materials for the hiss of universal fry, which on Saturday night ascends from fifty thousand hearths, and for the scarcely more enjoyed bake of the Sunday dinner." And then this deaf man, who saw so much, pictures the home-going, and the sensation caused among the children as the "treasures of the basket" were displayed; and tells even of the interest which the bands of barrel-organists, and fiddlers, and singers, called out in him, while he watched the impression made upon bystanders. It would, I think, do good to the heart of many a man whose six days are spent behind a ledger, and whose seventh is passed in Christian worship and work, to spend a Saturday evening hour in studying with kindly eye the ways of his poorer brethren and sisters as they go to market. If only the curse of drink were removed, and the multitude of licensed drinking-places diminished, Saturday night would bring less of sadness and more of cheerfulness even to the poorest places of the great city. The Master who did so love to be among the people, would teach an observer of the busy scenes lessons which are worth his learning, and would answer in new ways the question, which, alas, in the crowd and bustle of city-life, has become so clamant for an answer, "And who is my neighbour?" To such a man Sunday would dawn with a fairer light, and he would go to his church and to his Sunday-school more full of power, because more full of sympathy.

But there is another side still to Saturday evening, to which these thoughts lead us: it is a time of preparation. Isaac Taylor speaks of it as "Saturday evening, which devout persons, whose leisure permits them to do so, are accustomed to devote to preparatory meditation," and the whole of that book of his which takes its name from it, is based upon the idea of this evening as being a preparation for Sabbath rest. If we go back into the history of old times, we find it bearing throughout the same character; and there are signs that in the early centuries the Church gave it a place in its regard by the very side of the Lord's Day. It was one of the Gregories, I think, who spoke of Saturday and Sunday as "sisters," and said that one could not speak lightly of the one without offering insult to the other; whilst in the Church of Ambrose at Milan their near kinship was similarly recognised. Turning to more recent times, however, we do not find it generally regarded as holding quite so high a place; and, while the sentiment which regards it as a vestibule to that temple of worship, the Lord's Day, has exerted an abiding influence, it has not come specially within the circle of "sacred seasons." Yet there are some traces in the history of Scottish Presbyterianism of men being blamed and even had up before the "session," for such an offence as late trading on Saturday night.

For instance, an old Scotch session-record contains a reference to the trial of some culprit, for "selling of milk on ane Satturday at nyt after ten o'clock." And there is still clearer evidence that in the Puritan colony of New England it received from the beginning special recognition. Indeed, there is some reason to suppose that, following Jewish modes in this as in some other things, the Puritans of New England kept their Sabbath from sunset to sunset; a practice which has been kept up by some of their descendants till very recent times.

It is not unnaturally supposed that this was due to the influence of John Cotton, a man who was counted for little less than a prophet in New England, and whose practice in this matter is not left in doubt. "The Sabbath," says Cotton Mather, "he began the evening before; for which keeping of the Sabbath from evening to evening, he wrote arguments before his coming to New England, and I suppose it was from this reason and practice that the Christians of New England have generally done so too. When that evening arrived he was usually longer in his exposition in his family than at other times; he then catechised his children and servants, and prayed with them, and sang a psalm: from thence he retired into study and secret prayer, till the time of his going unto his repose." It seems as if the meditations which had preceded this "repose" combined with it to send him forth on the following day like a giant refreshed; for we are told that he had "such an insinuating and melting way in his preaching, that he would usually carry his very adversary captive after the triumphant chariot of his rhetoric"; and that "whatever he delivered in the pulpit was soon put into an order of court, if of a civil, or set up as a practice in the church, if of an ecclesiastical, concernment." This was the man whose individuality was stamped upon the opening life of Massachusetts, a man in whom the spirit of Christianity was clad in a somewhat Mosaic form, and whose views on such questions as that of the Sabbath might be characterised as Judaic in their outward seeming; but, withal, a man whose religion was so intensely real that men were fain to take it for all-in-all from its inner spirit to the very hem of its garment. And so, as it would seem through this man's influence, Saturday evening became a sacred season to the men of New England.

We on our part are content, however, to place it within the domain of Christian liberty, and rightly so. Only let the sentiment of preparation and anticipation be tenderly fostered, and only let it be in some sort a meet gateway out of the God-given week of work into the God-given day of rest, let even the hard-pressed hail it as carrying within it the promise of a morrow on which a risen Saviour will say, "Peace be with you!"—then, however it is outwardly spent, it will not be spent in vain. And thus, week linked to week, life will run its holy way of faith and love, till it also comes to its Saturday evening, which is the "gate of heaven."

Faith and Prayer.

"Hitherto have ye asked nothing in My name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full."—John xvi. 24.

MOURNER! thou whose tears are flowing
While no comforter seems nigh;
Thou who weepest, all unknowing
Of Thy gracious Friend on high;
O believe! believe and pray,
Jesus will not say thee nay!

Thou whose heart is almost breaking
With life's toil and care and pain,
What though now thy watching, waking
Seemeth to be all in vain;
O believe! believe and pray,
Jesus will not say thee nay!

Thou who com'st with earnest pleading
For some loved one wand'ring far
From the path of life, unheeding
Where the hidden dangers are:
O believe! believe and pray,
Jesus will not say thee nay!

Thou whose life is spent in striving
'Gainst the swelling tide of sin;
Long'st thou for that blest reviving
Ere the years of peace begin?
Still believe, believe and pray,
Jesus will not say thee nay!

Though His promise seem delaying,
Patient wait thou to the end;
He is but in mercy staying
Ere th' o'er-flowing cup He send:
Trust Him still, believe and pray,
Never will He say thee nay!

Come in joy and come in sorrow,
Come to Jesus as thy Friend;
Be not careful for the morrow,
He will keep thee to the end:
Only trust, believe and pray,
And He will not say thee nay.

GEORGE HAYDON'S FIRST AND LAST VOYAGE.

OF all the youths belonging to my flock, there was not one in whom I felt a deeper interest than George Haydon.

He was, without exception, the most beautiful youth that ever my eyes beheld. His stature, which was somewhat tall for his years (he was between sixteen and seventeen), his golden hair, of silken softness, his large blue eyes, brimful of intelligence, his broad and lofty forehead, indicating mental endowments of the highest order, his fair complexion and exquisitely-formed and well-proportioned features —all combined to give him such a prepossessing appearance that he could not fail to attract the attention of even the most casual observer.

Fair as the casket was, the jewel within was fairer still. A more amiable disposition, a more generous heart or a braver spirit never animated a human frame. Thus formed to be an equally admired and loved, it is scarcely to be wondered at that he became a universal favourite.

Being an only son, the danger was that he should be "idolised," as it is called, or that he should take that place in the hearts of his parents and of his only sister which the Creator claims for Himself, and that by over-indulgence, he should become what is significantly designated a "spoilt child."

Fortunately, however, a counteractive to this existed in the piety of his mother on the one hand, and the sternness of his father's rule on the other. Mr. and Mrs. Haydon both alike loved their boy, and both alike were justly proud of him, and as he was their only son, it was their hope that he would be spared to grow up to manhood, take his father's place in the firm, and be the comfort and joy of their declining years.

With a view to the realisation of this hope, it was after long and painful deliberation, in which I bore a part, resolved that George should go abroad, and it was arranged that he should make his first voyage to Calcutta.

With that love of romance so common in boys of his age, and with his imagination excited at the prospect of adventures in distant lands, and amidst strange scenes, he was not only willing but eager to fall in with the proposed arrangement. Although Mr. Haydon, after having made up his mind thus to send George off to get some practical knowledge of the commercial world previous to settling down to business, took care never to express the slightest degree of doubt as to the wisdom of the step he had resolved on taking, it was evident that he was sadly distressed at the prospect of parting with his boy. As for the mother, while she gave her consent to the arrangement, she never attempted to conceal the fact that she did so merely out of deference to her husband and the urgent entreaties of the lad. It was vain to try to persuade her, either of the necessity or the utility of the measure, for she seemed to have some instinctive dread of the consequence in which it would result. When at last, however, it was fixed that he should go, she set herself quietly, although sadly, about preparing his outfit. She took a melancholy pleasure in attending personally to all the details of this business, taking care that he should be well furnished with all sorts of clothing and other necessaries which might be requisite for his comfort when he should be beyond the reach of her maternal care. When at last the "kit" was complete on the morning of the 15th of October, the day fixed for his departure, presenting him with a new Bible on which she had with her own hand inscribed his name, she drew from him the promise that he would daily read a portion of the Holy Book, and morning and evening remember her in his prayers.

Not much was said at this last interview between them, but many and tender were their mutual caresses. "God bless you, my darling boy, my dear, my own, my only son." "God bless you, my own, sweet, darling mother! Don't be so vexed; I will soon be back! Going to India is nothing at all nowadays, and you know that this will be the best part of my education! There now," he said, giving her another kiss; "my darling mother, don't cry any more. I'm off to get things ready for the train. I'll be home by Christmas twelve-months, and see if I don't bring you and Maud some splendid presents from Calcutta." So saying, he rose and was making towards the door. "George, George!" sobbed his sorrow-stricken mother, "just one kiss more! Now mind that you don't forget your Bible, and that you pray for your poor heartbroken mother; for I shall never be happy more until I see you again."

Before starting by train for London, where he was to embark for Calcutta, George came to bid me good-bye. I found him in a somewhat anxious state of mind. I had frequently spoken to him on the question of his own personal interest in Christ, but had never received that satisfaction as to his safety in Jesus that I should have liked. The present circumstances I felt were peculiarly favourable for close personal dealing, and I resolved to embrace the opportunity. The result was highly satisfactory. George had been experiencing the usual difficulty as to the want of feeling, and I tried to put him right on that point.

"Have you got your passage taken out?"

"Yes."

"What is the name of the vessel?"

"The 'Mongolia.'"

"Have you seen the 'Mongolia?'"

"No, of course I have not; you know I have never seen either sea or ship in my life."

"Who is the proprietor of the vessel?"

"Lockhart and Co."

"Have you seen Lockhart and Co.?"

"No, not I. I did not think it was necessary."

"Are you quite sure, then, that there are such parties, and that there is such a vessel, and that when you go to London you will find a berth in the 'Mongolia' prepared for you?"

"Sure! Why, yes, of course I am."

"How are you sure; on what ground do you rest your assurance?"

"On what ground am I sure? Well, here is my ticket. I got it sent me when so much of the passage-money was sent."

"And do you mean to say, that that bit of paper is the only ground on which you are building your hope of being taken to Calcutta?"

"Why, of course it is."

"Well, now George; that is merely the written word of a man, and yet on the strength of it, you are leaving your father and mother and home and going off to India?"

"Yes, but you see they are bound to take me; it's a bargain between them and me."

"Just so, and you are sure that they will fulfil their bargain."

I then applied the illustration and showed him God's written word is the ground of our assurance, that our feelings have nothing in the first instance to do with it, that all we have got to do is take out our passage, without money and without price, and then to trust in God that He will make good his engagement and land us safe in heaven.

It seemed as if new light had fallen from heaven on his mind, and as we rose from our knees at the table, where these lines are being penned, after we had knelt in prayer, with his countenance radiant with joy, while at the same time his long eyelashes were wet with tears, he said, "I see things now as I never saw them before. I was waiting to feel; now I feel in spite of myself. I was waiting to feel before I could be sure that I was safe; now that I am sure that I am safe I feel happier than ever I felt before."

After this visit I never saw George Haydon any more. He sailed to Calcutta as it had been arranged, enjoyed the voyage out immensely, wrote home frequently while in that "City of Palaces." His parents' hearts were cheered by the lively and glowing epistles of their hopeful son, and at length patience seemed to be About to receive its reward by their seeing him once more at home.

The vessel had left Calcutta and was in the river on its homeward voyage. But, alas for human hopes. Cholera broke out on board on the second day of the voyage. Cholera! that dreadful scourge of oriental regions! More deadly a destruction far than pestilence or famine! And amongst its victims was numbered George Haydon.

Intelligence of the appalling calamity was telegraphed to the proprietor of the vessel, to whom I happened to be known, and he wrote requesting me to break the sad news to the young man's parents.

Never did I feel so crushed and overwhelmed in all my life with such a message. I knew not what to do. The father might possibly survive the shock—but the mother! I felt sure that the tidings would be her death. Her life had been bound up in that of her boy. She had been subject to heart-disease, moreover, and could not bear excitement. I felt as if I had been chosen to do the dreadful work of an executioner, and I could not help chafing at the owner of the unfortunate vessel for having saddled me with such an awful responsibility.

Go, however, and break the terrible news, I must, and so with heavy heart and leaden steps, I repaired to the house which, from the moment I should cross its threshold, was doomed to become the dismal tomb in which a family's joy should be for ever buried.

In vain I tried to conceal my emotion, and my embarrassment at once betrayed the fact that I was the bearer of a secret which I knew not how to reveal. The keenness of the maternal instinct divined the truth before I had uttered it: "You have heard about George; how is he?"

I hesitated. In her anxiety for an answer a moment seemed an hour; and before I could form my mouth to give a reply, she exclaimed, in an agony of rising but suppressed emotion, "Oh, tell me, is he alive or dead?"

I could not say he was alive, and she at once concluded that he was dead, and heaving a deep sigh she fell on the floor, as if pierced through the heart with a deadly weapon.

It proved just as I had feared. The blow was too much for her, and it may be said to have been fatal in its results, for although she rallied so far as to be able after a lengthened illness to move about, the strength of her life was gone, and henceforth there was nothing for her, but to wait for the longed-for hour of her discharge when she should be allowed to go to her son who never could come back to her.

George's body was taken ashore, and along with that of the captain, who fell a victim to the same malady, was laid in its final resting-place in Diamond Harbour. He fell asleep in Jesus, who sealed him as his own before he set out on his first and what was destined to prove his last voyage, and there in that far-distant spot, washed by the waves of the Indian Ocean, he rests until the resurrection morning.

IF NOT, WHY NOT?

IN A CHURCH AT LUBECK IS THE FOLLOWING MURAL INSCRIPTION:—

You call Me the Master	and you do not question Me.
You call Me the Light	and you do not look to Me.
You call Me the Way	and you do not follow Me.
You call Me the Life	and you do not wish for Me.
You call Me the Wise	and you give Me no attention.
You call Me the Lovely	and you love Me not.
You call Me Rich	and you ask Me nothing.
You call Me the Everlasting	and you seek Me not.
You call Me the Merciful	and you trust Me not.
You call Me the Noble	and you serve Me not.
You call Me the Almighty	and you honour Me not.
You call Me the Righteous	and you fear Me not.
I condemn you	and you cannot blame Me.

MAY 1.

LOST AND FOUND. LUKE XV. 1–10.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 10.—'Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.'

CONNECTION.—Since the date of the preceding Lesson, our Lord had remained in Peræa: He is now again on His way to Jerusalem (ch. xiii. 22); to the Feast of Dedication (John x. 22). Somewhere in His progress He had once more accepted an invitation from a leading Pharisee (ch. vii. 36; xi. 37) to eat bread on the Sabbath day (ch. xiv. 1). Again He had been invidiously 'watched,' and had uttered words of solemn warning. As He arose from the table and went forth, great multitudes accompanied Him (ch. xiv. 25); and in particular many of the outcasts, encouraged by His sympathy.

I. JESUS RECEIVING SINNERS.—Read vers. 1, 2. There is no emphasis in the word Then. The reference is to our Lord's whole ministry at that time. The tax-gatherers and sinners were continually drawing near, in some measure, perhaps, attracted by His bold rebukes of the Pharisees (comp. Mark xii. 37), but more by His gentleness and love. And His intercourse with these outcasts was familiar. He not only receiveth sinners, it was said, but eateth with them. It was this, especially, that aroused the scorn of the self-righteous. 'If He were of God, would He not choose as His associates the pure and the holy?' Or if He addressed the sinful and the vile, would it not be as from some higher ground, holding Himself at a distance while He rebuked their sins, and taught them the way of holiness? That He should come down to the level of these degraded ones was the chief wonder. Is not a man known by the company he keeps? Nor is it always well to consort with the vicious. 'It may have been the wisdom of those who knew themselves predisposed to the infection to flee from the infected; but He was the Physician who boldly sought out these, that His health might overcome their disease, His righteousness their sin' (Trench). Perhaps we can hardly enter into the feelings of these Scribes and Pharisees—their astonishment and loathing at a thing so new. For Christianity has effected a revolution in men's thoughts on the matter. 'Would any one think it a reproach now to a teacher or minister of religion that he sought out the sinful? that he went among the lower and more degraded of his fellow-creatures, and acted on his Master's principle, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance"? These things are understood, now, thanks to the Gospel. There is such a thing as reflected light; and much of what we call humanity or good sense is in reality the effect of having long had Christ (as He Himself says) "teaching in our streets."'* So in a measure we can understand this—abhorrence of the sin, sympathy with the sinner; infinite Holiness and infinite Love! And if He attracted the guilty, and Himself went among them, it was only to rescue, to transform. They all felt, as they flocked around Him, that He who received them as sinners, would not leave them in their sins.

II. PARABLE OF THE LOST SHEEP.—Read vers. 3–7. The imagery of this parable would come home to Christ's hearers, both as inhabitants of that pastoral region, and as readers of the Old Testament Scriptures. Soon afterwards, he expanded the thought into those two Divine discourses recorded John x. The chief lessons of the parable are the compassion of the shepherd, the helplessness of the sheep, the joy of recovery, with an implied rebuke to the would-be shepherds of the people for their want of charity (Ezek. xxxiv. 4). The wilderness, in which the ninety-and-nine are left, is no wild desert, but the open pasture-land, in which they might safely graze, under the care of servants. In the application of the parable the Scribes and Pharisees are permitted to regard themselves as in God's fold. Jesus had often enough exposed their hollow and insincere character. Now He says, Even though you were all you seem to be, it is natural to leave you to seek the lost. What man of you? Man is emphatic. If you would do this, need you wonder that it is God's way? The appeal is to something more than the shepherd's sense of proprietorship. To recover one out of a hundred, as a mere matter of gain, would hardly be worth the trouble, but the shepherd feels for the forlorn condition of the silly wandering creature. 'Is there in reality a creature in the animal world more to be pitied than a strayed sheep? It is destitute both of the instinct necessary to find its way, and of every weapon of self-defence. It is a prey to any beast which may meet it; it deserves as no other being in nature the name of lost' (Godet). Note the persistency of the shepherd; until he find it: after a journey, it may be, prolonged and painful,* his tenderness to the wanderer when found, layeth it on his (literally His own) shoulders, his heartfelt delight; rejoicing: and the way in which that delight is shared; he calleth together his friends and neighbours. Then follows the sublime application. The sheep restored is the sinner that repenteth; the fold is heaven, and the joy is that which fills this home of blessedness and love.

> But who, exactly, are the ninety-and-nine which need no repentance? Generally, the Pharisees, taken at their own estimate. See the Prayer of Manasses in the Apocrypha: 'Thou, therefore, O Lord, that art the God of the just, hast not appointed repentance to the just, as to Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, which have not sinned against Thee; but Thou hast appointed repentance unto me that am a sinner.' But our Lord's words go beyond any such reference, intimating, first, that there is something corresponding to human sympathies in the regard paid by heaven to earth. It is natural to us to feel a keener joy, for the time at least, over that which we have just recovered, than over that which has long been safe with us. Heaven also is conscious of this joy. Then, again, as Dr. Chalmers has shown in his Astronomical Discourses, these just persons may represent the unfallen part of the creation, and the wandering sheep our sinful humanity—'all the sympathies of heaven awake on the enterprise of Him who has travelled in the greatness of His strength to seek and to save us.'†

III. PARABLE OF THE LOST PIECE OF SILVER.—Read vers. 8–10.—This parable repeats in substance the lesson of the former, yet with interesting and beautiful variations. That was a parable for the field, coming home to the men among His hearers: this is one for the home, touching the hearts of the women. Note the difference between the two kinds of loss; the sheep signifying foolish, yet voluntary wandering, this piece of silver or drachma (equal to the denarius) the unconscious state of many a sinner; and in the proportion of loss—to the shepherd the hundredth part, to the woman one-tenth. Observe, the lost coin is silver still; every soul is precious, although lost: and it is a coin, it bears the King's image and superscription, though defaced, and in the dust. If in the former parable the Shepherd may in its highest application denote Christ Himself, so here the woman may represent the Church. Note the vivid picture of carefulness and perseverance in the quest—the lighted candle, the house swept in all its corners, 'not without dust,' Bengel, and the persistent searching until the drachma is found. Then, again, there is joy: the friends and neighbours being now more explicitly interpreted as the angels of God, while a hint of a yet higher gladness is conveyed in the words In the presence of, etc., not simply among the angels, as though the gladness were theirs only; but in the realm where they dwell. The joy fills heaven, and is preeminently the joy of GOD HIMSELF. The salvation of men is 'the pleasure of the Lord,' Isa. liii. 10, 'the joy that was set before Christ,' Hebrews xii. 2. In this His Church shares; but mark a difference even here. The Shepherd said, My sheep, the woman does not say, My piece of silver. On the other hand, the woman says, which I had lost, the Shepherd only, which was lost. 'A sheep,' says Trench, 'strays of itself, but a piece of money could only be missing by a certain negligence on the part of such as should have kept it.'

But whether such analogies are to be pressed or not, there is in both parables a reference to the work which we may do, and the joy which we must feel, in the restoration of the wandering and the lost. The 'sheep' and the 'piece of silver' variously represent those whom we are to seek. All high qualities of character are needed for the task—manly courage, enterprise and endurance, as of the shepherd, womanly patience, diligence, and minute observation, as of the searcher for the silver. The 'candle,' too, needs to be lighted—the lamp of truth and grace; and the house must be swept, every means employed to search out for the good that is hidden or lost. Faithful preaching lights the candle; faithful organisation of charity sweeps the house (Plumptre). The joy over rescued souls that fills the church is above all an unselfish joy. The friends and neighbours of the parables are the fellow-disciples of those who have been successful in Christ's work, and who joyfully tell what they have been enabled to do for Him. The joy of many a missionary meeting has been like this joy of angels!

QUESTIONS.

1. On what other occasions was our Lord blamed for receiving sinners?

2. Where else does the parable of the Lost Sheep occur? Does it appear to have been spoken twice?

3. 'Lost in the mountains;' 'lost in the house.' What contrast in the characters of sinners may here be suggested?

4. Illustrate from other passages the interest which the angels feel in the triumphs of Christ's love.

AN ILL WEED.

BY CRONA TEMPLE.

DEAR children, who amongst you has a bad temper?

What a queer question, some of you think, and you are glad that people are not rude enough to ask you each what kind of a temper yours is; such a question would be so difficult to answer! You would hardly like to confess, "My temper is bad;" and you would not choose to say, "My temper is good," for that would sound so conceited.

But these printed lines cannot perplex you. Don't be afraid; I shall not want an answer. But just ask yourselves the question, "What sort of a temper have I?" and answer it truly and plainly to yourselves. . . . I am afraid if you have answered at all, that you have been obliged to acknowledge that you are sometimes passionate or sulky, cross or obstinate, envious or disagreeable.

I hope many of you are "children of light," that is, that you are trying to follow the blessed Lord Jesus, and are fighting under his banner against evil. The "children of light" desire to root out all weeds of wickedness from their hearts, and to cultivate the beautiful growths of love and joy, peace and gentleness.

I shall speak to those of you who would like to be helped in the way to heaven, and I will speak about a common fault which springs up in almost every human heart.

Its name is bad temper.

Dear children, if you only could know what a trial that weed is to the people who grow it; and to all who live with those who allow it to get the mastery!

Dig it up! dig it up, I pray you!

Ah, what deep roots it has; what a fast hold it has got. It will not be pulled up easily; you must dig deep and far.

A man I once knew considered that he had an excellent temper. His face was smiling, his words were kind, and people thought that his heart-garden at least must have been free from the "ugly weed." He was rich and prosperous, and everybody spoke well of him. His servants obeyed him, his children loved him; he had everything that he wanted, and did everything that he liked. But trials came. His ships went down at sea; poverty threatened him; his workpeople left him for richer masters; his good health failed him.

Where was his excellent temper then? His children learned to creep away from his sight for fear they should hear cross words; his friends pitied him for his misfortunes, but they pitied him more for the spirit of grumbling discontent, and for the fits of fury that overcame him. The "ugly weed" had been growing on unchecked, and now, when it had an opportunity, it overran the whole plot of garden-ground.

Yes, it is easy to keep bad temper hidden when we have happiness and prosperity to cover its ugly form from sight.

I heard of an old Christian negro the other day who tried hard to conquer his bad temper. At last he hit upon a droll plan. It was his wife with whom he quarrelled most: he bade her have a can of water always standing by, and when she felt angry with him for anything he said, she was to fill her mouth with the water to prevent herself from answering; and in his turn, when he was provoked, he would rush to the can and fill his mouth.

"It takes two to dispute," he said; "and there will be no dispute when one of us has a mouth full of water."

But the plan, funny as it was, did not answer. Bad temper is not to be conquered by a draught of spring water—and this the black man found. He tried the right plan at last: he took his heart to Jesus, and asked the Lord to root out the ill weed.

Two boys were disputing one day; they quarrelled so that they came to blows. Their father separated them, and spoke very seriously to them. "I am surprised at you, John," said he to the elder; "you are generally such a good boy."

"I would be good if he did not provoke me," said John, looking angrily at his brother.

Yes, and everyone can be good-tempered when no one provokes; and small credit does such good temper deserve! It is when things go against us, when people irritate and vex us, that it is good to be patient.

There was a lad who, from his very babyhood, had been noted for his fits of passion. His brothers and sisters all tried to avoid offending him, but every now and then a storm of rage would come, and he cared not what he said or did, so angry was he. He heard people talk about following Christ, and he thought that he should like to have the great God for his Father, the Lord Jesus for his friend, and the blessed Spirit to dwell in his heart instead of the evil thoughts and bad desires which always reigned there. He went to Jesus in prayer, and asked Him for grace to give himself to God. For days afterwards he hoped that he really was a child of the Heavenly King, and that he had really received a new, clean heart, washed in the blood of Christ. But soon he fell into one of his passions. "Never mind," Satan whispered to him, "You were born with a bad temper, and God knows that you cannot help it." For a little while he listened to this tempter; but after a bit he saw how false the words were. Certainly he had been born with a bad temper, but was his old nature stronger than God's grace? No, no; that the ill weed in his heart was so old and strong was no reason that he should allow it to flourish still, and destroy the sweet flowers which God loves to see grow and bloom. So he set to work to root it out. How hard he worked! How he struggled with that evil weed! Sometimes he fancied that he had conquered it, and then it would crop up where he least expected it. But he was successful, for he tried the same plan as the old black man tried at last—asking God's help to cast it out.

If any of you are tempted by hearing Satan whisper that you "cannot help" your bad temper, or your disagreeable words and looks, don't believe him! You can help it if you go the right way to help it. It may be your nature; a great many other bad things are your nature, but God's grace is stronger than any nature which ever was in man from Adam's day till now.

Take courage, then, dear children.

You know there is a great talk of temperance societies, and working societies, and bands of hope. Very good things, many of them are, I am sure; but suppose somebody should start a "Society for the Suppression of Bad Temper," who would join it? There would have to be rules, of course, and fines, perhaps; and members would engage not only to try to keep their own tempers, but to abstain from causing other folks to lose theirs.

But until somebody starts such a society, let us try, each one alone earnestly and heartily, what may be done. The child who tries in a right spirit will be the happier and the better for trying; and therefore the world will be happier and better in the long run. I heard an old song years ago, and the chorus was:

> "Let each before his own door sweep,
> And the city will be clean!"

And so, dear children, if we each try to keep our own plot of "heart-garden" free from this ill weed there will be no saying how much good we shall do.

And our motto must be—patience and prayer.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

INTRODUCTIONS.

THROUGH THE LINN.

CHAPTER V.—CLASHINGS.

THE arrival of the two girls at their new home was on a Friday, and the next day passed quietly. Violet proved too ill after her long journey to get up, and Lettice, except during the briefest possible space at meal-times, would not leave her. Miss Temple at first demurred as to the propriety of young girls lying in bed, and discoursed on the evils of self-indulgence, after which she proceeded to an inspection of the invalid. This step might more appropriately have come first, for she thereupon changed her tone, talked in alarm of fever and infection, threatened to send for the doctor, and forbade any attempt to bring Violet out of her room that day. Lettice acquiesced in the latter plan, but advised delay as to the doctor. She did not think aught was wrong save fatigue, and, she might have added, grief.

Sunday morning brought a change. Violet was so far better with her day of quiet, that she could dress and appear in the drawing-room after breakfast, looking not more white and languid than during many weeks past. Miss Temple's fears were allayed, and she gave herself some trouble in hunting out sundry little old Sunday story-books, remnants of her own childish days, wherewith Violet might employ herself. "It is bad to be idle," she remarked, as the child listlessly thanked her, lying back in the corner of a sofa, with the unopened books beside her, and one hand clasped in her sister's. "Time will go twice as fast, my dear, if you resolve to be busy, and you will feel better too. When I was your age I was never allowed to be idle, or to lounge on sofas, and as soon as you are a little stronger, I shall wish you to get over the habit. I dare say you will have read several stories by the time we return from church. Come, Lettice, it is time to dress."

"I am not thinking of going to-day," said Lettice.

"Not going to church?"

"No."

"On account of Violet? But she is not ill. My aunt will be down here presently, and Susan will be at home. What more can she need?"

"Nothing, except that I would rather stay with her."

"Well, I think that sort of idolatry positively wrong," said Miss Temple, who had set her heart on displaying her good-looking niece among church-going acquaintances that morning. "You put Violet's fancies before your own religion; I call it quite wicked. Besides, the idea is absurd—a great girl of ten to be unable to sit and read for a couple of hours! If I were you, Violet, I should insist on Lettice going. It is very bad for her not to get out more, and it is a bad habit for you, my dear, always to think of yourself before others."

Large tears were running down the child's white cheeks, and Lettice bit her lip to keep back the angry words which fought for utterance. "I cannot go," she said; "I cannot leave Violet."

"You will please yourself, of course; it seems to me you have both been trained to do that, at any rate. I should certainly have expected—under the circumstances— a little more submission to my wishes—merely as my due—but of course——"

"I think you have said enough," broke in Lettice.

Miss Temple rustled out of the room in her purple silk, not a little displeased, and Violet whispered eagerly, "Lettice, you must go."

"No, my darling."

"Yes, you must, just to please me. It is good for you, as she said—and she is angry. Oh, do go, Lettice. I'll try to be good. Don't wait. Please go."

Lettice yielded, though with a heavy heart. She gave scant time to preparation, and when Miss Temple came back, resplendent in her Sunday bonnet of straw-coloured silk, on the summit of which nodding poppies vied with bobbing ears of wheat, she found Lettice in bonnet and jacket.

"So you are coming after all," said Miss Temple, mollified.

"Violet wishes it."

"Violet is a good girl; I shall try to think of some treat for her," said Miss Temple.

Violet sighed—a heavy unchildlike sigh—and drew her sister down for a kiss. "Don't be too long," she whispered.

"Not a moment longer than I can help. Is your head aching?"

"Not very much. I needn't talk to the old lady when she comes down, need I?"

"No, you had better lie still, and shut your eyes."

Violet obeyed, and Lettice went after Miss Temple, not patiently, not submissively, but with the self-control of one who had made up her mind to do or bear anything for the sake of securing a comfortable home for Violet. The simple human will, unassisted, has power of resolution and power of action, but there is ever a point where it must fail to stand test, and where that point lies none can tell till the moment of its breaking.

"We have not far to go to church," Miss Temple remarked, with an air of complaisance, as they passed through Brentwood High Street, "only five minutes' walk. There is a chapel of ease also at the poorer end of the place, and Mr. Gray preaches there, but he is not so much liked as Mr. Desborough. Mr. Desborough has not been here long, and he is very popular. He has a mother and two sisters living with him. Miss Olive Desborough always speaks to me when I come out of church, so you will have an opportunity to commence her acquaintance."

Lettice heard this and much more of the same quality, almost without hearing. Her mind was bent entirely on the recollection of the lonely and sorrowful child she had left behind her. Yet Miss Temple did not in the least imagine that she had shown any want of sympathy with the two sad-hearted girls just come into her charge. Looking no deeper than the surface, matters concerning them had to her vision a very simple colouring. They had lost their parents, which was truly melancholy; and they had lost their money, which was extremely unfortunate; and they had lost their home, which might have been a very serious matter indeed, but for her own generosity in providing them with another. The cost to herself she did by no means undervalue. The bitterness of bereavement, loss and separation to them, she quite admitted in the abstract, but in the particular she altogether failed to realise it. Of the passionate anguish which had changed the elder girl's very nature; of the overwhelming distress which had broken down the younger girl to her present feeble fractious condition, she knew nothing. Miss Temple had herself passed through sorrow, had borne loss in her own life-time. She expected others to sorrow precisely as she had sorrowed; to be comforted precisely as she had been comforted. Less expression of grief was unfeeling; greater expression of grief was repining. Miss Temple's standard by which to judge was thus an insufficient one. There were no river-depths in the shallow rivulet of her nature; and the passage of a linn there was not a possibility. And yet—and yet—with the strange complexity of human nature, she could grieve, could be pained, could love, could sympathise. But she and Lettice jarred one another at every touch.

Brentwood Parish Church was, as regarded architecture, a mixture of old and new which did not well harmonise. Down the centre aisle stood a double row of massive Norman pillars, round-arched above, dating back to the era of the Plantagenets. But the two side-aisles, with their square windows, and their heavy wooden galleries, were of modern extraction; and the huge pulpit erection of mahogany belonged to the same period.

Miss Temple's pew was a small square box, high-backed like the rest, well-lined and cushioned. In one corner, nearly lost to congregational sight, sat Vandal Temple. Miss Temple took possession of the other corner on the same side, and signed Lettice to a third, opposite her own and facing the bulk of the congregation. Lettice went to the spot indicated, and a minute later Miss Temple bent forward to whisper, "My cousins, Mrs. Temple and Sylvester, are in the next pew."

Lettice glanced back in response, but did not look round. There was just a shade of rebuke in her glance, which nettled Miss Temple. The remark seemed to her ill-timed, and two minutes later she had forgotten all about it. She noticed in the singing a sweet though worn soprano and a good bass, close at hand, but failed to connect the said voices with the Temple relatives.

The service was well ordered, the singing good, the reading good, the preaching good. There was much in it that day well fitted to comfort a mourner; yet to Lettice Majendie's bruised spirit there came no balm of heavenly peace, distilling softly through Bible words. For though she did not definitely know the fact, she was steeling her heart against God and against man. Nothing in life was left to her, she said, except Violet. She cared for none, and none cared for her. She stood apart, lonely and forsaken, looked upon, as it seemed to her, with cold indifference by God and man alike. For Lettice knew as yet absolutely nothing of the great "ocean-tide of love," which fills to abundant overflowing the heart of our Father in Heaven; nothing of the immeasurable love which flows like a golden river from Jesus to His redeemed ones; nothing of the pure waves of holy love, which like a breeze of heaven from the Holy Spirit sway gently the very being of those in whom He dwells. In the abstract she believed that God had a manner and measure of love for the world,—only she would have been startled had anyone asked her whether that which she called "love" in God bore close resemblance to the passion of affection which she rained upon her little sister. In truth she used the term in word and thought unmeaningly. What human love meant she very well knew, but the heavenly water Divine had not touched her lips.

The service came to an end, and after some little fluttering of gloves and books, Miss Temple rose slowly, cast a glance at Lettice, and proceeded to rustle down the aisle. The mass of the congregation were in advance. In the churchyard they paused, and Vandal came up to say to Lettice, "I hope the little girl is better."

"Thank you—rather. I must make haste home to her."

"Wait a moment, Lettice; I have to speak to my cousins," said Miss Temple, and her brother escaped. "This is Mrs. Temple—and my cousin, Sylvester Temple. My cousin, Lettice Majendie——"

Lettice bowed, but her hand was taken by the lady and pressed kindly. The black dress and semi-widow's cap within the bonnet suited well a face and figure of gentle dignity and grace. In a certain slowness of speech and manner Mrs. Temple resembled her eldest son. "We shall soon, I hope, be better acquainted," Mrs. Temple said. "When my daughter returns I hope you and she will meet often. Her friends seem unwilling to part with her yet, I am sorry to say. How is your little sister, Miss Majendie?"

"Thank you, she is poorly; I must get back to her quickly."

"Then the less we delay you, the better. I hope to see you both soon," and with a look of interest and sympathy, marked yet unobtrusive, Mrs. Temple took her son's arm, and passed on.

"Those are my cousins, Lettice," repeated Miss Temple, looking after them. "Anna Temple is my second cousin. I have few near relatives, so one thinks the more in such a case of more distant cousins. Mrs. Temple is a charming person, is she not? Here come Miss Desborough and her sister. How do you do? How do you do? This is my——"

Miss Temple came to a blank pause. For Lettice was gone.

"So you have your niece with you to-day, poor thing," said Miss Desborough, the taller and plainer of the two sisters; Miss Olive being plumper, prettier, and gayer in the style of her dress. There was something inclining to severity about the general outlines of Miss Desborough's face. "So you have your niece here at last. I saw her in church—a fine-looking girl, really quite handsome, but a melancholy expression—no wonder, poor thing."

"I felt sure your brother had been thinking about her to-day in his choice of a subject," said Miss Temple. "Just the very sermon for poor Lettice."

"Why, yes, it did seem to fit," remarked Miss Olive. "But indeed I don't think he designed it so, for he chose his text last Sunday, and besides none of us knew that your niece had arrived. How is the little girl?"

"A delicate child, quite a charge," said Miss Temple. "A very serious charge I feel it, such a heavy responsibility——"

"Miss Majendie is just at an age when a mother's superintendence is so needed," said Miss Olive. "Seventeen, is she not? Oh, nineteen—I thought she looked older. But girls are very unformed at nineteen. Everything depends on the influences about them. They are happy in having your kind heart to devise how to supply a mother's place."

"It is an interest, but it brings care with it," said Miss Temple, feeling herself in an unwonted position of self-denying Lady-Benefactress. "I am afraid their training hitherto has not been of the wisest."

"Then it will be your work to counteract what has gone wrong," said Miss Desborough. "A matter requiring very delicate management, and an immense amount of tact. One false step can never be retrieved."

"Love and patience will work wonders," suggested Olive.

"And firmness—nothing without firmness—firmness," said Miss Desborough, grasping her umbrella-handle. This remark was much more in accordance with her own leading idiosyncrasies than her last.

"How do you do, Miss Temple?" and the clergyman, a slight man, young-looking still, walked rapidly up. "How do you do? So I hear that your young charges have arrived."

"They have," and Miss Temple sighed. "It is an onerous charge for one in my position."

"Strength and wisdom will be meted out according to your day, if you look for them. Don't forget that," he said in an earnest manner. "You have plunged suddenly into the cares of family life, without the usual preparation that comes before its duties. Much heavenly wisdom will be needed."

Miss Temple was more disposed to think that she stood in need of compassion than of wisdom. "I hope to do my best for them," she said. "But Lettice is at a difficult age, and the younger child very delicate."

"Just so. Well, that is part of your burden. Better to accept the whole, without limit, than to take half with a smile and make melancholy over the other half. I am not accusing you of that tendency, but I find it in myself sometimes. I daresay the addition to your family may be an anxiety —may prove in some respects even a trial. But remember for your comfort and encouragement the words of our Lord, 'I was a stranger, and ye took Me in;' and 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye did it unto Me.'"

Miss Temple was delighted. The words of praise put her into a pleasant glow of satisfaction, and the closing quotation did not, as it might have done, plunge her into a mood of self-searching. For was she indeed doing this deed unto Christ? Was it at all for His name's sake? Had she not rather taken action because the necessity arose, because the fear stirred her that Lettice must otherwise work for her livelihood? "For the Temples' sake," rather than "for Christ's sake" she had been willing to take the orphans in. How often it is so! Yet the contrast of Mr. Desborough's words with the plain reality did not trouble Miss Temple. She had an uncomfortable passing glimpse of the same, but she shut her eyes and turned from it hastily.

The pleasant glow lasted all the way homewards. Miss Temple found herself suddenly in the admired position of one doing a self-denying and conspicuous deed, at which the world looked approvingly. Miss Temple counted herself a Christian woman, but the involuntary question of her heart was not, "What will my Lord and Master think?" but "What will my friends in Brentwood think?" And by the manner of answer which she was able to supply did she shape the manner of her course.

Miss Temple forbore to blame Lettice for leaving her. She found the elder girl, unbonneted, sitting with the younger in her arms, and Violet's look was for the moment of complete though sad content. Lady Bartlett was watching them with interest from her chair, exchanging now and then a brief remark with Lettice, whose clear intonation suited her defective hearing.

"I am glad you saw my cousin," Miss Temple remarked, with an air of gratification. "Of course you have often heard about her. She has one daughter, a most charming girl. Everyone loves Brena. You and she will have to be friends."

"I do not care for people who can be friends with everybody," said Lettice.

"I am sure it is a great deal pleasanter than people who will be friends with nobody," said Miss Temple, with unwonted point. "I like it. I like a person like Brena; one who can always be depended on. And she is always so cheerful. It does one good to see her."

"I suppose she has nothing to make her otherwise," said Lettice gravely.

"She has her troubles, I suppose, like everybody else," said Miss Temple. "If I were she, I should find Mervyn a trouble, I am sure—poor fellow. He is her other brother; not the one you know."

"I do not know any of them."

"You saw Sylvester to-day, with his mother. Sylvester is a most superior young man; truly excellent and blameless. I never yet heard a word to his disparagement. He has his faults, no doubt, but I assure you it would perplex anyone to find them out. Brena says the same, and yet she has keen eyes—quite keen and observant. But she is dotingly fond of Sylvester; I assure you it is quite touching. Then Mervyn is different. He is lame, and though he is quite a genuine Temple in many respects, still, he certainly is excitable and not always sweet-tempered."

"Are Temples, as a rule, particularly sweet-tempered?" asked Lettice.

"I never heard them accused of being otherwise. I should say that an irritable temper is not a 'Temple' characteristic. My cousin, Mrs. Temple, has a wonderfully serene temperament, and Sylvester takes after her, and Brena is always bright. Then nobody could call my brother ill-tempered."

"But Mrs. Temple is not properly a 'Temple' by birth," said Lettice.

"Yes, she married her cousin. He was very like her in character. I never saw a husband and wife more alike. The only marvel is where poor Mervyn can have got his irritability from. However, as I was saying, I hope you will soon know Brena. She has been away from home about a fortnight."

"I don't suppose we shall suit," said Lettice rather wearily, for she had had enough of the subject. "I care for very few people, and one gets tired of perpetual cheerfulness in anybody."

"Tired of cheerfulness? I never heard such an idea. One may get tired of perpetual dulness easily enough,—but cheerfulness——"

Lettice attempted no response, and the dinner-bell rang. While carving cold beef and helping apple-tart, Miss Temple rejoiced in a pleasant consciousness of her own charitable actions. She felt herself to be feeding the hungry—or at least those who ought to have been hungry—and providing shelter for the homeless; and she doubted not that many a kind word had been said, or would be said, by acquaintances in Brentwood, concerning her deed. Dinner over, she wanted in the fulness of her self-satisfaction to take Violet on her knees and read to her, but Violet rejected the offer. Reading made her head ache, she said, and she curled herself again in the sofa corner, with her face down on her sister's dress, to sleep away the afternoon. To Lettice it seemed a matter of indifference what she did, so that only Violet was content. She was ready to read or be silent, talk or be idle, just as Violet's wishes might dictate.

"It is the most absolute slavery to that child that I ever saw," Miss Temple said, later in the evening, when her brother turned in to ask after "the children," as he called them. "Violet has gone to bed, of course, and Lettice has gone to sit with her. There she will stay now, till she goes to bed herself, wasting candles at a fine rate. Cold? Yes, of course. I can't afford fires for them all the winter, just because of that child's fancies. Violet will be ruined if Lettice goes on like this, and I have told Lettice so; but she will not pay the slightest heed. As for coming down to supper, she never dreams of such a thing."

"Have patience with them, Selina," was all that Vandal said. He sat on the edge of a chair near the table, leaning forwards on the top of his stick.

"Patience! Yes, I dare say. It is easy for you, sitting in your comfortable study, without a thing in life to trouble you. I wish my life were as easy. I wonder how you would like to have two great boys put upon you suddenly—expense and management and all."

"Boys would be a more serious matter than girls," said Vandal, with the same sort of shudder that was aroused in him by the presence of a cat.

"I don't believe it. I would rather have a dozen boys to manage than Lettice Majendie. The girl is as stubborn as a mule, for all her quiet looks. She has to learn to do as she is told."

"Patience," repeated Vandal slowly. "I am sure we have need of patience with one another. And she has a hard lesson set her by God's hand just now. Don't add a harder one from your hand."

"Lesson! I don't know what you mean. What lesson?"

"Submission."

"Well, that is a lesson which Lettice has never learnt yet. And she never will—with that cha racter."

"You mean to say that God cannot teach it her? No,—I thought you would not go so far. Only perhaps unusual dealing is required in her case; and has she not had it? Poor girl."

"You need not suppose that I am not sorry for her. I am," said Miss Temple. "But I must be mistress in my own house."

"Yes, yes; only have patience, and win her heart first. All else will follow after," said Vandal.

THE NEW TESTAMENT REVISION.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

II.—TEXTUAL CRITICISM ILLUSTRATED.

WHILE we are still waiting for the Revised New Testament, it may be useful, and not uninteresting, to give some illustrations of the methods by which textual criticism attains its chief results. For a special reason, we select a case in which the probable conclusion will be at variance with the associations and feelings of many readers. It is hard to part with "proof texts," even though our belief may not need them for its security. Yet in this, as in every other science, the only question for the inquirer is, What is true? Happily we find, in Bible studies at least, that the simple truth, though possibly bewildering and disappointing at the first, is sure, in the end, to prove a new treasure to the intellect and heart.

Now there are few Bible words more familiar, or fraught with a meaning of deeper truth, than the phrase found in the third chapter of St. Paul's First Epistle to Timothy, GOD WAS MANIFEST IN THE FLESH. It compendiously describes the greatest of Christian verities—the INCARNATION, on which the doctrine and the power of the Gospel depend. To lose the phrase from the Bible would be to many almost like the vanishing of an article from their creed. Yet it would not be really so. The creed is independent of the phrase; and if we must make up our mind to the loss, it may be with the assured conviction that the doctrine remains intact. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself."

But here it may be well to stop to clear away a difficulty, sometimes avowed and oftener felt by those unfamiliar with critical investigations. "If one text," it is said, "that teaches important truth, has to be surrendered, why not another? How is the 'plain reader' to tell which passages are to stand, and which will have to be removed or changed?" The answer to this is clear. The number of texts on which there is any serious doubt is, in fact, very small, and from the nature of the case that number cannot be increased. The "Variorum Bible," to which reference was made in our former article,* affords decisive testimony here. The examination of its pages will show the English reader two things: first, that the range of possible alteration is clearly defined and comparatively small; and, secondly, that no change which competent critics of any school have proposed will invalidate a single doctrine of Christianity. The fear expressed is, therefore, absolutely chimerical, and in this, as in all other matters, we may be fearless in the search for the Truth.

Returning, then, to the words in question, it will be remembered by the older students of Scripture among us, that many years since, when it first became generally recognised that Bible critics were for reading the phrase "manifested in the flesh" without the Divine name, there was an eager, and even indignant protest from orthodox theologians. The Roman Catholics, it is true, had always so taken the text, as we shall see; but for Protestants the question was thought to have been settled for ever by Bishop Pearson's disquisition.† At the beginning of the present century, however, the great critic, Dr. J. J. Griesbach, of Jena, had adopted the reading "Who was manifested in the flesh," instead of "God,"—a change set down by many to Socinian proclivities. Great efforts were made to defend the ordinary reading on the lines laid down by Pearson; especially by the late Dr. Henderson, Principal of Highbury Independent College, in his learned tractate, "The Great Mystery of Godliness incontrovertible," London, 1830. Dr. Bloomfield, the editor of a Greek Testament which in its day had considerable currency, summed up the question as one of Unitarian as opposed to orthodox criticism; and the theological writers of the time very generally followed suit.

But of late there has been a marked difference. Since the critical labours of Dr. Lachmann, of Von Tischendorf, and of Dr. Tregelles, who have all, for reasons which will be briefly indicated farther on, seen reason to endorse the conclusion of Griesbach, the general opinion of those competent to judge has decidedly concurred. The result appears in almost every revised version which of late years has been prepared for the English people. For example:—

Bishop Ellicott reads the passage; "And confessedly, great is the mystery of godliness; 'Who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached among the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.'"

The late Dean Alford translates, "And confessedly great is the mystery of godliness, who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up in glory."

The late Professor Fairbairn reads: "And confessedly great is the mystery of godliness, who was manifested in the flesh, was justified in the Spirit, was seen by angels, was preached among the Gentiles, was believed on in the world, was received up into glory."

Dr. S. Davidson renders: "And confessedly great is the mystery of godliness; in Him who was manifested in flesh, justified in spirit, seen by angels, preached among Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up in glory."

And finally, in the New Testament edited by the late Mr. Joseph Gurney, we read, "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: even He who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen by angels, preached on in the world, received up in glory."

A close examination of the foregoing versions will show some interesting points of difference in translation; but they are all renderings of the same original, and illustrate the singular unanimity with which the change has of late been accepted. There can be no reasonable doubt that the New Revision will follow in the same direction, and that this great text will thus become definitely altered for the English-speaking people.

But on what grounds? And how have critics been led to this conclusion?

The answer to these questions, in the particular case before us, will show how such inquiries are in every instance conducted, and will indicate something of the labour, patience, and skill required by the investigation.

Generally speaking, the correct reading of a New Testament passage is to be ascertained, 1. from the testimony of ancient MSS.; 2. from the early Versions; 3. from the quotations and references of "the Fathers;" and 4. from the sense of the passage itself. How this fourfold test is applied will appear from the treatment of the phrase in question.

I. The difference between the two readings in the earliest MSS. is simply that between ΘC and OC. The former is the usual contracted way of writing the Greek word Theos—God, the latter is the relative pronoun Hos—Who. Two little horizontal marks constitute the whole distinction. It has, therefore, first of all been the task of investigators to ascertain whether these marks were present or absent in the most ancient MSS. attainable.

A valuable account of the chief New Testament MSS. was given not long since in this magazine.* It will suffice, therefore, to say here that from the first six centuries of the Christian era just five MSS. of St. Paul's Epistles have come down to us, written in "uncial," i.e. capital letters. Of these five the VATICAN MS., the most ancient of all, is unfortunately deficient at this particular place,† and must therefore be thrown out of the account. Of the rest, the ALEXANDRIAN MS., now in the British Museum—a copy dating from the fifth century—has naturally been most closely examined by our scholars; and a photographed facsimile recently published by the Museum authorities gives to all an opportunity of forming an opinion for themselves. The place is worn and slightly defaced by much and close examination; the two horizontal marks are there, patent to every eye; but the colour of the ink shows them to have been added by a much later hand. It was the way with devout and enthusiastic custodians of these priceless MSS. in ancient times. If a passage seemed not to speak with sufficient clearness, they would retouch it—not in the margin only, which might have been excusable. The text itself they would ruthlessly alter, now and then indeed correcting an obvious error, but oftener obscuring most valuable facts. The question was this: Did the zealous corrector in his two marks only restore lines that had grown faint, or did he add fresh ones? If the former, it might be expected that the old marks would be discoverable in some faint way, as the difference between the ancient and the modern ink was happily very decided. To this point, therefore, close investigation has been directed, powerful lenses being employed. A trace of the ancient ink has been suspected by some observers; in fact, the older critics, as Dr. John Mill (1707), were quite sure about it. But on further investigation this has proved, according to Bishop Ellicott, to be only the cross-mark of a letter (ϵ) on the other side of the MS. showing through the vellum.‡ A very interesting account of the whole examination has been given by the Bishop in his Commentary, and as the result he explicitly states that the original reading is "indisputably" Who.

When the SINAITIC MS., of an even older date than the Alexandrian, was brought to light by Dr. Tischendorf in 1859, the text in question was naturally among the first to be examined, and the reading was found to be OC, some later scribe—"of about the twelfth century," as Tischendorf concludes from the character of the insertion—having prefixed the letters ΘЄ to make up the word ΘЄOC, God.* This was a different style of mending the text from that practised on the Alexandrian MS., but the intention was the same, and the evidence for the original Who yet more irresistible.

† The gap extends from Heb. ix. 14 to the end. In ancient copies the Pastoral Epistles were placed after that to the Hebrews.

‡ This was also the opinion of the great critic and commentator, Dr. J. J. Wetstein (1752), but was questioned by Dr. Woide (1786), who published a facsimile of the MS. It is also doubted by Mr. Thompson, keeper of the MSS. in the British Museum. See "Sunday at Home," 1879, p. 612, and Dr. Scrivener's "Introduction to the Criticism of N. T."

The next great MS. consulted (also of the fifth century) was that now in the Paris National Library, over which the works of the Syrian Ephrem had been transcribed; and the later Syriac writing renders it difficult sometimes to discern the smaller marks and lines of the faded original. It seemed certain, however, to Tischendorf, who carefully examined the MS., that the reading here also was OC. A facsimile of the passage is given in Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, quite bearing out Tischendorf's statement, except that there are marks under the word, showing it to have been read as a dissyllable by the scribe who made them. These, however, are evidently insertions of a later hand.

The remaining MS. which has descended to us from the same era, is the famous Clermont MS. (Codex Claromontanus) of the sixth century, also in the Paris National Library. Here we meet with a variation which, for a reason presently to be stated, rather confirms the older reading. Instead of OC we find O: that is to say, the neuter instead of the masculine, Which for Who. Again, however, this has been corrected by a later hand into $\overline{\text{OC}}$.

Thus then stands the evidence of the four manuscripts, and thus far, of six centuries.† Every MS., at first hand, contains what we may now venture to call the "revised" as distinguished from the "ordinary" reading of the passage. This ordinary reading appears in no MS. before the ninth century, and then only in two.‡ Were we dependent on these authorities alone, the case would be complete.

But the work of the careful critic is by no means done when these uncial MSS. have been examined. About 250 separate copies in the written or "cursive" Greek character remain to be considered. These date from the tenth century onwards, and as a whole are undoubtedly far inferior in authority to the uncials. And yet, as it is quite possible that some at least of the cursive MSS. may have been transcribed from older authorities than any we now possess, a certain weight is to be attached to them, especially in turning the scale where the testimonies of the older authorities may be in conflict. In the present instance, what is the fact? So far as the cursives have been examined, they are nearly unanimous in favour of the "ordinary" reading, God. This no doubt is significant; it proves at least that the phrase so familiar to us was early known and widely accepted. Still, taken in connection with the fact that this reading was introduced, as we have seen, by eager scribes into the old MSS. long after they were first written, the supposition seems on the whole confirmed, that the older form represents the true original. For even if the external authority for the two readings were equally balanced, the important question would arise, which of the two was the more likely to be the correction of the other? Either, let us say, the Apostle wrote, "God was manifested in flesh;" or "Who was manifested in flesh." Now it is supposable that the latter should have been changed by scribes and copyists, to the former; for two reasons, the first theological, the text so altered being an explicit assertion of our Lord's Divinity; the second grammatical, the relative pronoun who not agreeing very well, as it might seem, with the neuter antecedent, mystery. But if the former had been what St. Paul wrote, what motive could there have been to make any alteration? Here, then, applies that critical canon which has been charged with paradox: "To an easy reading prefer the harder."

II. The remaining sources of evidence may be more briefly disposed of. Ancient versions are of course a very important factor in the determination of the text, inasmuch as the oldest of them were made before the date of any extant MSS. Of these we need only mention two. First, the Syriac Peshito or "simple" Version, made in its present form certainly not later than the fifth century, and in the main representing a much earlier translation. This version reads Who or Which, the gender not being distinguishable in the Syriac language. Secondly, we turn to the early Latin translation, revised by Jerome A.D. 383–385, and in this form known as the "Vulgate," being regarded throughout the Roman church as having all the authority of Scripture. Here we have the relative pronoun quod, "Great is the mystery of godliness which was manifested in the flesh." In this, as will be seen, the version coincides with one MS. mentioned above, the Claromontane.

Does not then this third form of the text create a new difficulty? Hardly so. Supposing the original reading to have been Who in apposition with Mystery, the necessity of a change to the neuter would occur to any unimaginative grammarian, and would be readily accepted by critics who had not been trained to accept a reading on the ground of evidence alone, apart from their own notions of construction or congruity. They found The mystery who, and instead of asking, What did this personification mean? they fell back upon the rule that a "relative must agree with its antecedent in gender," and turned the text into The mystery which. So the reading became the common one of the whole Latin Church.*

III. Finally, the critic having estimated the evidence of MSS. and versions, has to ask how the passage was read by the ancients. Quotations of the passage, allusions to it, what testimony do these afford? Now here it must suffice to say that of course the weight of Latin patristic testimony is for the reading which. This the Vulgate had already decided for them. But what of the early Greek ecclesiastical writers? Many of them refer to the passage, but in such a way as to create the impression on

* "So carefully," says Tischendorf, "as to leave the original writing untouched."

† There are two other uncials of importance which read OC, Who: the "Codex Augiensis" (F) of the ninth century, now at Trinity College, Cambridge, and the "Codex Boernerianus" (G) in the Royal Library at Dresden, belonging to the same era, and probably a copy of the former.

‡ These are, a MS. in the 'Angelica' Library of the Augustinian monks at Rome, and one at Moscow; marked J. and K. in the lists. The four above quoted are marked A, ℵ, C, D.

* It might here be added that the reading who or which is found in every Version down to the seventh century, the Coptic, Sahidic, Æthiopic, Armenian, and Gothic: as well, of course, as in those taken from the Vulgate. See the list in Mitchell's "Critical Handbook," Table x.

critical readers that they had not before them the ordinary reading. The manifestation is that of "the mystery," or "of Christ." Thus Cyril of Alexandria (in the fifth century) has the phrase, "Not knowing the great mystery of godliness, that is, Christ, who was manifested, etc." Here and there, indeed, we find an approximation to the "ordinary" text, more than balanced by expressions and sentences which seem to show that their authors had before them the other reading. For even where their language seems to coincide with the former, it is rather because they assert the doctrine than because they quote the phrase. Dean Alford in his "Greek Testament" gives an extremely interesting series of these quotations on both sides. It is remarkable that Macedonius, Patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 506, was said by some mediæval writers (though on slight authority) to have been deposed for changing ΟC into ΘC to suit his doctrinal views. But a more significant point is that a passage so strong, as we have it, in its assertion of Christ's Divinity, is never pressed into service in early controversy. Athanasius, for instance, in his long contest with Arianism never so employs it, an inexplicable fact had the assertion, "God was manifested in the flesh," lain ready to his hand in the writings of St. Paul. It was not the custom of early controversialists, any more than of later ones, to decline what might have been one of their keenest weapons.

The critic, then, has the mass of evidence to sift, from MSS., from Versions, and from early references, of which we have but given the outline. The result is what we see. Dean Alford writes, "There is hardly a passage in the New Testament in which I feel more deep personal thankfulness than for the restoration of the true and wonderful connection of the original text."

IV. These last-quoted words of the dean remind us that there is still another question to be taken into account in settling a disputed passage. Yet the appeal to internal evidence must be very cautiously made, simply because our own notions of fitness are not to be permitted to outweigh ascertained facts. The place for internal considerations is where the external evidence is nicely balanced, which can hardly be affirmed in the present instance. Probably there are few of us who would not, at the first impulse, rather keep our old words, God was manifest in the flesh, than replace the Divine name by a relative pronoun! Yet even here, we are persuaded, a deeper view will show that the revised reading is its own justification. According to the ordinary text, the word GOD is the subject of the whole series of sentences—not only "God was manifested in the flesh," but "God was seen of angels," "God was preached," "God was received up in glory." It is more in accord with Scripture language to predicate these things of the CHRIST, the "incarnate mystery." There is a remarkable various reading in the Epistle to the Colossians (ii. 2) which, if we accept it, gives the key to the passage under discussion. "To the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, which is Christ," or "even Christ"*; i.e., He is the Mystery. So in the simplest form of translation, the text in Timothy will stand, in glorious defiance of formal grammar:

"Great is the mystery of godliness, who was manifested in flesh," etc.

Or, perhaps, with greater regard to the accepted canons of language, still preserving the apposition: "Great is the mystery of godliness, even He who was manifested," etc.—This on the whole is the translation which we prefer.

Or, taking the word mystery in its more usual sense as expressing the doctrine, we may render: "Great is the mystery of godliness; He who was manifested in the flesh was justified in the Spirit," etc.

These, however, are matters of translation, not of textual criticism; and whatever form of phrase may be adopted, it will, we think, be felt that what we must henceforth term the established reading of this great text only brings out more clearly the majesty of the Christian faith, and of Him who is the centre of all.

* The ordinary text reads, "To the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ."

SOME REMINISCENCES OF THOMAS CARLYLE.

SOME interesting reminiscences of Thomas Carlyle have appeared in the "Weekly Review" from the Rev. Gavin Carlyle, a nephew of Edward Irving, and distant kinsman of the great man lately passed away. A few prefatory words may be given. By general consent Thomas Carlyle has of late years occupied the highest place among his literary contemporaries; and, now that he is gone, a great blank is created, as when a giant tree of the forest falls. But he lived to be a patriarch in letters, and to enjoy the abundant fruits of his world-wide fame. He survived all the great writers who started with him in the literary race, and was permitted, in a manner, to anticipate the verdict posterity will pronounce upon his works. We do not enter here into any discussion of the unique character and surpassing merits of these works, the publication of which created an era in English literature. They are sufficiently well known by name and actual appreciation to most of our readers. They have taken a permanent place in all our libraries, and their influence is deeply felt in English and American literature at this day. The author of "Sartor Resartus," "The French Revolution," "Heroes and Hero Worship," and "Cromwell's Letters and Speeches," must ever hold a pre-eminent place in the literature of this century. These and other productions of his genius, although containing much that is eccentric and something to be condemned, are instinct with a power and wisdom that raise them above all works of the class to which they belong. They breathe a spirit which the mind of the age has deeply felt as a source of what is noble and good.

What strikes us much in viewing the man, Thomas Carlyle, is not merely his powerful genius, but the singularly simple and noble life he led. He married early, though he had no profession but literature, with all its precariousness. His wife was the only daughter of Dr. Welsh, a physician at Haddington, a descendant of the famous John Welsh, the son-in-law of John Knox, the Scottish Reformer. After being a short time in Edinburgh, he retired to Craigenputtock, a wild moorland farm in Dumfriesshire which had become the property of his wife; and there, in the simplest style, he spent seven years with the sympathetic partner of his lot, engaged in those literary toils which in due time gave him a world-wide renown. Induced at length to quit his mountain solitude for the sake of more ready communication with editors and publishers, he took up his abode in London, the great centre of literature as well as of government and commerce. In 1834 he took possession of his modest hired house at Chelsea, where for more than forty-six years he was to live and labour, and where, in a good old age, he was tranquilly to die. During the greater part of his London life his house was the resort of nearly all the young authors who have risen to eminence. He shone as a conversationalist, and exerted on many minds as much influence by his weird and powerful talk as by his writings.

The Carlyles of Dumfriesshire were a small but noted family, the head of the clan being, in former days, Lord Carlyle of Torthorwald. The history of this and other branches of the family is given in a volume written by a Nicholas Carlisle (brother of Sir Anthony Carlisle), who was a librarian to King George the Third. Other noted members of the Dumfriesshire branch were—Dr. Carlyle of Inveresk —"Jupiter" Carlyle—a man of much ability, but more of a heathen than a Christian, whom Thomas Carlyle once spoke of as that "pot-walloping Sadducee;" and Thomas Carlyle, an apostle of the Catholic Apostolic or Irvingite Church, a man of considerable erudition and great devotion, who wrote much on German theological literature.

"Introduction to Thomas Carlyle," says Mr. Gavin Carlyle, "especially with my relationship to his dearest friend, was no difficulty. I was also long well acquainted with his brother, Dr. John Carlyle, the translator of Dante, a man of high accomplishments. In early life he had intended to go into partnership in London, as a medical man, with an uncle of mine —a brother of Edward Irving—who was, however, cut off by rapid consumption. Dr. Carlyle then went to Rome, where he spent many years and saved a competency, on which he lived in his latter days. Mrs. T. Carlyle, a woman of great brightness and intelligence, who had always the greatest love for her early tutor and friend, Edward Irving, received me with the utmost kindness; and invited me, when I came to London, to come to their house any evening I liked. Often, during her life, I called, and thus I had the opportunity of seeing Carlyle on different occasions, and accompanied him more than once in his long walks at night, which he took at that time for the benefit of his health.

"I shall not attempt anything like a picture of the general impression of the man; I would merely mention some facts of general interest that came out in different conversations. His acquaintance with Edward Irving—of whom, of course, he spoke much to me—is not properly represented in almost any of the journals. He was three years Irving's junior, and Irving went to college early; so that, though educated at the same Annan Academy, they were not fellow-pupils there. Carlyle was probably entering about the time that Irving was leaving. He had seen him in Ecclefechan in early days, when Irving was in his boyhood, and disliking the Moderatism of his native town, used often to walk six miles to hear the Gospel preached in the Secession Church. He had seen him also once or twice on his return from college. But they were not friends, scarcely acquaintances, in those days. There was not any intercourse when Carlyle first went up as a lad of fourteen to study at Edinburgh. Carlyle told me himself that the friendship was first formed at Kirkcaldy, and what knit him in the closest friendship was Irving's noble conduct. Irving had been one of Professor Leslie's best students, and was recommended by him to the Mastership of the High School of Kirkcaldy. Irving's stern discipline created an opposition, and a rival school was established. Leslie was applied to again for a master, and this time named Carlyle, then one of his most successful students. They were thus at the head of two rival schools in the small town, but Irving, he said, instead of receiving him coldly, as a rival brought on purpose to injure him, welcomed him with the greatest cordiality, and from that day they might be seen, daily, walking together, and discussing themes of literature, philosophy, theology, and everything under the sun.

"When Irving became Dr. Chalmers's assistant in Glasgow, he soon sought out the Paisley family of Carlyles, hailing in origin from the Borders, and was greatly attracted towards my grand-uncle, who was a man of much power, long the leader of the Whigs in the West of Scotland, and Provost again and again of his native town. He was also, from his youth, a man of clear evangelical sentiments, a devoted friend of Dr. John Wotherspoon, the sworn foe of the Moderates, who afterwards became President of Princeton College, United States. He was an elder at twenty-one, a fervid Evangelical in the darkest days of Moderatism, the first Sunday-school teacher in Paisley, and perhaps in Scotland, for which, by-the-by, he was rebuked by his Presbytery. He and my grandfather, his brother, were centres of the Evangelical life of the whole district. Rowland Hill and many other worthies from England in earlier days made their houses their headquarters. Edward Irving was a frequent visitor. He soon made his friend Carlyle acquainted with the new connections he had discovered, and brought him out with him, and Carlyle in our talk referred often to these old visits to Paisley. A daughter of the old Provost, who still lives, at the age of nearly ninety, remembers them well. Irving saw clearly and understood his friend's great genius long before he became known to the world. His mother once wrote to him of Carlyle as uncouth. He wrote back that if Carlyle lived he would be one of the greatest men in England. Irving was most anxious about his scepticism, and brought him out on several occasions that they might converse together with my grand-uncle, then on the borders of eighty, who he hoped might influence him They used to come to breakfast, and so earnest became the conversation that they sat for hours together, and once, I think, the daughter found the table still covered and the breakfast things unmoved, for they would not be disturbed, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

"Carlyle spoke to me more than once of his early days at college, and especially of the Theological Hall. He described to me one of the professors as having a face red like the setting sun on a misty day —such a man speaking of the ethereal and the heavenly! He attended the classes for a year or two, but found the prelections dry as dust. He was disgusted, and turned his back on theology and the ministry. At the same time the character of the ministers, as he described them in the South of Scotland, was at that time, with some noble exceptions, as Duncan of Ruthwell, low and degraded. Many of them took no interest in religion. Many were almost sots. There was nothing to attract him towards such associations. The Evangelical enthusiasm engendered by Chalmers and others in after days had scarcely yet arisen. This state of things he utterly abhorred. His spirit was roused to indignation at the thought of it, as when he spoke of Carlyle of Inveresk in the manner I have described.

"In the winter of 1863–4, when the American war was raging, Dr. Hoge, of Richmond, visited this country. I took him to see Carlyle, with whom he was anxious to have an interview. He described the scenes of the war through which he had just passed, and told with great simplicity and graphic power the influence of passages of Scripture quoted to the dying, as they were passing away from the earthly scenes. Carlyle listened with intense interest. He became the hearer and not the speaker, as he generally was. His eyes even filled with tears, and at the conclusion he said that the sending of Bibles to these soldiers was the noblest work that he had heard of the Bible Society ever doing.

"I would record just one other reminiscence. I was walking with him one night down Sloane Street from his brother's lodgings to his own house, when he began to speak of Holman Hunt's picture of 'Christ before the Doctors.' He had just seen it and been much pleased with it, especially with the wonderful life-like feelings described in the faces of the doctors of the law, when he suddenly turned and said—I cannot recall the exact words, but the purport of them was—'I dislike all pictures of Christ.' He spoke of that holy name with great reverence: 'You will find that men never thought of painting Christ till they had begun to lose the impression of Him in their hearts.' He appealed to Christian history as attesting this. The impression he conveyed was, that the person of Christ was too great and wonderful ever to be brought within the compass of art or imagination. The truth is, I believe, that Carlyle never spoke of Christ's name without showing that he felt Him to be immeasurably above mere human comprehension.

"These are merely a few stray reminiscences. I have made no attempt to form any estimate of this strange, weird-like man, who has exercised a power greater perhaps than that of any recent writer. His writings, especially 'Sartor Resartus,' and 'Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches,' the greatest, I think, of all his works, have had, and have still, a strange power over myself, as over multitudes. He seems to get through the outer coating to the very kernel of things. His hatred of shams and pretences is refreshing and ennobling. No one can estimate the influences that swayed such a mind in early life —the attractiveness of the galaxy of genius, concentrating in Goethe, Schiller, and many other German writers, poetical and philosophical, early in the century; the repulsiveness of a rationalistic religion in Scotland; but, in the midst of all the present adulation, I do feel that it is a matter of the deepest regret that he was not clearer in his views of the Christian faith. His doubts cost him, there is no question, great bitterness and sadness. Few faces express more sorrow and unsatisfiedness. He defended the eternal moral verities with a power which has swayed the sentiment of the English-reading public of all countries. In this he derived his ideas of righteousness in great part from the Bible, and the expositions of it by the great thinkers of former days, as expressed in the Shorter Catechism, and other documents in which he was trained from childhood, and in living epistles in the Puritan days. But the want of a clear Christian faith led him to one-sidedness in the worship too much of force and determination. Thus, while he maintained the eternal laws of justice as governing all, he at times condoned offences against these laws on the part of those who by their power commanded his reverence. His influence in different and somewhat opposite directions it is difficult to estimate. He has, if he has elevated moral feeling and increased the love of truth, given also an impulse to vagueness and scepticism. Many persons who have no understanding of the man in his true depth and grandeur have been too willing to make use of his name and influence to encourage them in this. How very different his work if he had accepted not only the moral verities, but the full Christian verities, and had with clearness held those great principles of our faith which lie at the foundation of all moral grandeur, and without which truth and righteousness have no durable basis."

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN-PLAYING.

MR. LATROBE (Christian Ignatius Latrobe, author of the "Moravian Psalmody"), who was an excellent organ-player, and a very superior musician, relates the following incident which happened while he was studying music in Germany:—

"Frequent complaints were made by the venerable and worthy fathers of our church (the Moravians), who felt themselves disturbed by the thoughtless and tasteless manner of playing the organ. But they were not heeded, and were rather considered as a proof that the complaints wanted skill to appreciate the virtue of the artful and ornamental musical drapery with which we clothed the tunes, otherwise, in our opinion, too dull and monotonous. No one felt more keenly and justly the absurdity and real mischief of our manner than the late excellent Bishop Spangenberg. After much gentle and fruitless remonstrance, he at length hit upon an expedient which answered his purpose, and for which I feel grateful at this moment.

"Taking an opportunity before the sacrament, the Bishop sent for me and addressed me thus:

"'I have for this long time past felt my mind burdened with concern and pain, when I considered how the most beautiful part of our worship is rendered unpleasant to me and others, by the manner of my brethren in playing the organ. They seem to me not to have duly considered the importance of that species of the service, especially in a living Church of God. I will not charge you, brother, with levity or indifference, for I consider the fault to originate more in thoughtlessness than in total disregard to the subject of the hymn or the feelings of the congregation; but it has become such a burden to me, that I cannot help feeling rather indignant, especially as some conversation I have already had with one of your number (there being eight of us who occasionally performed the duty) has produced no impression whatever. I have this day been desired to officiate at the Holy Communion, but had almost declined it, for fear that the common way of playing the organ might again so disturb my mind, that I should become unfit for so solemn a service, and interrupt me in my enjoyment by a distracted attention. All at once the thought struck me, "I will send for my dear friend Latrobe, and speak with him about it. Perhaps he will not despise the remark of an old man, who indeed understands nothing at all of music, and cannot point out the nature of the grievance, but yet thinks that he has a just sense of what is proper and consistent to edification, or to create great disturbance in the congregation. Perhaps he may feel disposed, if not from a conviction of his mind, yet out of regard to an old friend of grandfather, father, and himself, to humour him for once, and play in such a manner as will please him." Now do you think you can bring yourself to omit for my sake, what you may consider very fine, and condescend to play a simple tune, unadorned with so many additional notes and flourishes; and though you should even not like it yourself, submit for friendship's sake to humour my weakness?'

"I heard this affectionate address with an impression which convinced me of the justice of the Bishop's remarks. I promised to observe his directions. As he was leaving the room, he added, 'Well, my dear friend, if after you have acceded to my wishes this once, you yourself disapprove of it, and think I have erred in thus endeavouring to make a revolution in the manner of playing the organ, I will say no more; but shall be thankful for your complying with my wishes on this occasion.'

"I was happy to hear after the communion, that my highly revered adviser fully approved of the simple and artless manner adopted in accompanying the beautiful hymns chosen for that solemnity.

"Little did the venerable Bishop suppose that he was reading me a lecture upon church music, which would produce more real and substantial benefit to his audience than most of the learned and elaborate dissertations on counterpoint have ever done. He did indeed bring about a reformation, the good effects of which were enjoyed for many years. As for me, I was so fully convinced by the experiment itself of the superior effect of true simplicity in accompanying tunes, and suffering the beautiful combinations and transitions with which many of them abound to present themselves in their native grandeur, divested of the harlequin dress by which many organists are apt to cover and disgrace them, that from that very day I changed my whole style of playing. But the most essential benefit I derived from this circumstance was, that it caused me to consider the services of an organist in the Church of God in a very different light; and taught me to pray that, as far as I engaged in it, I might serve Him acceptably, and not disturb, but rather further, the devotions of the congregation."

Thus a gentle hint from one possessed of little knowledge of the art of music, became a lesson of the highest importance to one well versed in the science. It is, however, much to be lamented that organists and church singers should enter upon such offices without at all considering the responsibility they incur in the sight of a holy God, and that the main requisites in such cases should be only their fitness in point of musical capabilities.

In the preface to his Hymns, sung in the churches of the United Brethren, Mr. Latrobe remarks:—"The excellence of congregational singing is this, that though all join, yet none seek to outvie the rest. By bringing each voice to the level of the whole, a sweet and yet powerful confluence of harmony is created. But whoever leads the song should sing so distinctly, that the words of the hymn may be heard, which cannot be expected from the whole congregation, nor could well be effected without prejudice to good singing. And where the organ is used, it should be so performed as not to drown the voices, but simply to assist them to sustain the pitch, so as to prevent them from sinking, as they would do without such aid."

A Haven.

THERE'S a haven, safely locked
By two arms outstretching wide,
Where for many an age have flocked
Storm-tossed ships from every side.

Depth enough it has to float
Every vessel, great or small,
Stateliest build, or simplest boat,
And there's room enough for all.

Ever on its swelling breast,
Pours the sunshine from above,
For this haven, safe and blest,
It is God's unfathomed love.

And the arms, its sure defence,
By the rudest shocks unstirred,
Are our God's Omnipotence
And His never-failing word.

Anchor here, O storm-tossed soul,
Here thy fears and doubts shall cease;
Though without the billows roll,
Here is safety, rest, and peace.

THE PRODIGAL SON. LUKE XV. 11–32.

GOLDEN TEXT, VER. 18.—'I will arise and go to my Father.'

CONNECTION.—This third parable (peculiar to St. Luke) completes and crowns the series. The lost sheep wandered in silly ignorance; the lost drachma may represent the sinner unconscious of his fate; the lost son departed in deliberate and guilty self-will. In the former two, again, Christ and His people are represented as seeking the lost; here the lost is pictured as returning to God. Thus do the three present different aspects of the same truth, and all culminate in the joy over souls restored.

A narrative like this, so true to human life, and to the Divine mercy, must needs have many applications. The brothers may represent the privilege of the literal Israel in contrast with the lost state of the publicans and sinners who had left the fold; or the Jewish in contrast with the Gentile world: or the individual wanderer, and the outwardly obedient son. In every aspect, the same great lessons apply. This 'pearl of parables' is God's message at once to a world of sinners, and to every penitent soul conscious of guilt and misery.

It is a 'gospel within a gospel'; and millions, saying, I am that prodigal, have entered into peace.

I. THE HOME FORSAKEN.—Read vers. 11–13. Look first at the outward detail. In what proportion would the inheritance be shared? Note the unseemly haste of the younger—he will have his portion now—picture of human self-will. 'My life is my own, to do with as I list.' Over against the prodigal's demand, Give me my portion of goods, is the children's cry, Give us day by day our daily bread (Trench). He divided unto them his living, permitting him to make the trial. God will not constrain our service. Not many days after, suggesting the rapidity of the fall. 'The first sign of going wrong is a yearning for spurious liberty.' The far country here imaged is some Gentile land, whose luxurious capital afforded opportunity for dissipation—Alexandria, Corinth, or Rome. The answering reality is in life spent away from the soul's true home, which is found in the service and love of God, Eph. ii. 17. He wastes his substance, his possessions—youthful vigour, intellectual power, wealth of affection, expending all on what is unworthy—in riotous or prodigal living. (From this phrase the usual name of the parable is derived).

II. SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS AROUSED.—Read vers. 14–17. When he had spent all. However large the store, it comes to an end: it is lavished for no return, 'nothing to show for it,' youthful vigour changed to weakness, the mind wearied and sad; all love, hope and joy, cherished without God, turned to bitter disappointment! 'The man's capital,' says George Macdonald, 'has been wasted to obtain a supply of pocket-money.' And with the sense of failure within, the world without becomes a blank. 'There is always a mighty famine in that land!' (Jeremiah ii. 13). Yet is the wanderer's nature unsubdued. Still will he get something out of the world if he can. The fear is that he will in his disappointment sink lower and lower, into hopeless degradation. From some citizen of that country, he will secure a living if possible. But all that can be done for the unhappy youth is to set him to feed swine—bitter humiliation to a Jew! The end of his freedom. 'To be free from righteousness is to become a slave to sin.' So low is he that he covets their very husks! Emblem of coarsest pleasures, empty and unsatisfying. No man gave unto him: the unkindest cut of all. Where were his boon companions, with their flatteries and good fellowship? All, all gone—not a drachma or a crust from one of them! The crisis is reached, either to sink utterly and be as the swine, or to remember that he is still a son!

III. The Return.—Read vers. 18, 19. He came to himself: he had not been his true self before, either in his riot or his misery. Sin is madness, whether wildly exultant, or lightly careless, or stubbornly hard, or wretchedly despairing. No one is ever less himself than when he seeks to live to himself. Now he sees his own condition in its reality—what he was, what he is, with a glimpse of what he may be. How many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare! God's world is full of creatures in their place, and satisfied: 'Yes, the dream of a father's house, of a home somewhere, is once again stirring in him. "Those cattle on the hills, how peacefully they graze; those trees, how they put forth their leaves in spring; those streams, how they break their ice-chains and flow freely as if they would flow for ever! Are not all these my Father's? Does not He sustain their life? And I perish with hunger."' The consciousness of a higher nature rises within him in sudden power—I am a son still, though no more worthy. I will arise, etc. Mark the tone which all true confession takes: Against heaven and against thee—acknowledging the breach of both heavenly and earthly obligations. Let me be as one of Thy servants: only let me have a place once more in the home! And he arose and came to his father. All true repentance is described in this phrase. It is, return to God. Observe, the prodigal's repentance was not in his sorrow, not even in his good resolutions, not in feeling or saying at all, but in his return. 'Godly sorrow' works, not is 'repentance.' (2 Cor. vii. 10.)

IV. The Welcome.—Read vers. 20–24. Now was it made clear whose influence it was that urged the wanderer to his homeward way. So far as the narrative goes, we might set down his return to the movements of his own mind. But the application goes deeper. God was seeking His rebellious son. 'God sends the famine into the soul, the hunger and thirst, and the disappointment to bring back His erring child again.' And those thoughts of penitence, that impulse to return, were from heaven. The father was looking for his son, and is first in the reconciliation. Not only is the son met when yet a great way off, but he is in his father's arms before he can utter a word. And when he does begin his prayer he is not permitted to finish it as he had in his humility intended. Father, I have sinned. 'Like a true penitent, he grieves not for what he has lost, but for what he has done.' The joyful father interrupts him after the first sentence. Not even to say, My son, you are forgiven. There is no doubt about that! But only to call upon the servants, who have followed their master quickly, to share the joy and rapture of the welcome. The best robe, ring, shoes are not only the substitutes for the rags in which he had returned, but the signs of the father's glad recognition: the fatted calf is already prepared for a feast. And now to the father's joy is surely added the joy of the son. They began to be merry.

V. The Elder Brother. — Read vers. 25–32. Strange picture of a spirit out of harmony with this joyful scene! The Scribes and Pharisees must have recognised themselves in every line of the delineation! But the father is forbearing with the angry son, as he stands in his sullenness outside, and himself condescendingly entreated him to enter. Has not, however, this brother some reason on his side? Many years of faithful service, and nothing for it; no ordinary feast of a kid—but now this special banquet and high honour for one who till now has been worthless, and only came back when there was no more for him in the far country! What was the deep sin in this elder brother's plea? Twofold, as it seems: first, the spirit of a servant, not of a son. He would obey his father, but thinks he should be paid for it, forgetting that already he has all: and secondly, a refusal to rejoice that his living brother anyhow is brought to a better mind—Thy son, he scornfully says to the father: the father gently replies, Thy brother. Then follow the words which stand for ever as the description of the sinner, guilty but repentant. Dead (in himself) and alive again, lost (to me) and found. Surely with such pleading the elder brother could not any longer refuse to rejoice! But the parable ends with the father's appeal, the rest is left untold. Nor is there revealed the long and humbling way which the restored wanderer still must tread before he can realise the fulness of his joy. The father has forgiven him, but it must be long before he can forgive himself. Better would it have been to abide from the first in the home!

> The elder brother, though a type directly of the self-righteous and bitter Pharisee, may teach a lesson to those who have long held an assured and happy place among God's children. For even among the faithful and true-hearted, there may be at least the tendency to grudge the apparently warmer welcome and higher joys vouchsafed to the newly rescued from the depths of sin. To this jealousy, in whatever measure it may exist, the loving words of the father are an effectual rebuke. For it is better to have had a long and abiding place in the family. 'The profligate had had one hour of ecstasy, the other had had a whole life of peace. A consistent Christian may not have rapture, but he has that which is much better than rapture, God's serene and perpetual presence. And after all, that is best. One to whom much is forgiven has much joy. He must have it, if it were only to support him through those fearful trials which are to come; those haunting reminiscences of a polluted heart, those frailties, those inconsistencies to which the habits of past indulgence have made him liable. A terrible struggle is in store for him yet. Grudge him not one hour of unclouded exultation. But religion's best gift, rest, serenity, the quiet, daily love of one who lives perpetually with his Father's family, uninterrupted usefulness, that belongs to him who has steadily walked with God. The man who serves God early has the best of it; joy is well in its way, but a few flashes of joy are trifles in comparison with a life of peace!'

Questions.

1. What special points in the younger brother's story set forth the moral condition of the ancient heathen world?
2. Show the place of faith in the prodigal's return.
3. Illustrate by other passages God's willingness to receive the penitent.
4. Are special meanings to be assigned to the several symbols, the robe, ring, shoes, fatted calf?
5. Illustrate the conduct of the elder brother from that of the Jews towards believing Gentiles?

A TRUE TALE OF THE SNOW-STORM.

(January 18, 1881.)

'TWAS winter eighteen eighty-one, the cold north wind did blow,
The rivers were bridged o'er with ice, and the ground was wrapped in snow,
Drear winter had made the land appear like the home of the Esquimaux.

A mother watched at her door, as to school two little boys did start,
Though their home and the little village school lay quite a mile apart.
They started each morn at half-past eight, by nine at the school to arrive,
One of them had seven summers seen, the other only five.

Meanwhile, the snow clouds gathered round, the wind began to blow,
But soon they reached the village school, and their cheeks were all aglow,
And all joyous were they as they slid along, for what knew they of woe?

The day passed on and the mother stood at the open cottage door,
Watching to see her children come, for it now was long past four.
And the school broke up at half-past three, and they always came home quite straight,
And she wondered at the open door, what made her boys so late.

Seven o'clock struck, more cold it grew, and still more keen the frost,
And the mother still more anxious is, the thought her mind has crossed,
The snow comes thicker and thicker down, can it be that they are—lost?

Slowly and sadly the hours passed on, but still they did not come,
And now the mother awaits in despair, the return of her husband home.
He would come she knew, he always did, when the clock struck half-past eight;
But oh! she was so anxious now, it seemèd hours to wait.

He came at length, and she told her tale, and quickly he went away
To see if still at the village school his little boys did stay.
But the snow was four and five feet deep, he could hardly find his way.

At length he reached the village school, and he found the master there,
But he knew not of his little boys, he knew not where they were.
They started for home with the rest, he said, they must have lost their way,
"Then, come, let us search," the father said, "let there be no delay!"

They went out in the cold night air, they dig in the drifted snow,
All the way along the half-blocked road, the master and father go.
And they dig right through the deepest drifts, but nothing was below.

One hour was spent in seeking them, till the father in despair
Went back with the master to the school, for oh! he could not bear
To go back home to his wife to say, the children were not found;
Oh! the anguish and grief to think that they were stiff on the cold, cold ground.

He entered the infants' room in grief—in despair he gazed around,
What is it he sees near the fire-grate, lying upon the ground?
His children! He clasps them in his arms, he cries, "They are found! they are found!"

He bears them through the deep snow-drifts, through the wind of that awful night,
And now he sees through the blinding storm his home is just in sight.
The mother is waiting at the door, she clasps them to her breast,
Scarce yet believing that 'tis true her fears are set at rest.

And now in that simple cottage home, the father kneels to pray,
And fervent thanks are given to God for the blessings of that day,
For He it was whose guiding arm had led them all their way.

It seems they had started home to go, but had found the snow too deep,
So they had returned to the school, and had lain down and gone to sleep.
This is the end of my tale. In Terling* the children dwell,
And that all of this is true, any one of the village can tell.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE present circumstances of the Church of England "constitute a perilous crisis in her history." Such is the declaration of the three thousand subscribers to the clerical memorial, addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, in answer to the document quoted last month (p. 207) as having been signed by the Dean of St. Paul's and others, and sent to the Primate, pleading for the toleration of ritual usages hitherto declared to be illegal. Never were opinions more divergent as to how a crisis is to be met, or danger averted. In the counter-memorial, the subscribers, headed by Bishop Perry, say: "We have no desire to narrow the comprehensiveness of the National Church, or to abridge that reasonable liberty which has always been conceded to Churchmen in matters non-essential. We are, however, firmly convinced that neither in public prayer, nor in administration of the Sacraments, ought there to be granted any toleration of the use of the vestments and symbols avowedly reintroduced as exponents of doctrines which we believe to be unscriptural, and which have been declared to be not in accordance with the plain intention of the Articles and Formularies of the Church of England. We therefore respectfully but firmly entreat your Grace to give no countenance to any attempt to procure toleration for ritual practices which for more than three hundred years, and until a very recent date, were almost unknown in the Church of England, and which, when submitted to the highest Courts, have been declared to be contrary to the laws of the Church and realm. We fully recognise the authority of the bishops to exact 'a rigid observance of the rubrical law of the Church from all parties within her pale;' but we cannot see how justice requires that such variations as have no symbolic meaning, and have never been condemned by authority, should be placed in the same category with the reintroduction of long-discarded ceremonial, which symbolises doctrines repudiated by our Church at the time of the Reformation, and which is therefore identified with the superstitious doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome." This counter-memorial, up to the date on which we write, has obtained no fewer than 3,300 signatures. These include three bishops, ten Deans, ten Archdeacons, four Masters of Colleges, five Principals, twenty-two Canons, and eighty-seven Prebends and Honorary Canons.

BOTH these memorials were brought under the notice of the Canterbury Convocation by the Archbishop, who did not think that the differences which now beset the Church could be settled in any other manner than by the exercise of the authority of the bishops. After considerable discussion, the Upper House adopted a resolution which had been moved by the Bishop of Lincoln, declaring that litigation in matters of ritual is to be deprecated and deplored, and, if possible, to be avoided. Having declared that authority to settle differences in such matters is inherent in the episcopal office, the resolution added that "while this House entertains the hope that the clergy, as in duty bound, will, in conjunction with the laity, support the legitimate exercise of this authority, it also expresses its confidence that this authority will be exercised by the bishops of this province in their respective dioceses with the earnest endeavour to compose such differences without litigation, and at the same time to maintain order, decency, purity of doctrine, and edification in divine worship." A resolution of similar purport had been previously adopted by the Lower House, after a long discussion, in the course of which, an amendment, moved by Dean Vaughan, was negatived, declaring it to be a primary duty of ministers of the Church to "set an example of ready obedience to the admonitions of their ecclesiastical superiors and the decisions of the existing tribunals."

ANOTHER important subject brought by the Archbishop under the notice of the Upper House, was that of a report, agreed to on the recommendation of a committee in the Lower House, in 1879, "On the Relations of Church and State." The Archbishop, referring to this document, said the Act of Submission of the clergy placed all powers in the hands of the Crown. After some debate, the Bishop of Peterborough proposed, and the Bishop of London seconded, a resolution requesting the Archbishop to pray her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission of inquiry into the laws and the constitution of the ecclesiastical courts, with a view to the full statement and consideration of all objections, and to the reform of whatever may be shown to be amiss. The Bishop of Bath and Wells wished it to be understood that, although their lordships asked for an inquiry respecting the ecclesiastical courts, they did not question the validity of these courts; and the Archbishop, on behalf of their lordships, repudiated participation in "the senseless clamour which had been raised against the Court of Appeal," which, prior to recent judgments, approved itself even to the very persons who now found fault with it. His Grace added that it would be distinctly laid down by those who moved for the Royal Commission that their lordships were devotedly attached to the great principles of the Reformation as embodied in the statutes declaring the supremacy of the Crown over the government of the National Church. The motion was adopted.

AMONG other indications of religious activity may be noticed the appearance of two bishops at religious services, held expressly for the evangelisation of the poorest classes, in unconsecrated buildings. The Bishop of Rochester lately preached at the opening of a series of religious services held at the Royal Victoria Coffee Music Hall, so well known for many years as a low theatre, on the south side of the Thames. This was on a Sunday evening. The first of the series of religious services now held in the Town hall, Shoreditch, was commenced in person by the Bishop of Bedford, Suffragan for East London.

THE past and the present, as regards religious activity, were never perhaps more remarkably contrasted than at Oxford. We are told that on Sundays, thoughtful students are distracted by the number of attractions, so to speak, provided for them. "Breakfast," writes one upon the spot, "is barely over before St. Mary's bell summons them to a sermon ordinarily very much above the average run of sermons. Here is food for meditation enough at least for the rest of the day. Yet often from the door of St. Mary's a decided stream will set towards some city church where another great preacher is pleading for a Society or a work of special interest. Lunch may be hurried over for a second visit to St. Mary's, and after that, in former days, there remained even for the keenest devourer of sermons only a parish service. But now it is possible, and not an unknown thing, for undergraduates to attend two evening sermons after Hall, to say nothing of a short discourse in chapel before dinner. Few, it is true, have achieved all six sermons in one day, but the feat has been accomplished, and many, I suspect, sit under four different preachers in the course of twelve hours. But this is not the only remarkable phase of our religious life here. Zeal burns strongly in the young, not least strongly in those who are looking forward to Holy Orders. They are not content even with these abundant opportunities of hearing—they must be doing. At first, Sunday-schools afforded a useful training-ground, but now undergraduates are sparingly admitted to them. Parish clergy with higher ideas of efficient teaching are unwilling to put up with constant changes in their Sunday-school staff, and prefer the humbler but steadier efforts of their own flock. So cottage lectures in the country have succeeded to Sunday-schools, and to country excursions are now added lectures by undergraduates in the low lodging-houses of St. Thomas. From the preaching in rooms there is but a step to open-air preaching, and undergraduates may be heard at the Martyrs' Memorial. But open-air preaching is in this climate uncertain work, and the last novelty is a service in the theatre, to which working-men are invited. Here the platform or stage is occupied by undergraduates, and in the body of the building are lads and men, who come with tickets which zealous distributors have placed in their hands during the week. The whole service is conducted by undergraduates, hymns are set to popular airs, and the audience join heartily enough in the chorus."

OUR readers are perhaps aware that Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, and Ridley Hall, Cambridge, have both been established for the purpose of securing for those who contemplate entering the ministry of the Church of England, a sound theological training on Evangelical principles. The latter of these institutions has been recently opened. A sermon was preached on the occasion by the Rev. Sir Emilius Bayley, Bart., and a devotional meeting was afterwards held in the library of the college. The Rev. Dr. E. H. Perowne, Vice-Chancellor of the University, presided. The speakers were the Vice-Chancellor, Professor Swainson, the Rev. R. B. Girdlestone, Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, the Rev. H. C. G. Moule, Principal of Ridley Hall, Cambridge, and Bishop Perry. The Bishop closed by constraining, with friendly compulsion, the greatly-respected Regius Professor of Divinity, to rise in his place and address the meeting. Dr. Westcott made a short speech, cordially welcoming the new institution and the new principal.

LITIGATION in ecclesiastical matters has not been confined of late to the clergy and aggrieved parishioners of the Church of England. The late Rev. Thomas Binney once remarked, when speaking of the operation of the law in relation to churches, both Established and Dissenting, that the Queen is the head of every church in the country, in respect of its property, if it has any. We were reminded of this utterance, addressed to his own flock, of the celebrated Nonconformist, when we heard of the proceedings in Chancery, in the case of Jones v. Stannard. In this action, which was heard before Vice-Chancellor Hall, the plaintiffs, a section of the trustees of the Congregational Chapel, Ramsden Street, Huddersfield, sought an injunction to restrain the Rev. John Turner Stannard from officiating as minister, on the ground that the doctrines maintained by him were not in harmony with the tenets prescribed by the deed of trust. The hearing of the action occupied seven days, a mass of affidavits having been filed, upon which several witnesses were cross-examined. The plaintiffs alleged that certain doctrines were specified in a schedule to the deed of trust which the pastor for the time being was bound to hold and maintain, amongst them being the doctrines of predestination, everlasting punishment, and total depravity. Extracts from sermons preached by the plaintiff were read, in which he attacked these particular tenets. The doctrines were said by the plaintiff's witnesses, including the Rev. Mr. Skinner, who had been pastor of the chapel for more than thirty years, to be all in harmony with Calvinism, and some of them distinctively Calvinistic. For the defence, it was argued that by the terms of the deed the chapel was to be used "as a place of worship by Protestant Dissenters of the Congregational denomination called Independents, being Pædo-Baptists," and that the defendant had a right to the liberty of interpretation allowed by the Congregational Union, with which the chapel was connected. The Vice-Chancellor, in giving judgment, held that the deed of trust must be taken as regulating the rights and obligations of all parties in connection with the chapel, and that it was binding upon the defendant. He did not find anything which justified him in introducing any qualification whatever. It was plain that no person was to be allowed to officiate in the chapel as pastor unless he maintained the doctrines specified. The letter of adhesion sent by the Rev. Mr. Stannard to the trustees plainly showed that some of the doctrines were such as he could not preach, and, therefore, according to the express terms of the deed, he was disqualified from holding the office of pastor. The plaintiffs were entitled to a declaration that the defendant was not duly qualified to act as pastor of Ramsden Street Chapel, and to an injunction restraining him from so doing. Soon after the delivery of this judgment Mr. Stannard and his friends gave up all idea of an appeal, and, having seceded from Ramsden Street Chapel, constituted themselves a separate congregation.

FROM France we learn that the Archbishop of Paris has sent a letter to the Chamber against all possible projects, present or future, to compel students for the priesthood to learn the art of war, the camp life having as its almost certain result the loss of "vocation." Thus it appears that the shaft has hit the mark. A necessity is said to be felt by many who have withdrawn from the observances of the Romish Church for marking the leading epochs in human life. The "Democratic Union for Anti-Clerical Agitation" hopes to attain its end by instituting "festivals for schools," "civic solemnities," on the occasion of marriages, births, deaths; "circulating books, pictures, music; publishing statistical accounts" of the progress of free-thinking; proposing prizes for philosophical works of intellect and of art in harmony with modern ideas. But all these, and many kindred efforts, will not affect the real masses of the people. They only show the intense necessity of taking advantage of the present liberty of the press, and of meeting, to bring before France the true, noble, glorious Gospel of God, which is ever yearning after and never finding. The French Government is very particular that no part of its administration respecting schools should interfere with the religious instruction of the children. In its circular it says: "The whole of Sunday, the whole of Thursday" (the holiday in France), "every day during the hours before nine and after four, are at the disposal of the clergy for catechetical and religious exercises. During the whole week preceding the 'first communion,' the children will be at the disposal of their parents and of the clergy."

WE regret to hear from Spain of the imprisonment of a Protestant pastor. This has occurred at Montblanch in the province of Tarragona. Señor Antonio Martinez, the highly-esteemed pastor of the Protestant church of Reus, was condemned quite two years ago to two months' imprisonment and a fine of 5*l*, besides law expenses, for having held a meeting of more than twenty persons in the little village of Barbara. He appealed from one Court to another, but in each case the sentence was confirmed, and is now being inflicted. Writing from his prison Pastor Martinez says, "In order to have a little room to myself and very plain food, I have to pay four shillings and sixpence per diem." He adds:—"It is very painful to be separated from my dear family and church, but the Lord strengthens me by his grace and gives me the joy of speaking to the gaolers, to my fellow-prisoners, and to the friends who visit me, of his love in coming to save poor sinners." On the occasion which has led to his imprisonment, he entered the village of Barbara one day, expecting to find a number of people ready to listen to him, but no one was to be seen. Thus disappointed he entered a farmhouse. Presently he was told that the yard or threshing-floor was full of people. He at once went out and began to speak with one and another, and to give them tracts; and it is for this act, construed as an infraction of the law forbidding more than twenty persons to meet for religious or other purposes without special authorisation, that our brother is condemned and imprisoned.

IT is alleged that the Servians imprisoned several years ago for conscience' sake are still undergoing punishment. Some benevolent members of the Society of Friends have manifested a willingness to send them some assistance; but such is the extraordinary strictness and exclusiveness of view entertained by these Nazarenes (or "Christian Orthodox," as they term themselves) that it is very difficult for other Christians to obtain free intercourse with them.

THERE are two classes of Jews in Bombay—the fair-skinned Armenians, and the darker Beni-Israel. The writer of a letter from that city says: "I have lately had some interesting discussions with educated Armenian Jews, who came armed with New Testaments translated into Hebrew as well as the English version; but they evinced no real anxiety to find out truth. Not long ago, a Beni-Israel Jew was about to have his child circumcised, and I was invited with some others to be present at the synagogue, and to offer prayer for the child. Accordingly we went, and found ourselves in a large square room, on one side of which was a handsomely carved cupboard containing rolls of parchment on which were written the books of Moses. The Jews here adopt some of the customs of the natives: for instance, we were seated on couches, and we were presented with garlands of white flowers, which we had to wear round our necks; and I had a large bouquet made of flowers and tinsel; also a band of music was present at the door, which struck up a tune when the child arrived. The ceremony over, I was invited to speak; I had previously asked permission to do so, and expected just to say a word from where I stood, and so I was rather astonished at being conducted into a large square pulpit which occupied the centre of the building. It was a new sensation to find myself standing there to preach Christ with a helmet on my head, a wreath round my neck, a bouquet in my hand, surrounded on all sides by Jews (of whom some understood English and some did not). However, the Lord gave me a word for them. I was led to speak on the prophecies concerning the Messiah, and to dwell on the fact that while they acknowledged in their Scriptures all that pertained to his glory, they failed to notice that his sufferings were as clearly recorded. I begged them carefully to search the prophecies again, and then prayed that they might have the veil taken from their hearts. When I had done, the Jew who was with me in the pulpit spoke in Marathi, and after making a little apology for what I had said, translated it very correctly. After one or two Jews had spoken, I descended from the pulpit, and, amidst the most friendly salaams of the people, took my departure.

BRENA AT HOME.

THROUGH THE LINN;

OR, MISS TEMPLE'S WARDS.

BY AGNES GIBERNE.

CHAPTER VI.—BRENA.

"BRENA is coming home to-day!" "Miss Brena is coming home at last.'

That was the burden of the song in Brentwood Hall, from drawing-room to kitchen. Life had flowed very quietly in the house of late. Not that its ordinary flow was the reverse of quiet, but the "something" which usually stirred its placid current, and set sparkling ripples in motion over its smooth surface, had been seven weeks absent. That "something," or rather "somebody," was Brena,—the only daughter, the only sister, the "young mistress," the household pet and sunbeam and mainstay all in one.

And Brena was coming home. It was a subject for congratulation to all concerned. Mrs. Temple's face wore a delicate bloom of pleasure, and Sylvester, in his gentle half-slow manner, could talk of little else, and Mervyn was feverishly excited. "Times had been fearfully dull," he declared to his much-enduring mother and brother. But nobody feared to be dull with Brena to the fore, with Brena in the house. The servants went about their work, looking cheery under the prospect, and even the little scullery-maid was heard to laugh aloud again and again, having as her only excuse to offer, "Miss Brena is coming, you know."

Nobody ever called Brena "Miss Temple," except almost strangers. That title, though hers by right, was tacitly reserved for the owner of Proserpine Lodge. Selina Temple had tender sensibilities on the subject, and those who knew both, had a feeling sometimes that the same name could not possibly fit those two most opposite specimens of human nature.

Brena's return was a subject for congratulation out of the house scarcely less than within it. All her little Sunday-scholars were counting the hours to the time of her train's arrival; and many lonely invalids, and many solitary old people, as well as a good many folks who were neither lonely nor solitary, neither sick nor old, and yet who had their troubles like the rest of human kind, were rejoicing in the thought that her periodical visits would now recommence. Nobody knew exactly why it was that Brena's coming seemed to do so much good, wherever she went. For she was not much of a religious talker, nor was she greatly given to reading and expounding passages of Scripture for the benefit of unwilling hearers, nor did she largely quote appropriate texts in the course of her conversation, nor had she any astonishing "gift" for extempore prayer.

True, she did from time to time, as opportunity served, say her gentle little word of cheer or warning,—more commonly couched as a suggestion than as an exhortation. True, she was ever ready, when asked, to read "a bit of the Bible," or even when unasked in cases where a distinct opening appeared, and she could talk too on occasions in simple and natural style about the portion read. True, also, she had been known, at the cost of great trembling to herself, to kneel down with some poor troubled one, and offer a few whispered words of prayer, timid, yet full of earnestness and simple trust. But these things were not done systematically, beyond the fact that they were the result of systematic prayer. I am not speaking either for or against a settled plan in seeking to help others, but simply describing Brena Temple's mode of working.

Day by day asking for her Father's will to be made clear, hour by hour looking out for His guiding touch or glance, Brena had many a little message to take to many a needy heart, suddenly sent and quickly delivered. She did not, however, carry out a course of visiting with the avowed purpose of "doing good" to those whom she went to see. She went first, because she was asked to do so, or because she heard they were in trouble, and then she made them her friends, not merely became their friend, but in some measure took them to be hers. Brena always sought after an exchange of sympathies. Possibly she gave as a rule more than she received, gold for copper sometimes it might be. Nevertheless, the giving was not all on one side, and if Brena gained little in receiving the copper, she lost nothing in giving the gold. She had of course her inner circle of friends after her own heart and mind, friends who gave her gold for gold, who were as much to her as she to them. But she had her outer including circles also.

Moreover, in the course of these numerous visitings of Brena Temple among her numerous friends, of this and that kind and degree, friends of choice and friends of circumstance, friends in houses and friends in cottages, she did not conscientiously distress herself, if now and then she went and came away, with no specific reference to religious subjects having taken place. Sooner or later those matters which lay nearest to her heart always did rise to the surface, but she never forced them. Whatever else Brena Temple might be, she was always absolutely natural. She had been known to go into a poor man's cottage, and to say rather sadly,—"There, I have been thinking about your question last time I was here, and I meant to have a little talk with you to-day about God's love, but I can't, I am so cold. So you must tell me what you know of it."

It may well be supposed that warmth came, in the conversation following. But Brena had not been known ever to utter religious phrases by rote, because she counted it right, while her heart did not stir with them.

The secret of Brena Temple's wide-spread influence lay, there can be little doubt, chiefly in her wide-spread sympathies. No matter who came to her, no matter whom she came across, Brena had always interest to spare. The poorest as well as the richest, the plainest as well as the prettiest, the dullest as well as the cleverest, might each one find her little nook in Brena's heart.

She had a welcome home that day sufficient to satisfy the most exacting spirit, which hers was not. She did not in appearance resemble either her mother or elder brother. There was a degree of likeness between herself and Mervyn, so far as regarded slightness of figure, and impulsive quickness of motion. The blue eyes were also the same in each, only Mervyn's were somewhat self-absorbed, Brena's entirely self-forgetting. Mervyn, at three-and-twenty would have been a handsome man with a happier expression. Brena, at twenty-two, was an exceedingly pretty girl, no less winning than pretty.

"And the Majendies are come," she said when she had pulled off her hat, and tossed aside her muff, and established herself before the fire, with her little feet on the fender, mother and brothers helping to form a semi-circle on the grey rug. "And so the Majendies are really come. Poor girls! I am longing to see after them. We seem to have a right to do that, because of our connection with Miss Temple. I think we may be able to do a good many little things to make them happier. What are they both like? And how do they get on? I can't fancy Selina Temple coming out in the motherly line."

"She does not precisely," said Sylvester.

"Which of you have seen most of the girls? Not Mervyn, I know, for he wrote me word that he had not met them once. How is that? Have they not been here yet?"

"Violet has not been well enough, and Lettice never leaves her," Mrs. Temple explained.

"That is sweet of her. But what are they like? Sylvester, you can tell me."

"My dear Brena, don't you yet know Sylvester's sage rule always to give the least possible amount of information in the fewest possible words. I can quote his full description of Miss Majendie, before hearing it. He thinks her—on the whole—after full consideration—rather like a woman."

"You may add to that description," remarked Sylvester. "A woman in deep trouble, I should say."

"She shows her trouble in her face then," said Brena. "In what way? Is she depressed—tearful?"

"There are no tears," said Sylvester. "Miss Temple tells me she has seen none. But Miss Majendie never smiles."

"Never?"

"I have seen no approach to a smile. She is tenderness itself to her little sister, but her face never seems to relax. It is a look of perpetual sad gravity, as if she had come to the end of everything in life."

"It is not natural in a girl of her age," said Mrs. Temple.

"It is sad," said Brena. "It must be very sad to see. One expects tears and grief—but never to smile—and she only nineteen! I suppose it may be the result of the shock. Do you think it is that? What is little Violet like?"

"A sweet child," said Mrs. Temple. "But she is sickly and fretful, and does not take to Selina Temple. I am very sorry about it. I am afraid the plan does not work well."

Mrs. Temple had reason for her fear. The plan certainly did not "work well." Proserpine Lodge, instead of containing a happy family, bound together with cords of love and kindness, was a mere shell enclosing certain separate items of humanity, between which items no affinity the one for the other could be found to exist. Lettice and Violet were as one, but a chasm seemed to separate them from the other ladies. Weeks had passed, and the cousins had drawn no whit nearer together than on their first acquaintance. Where the fault lay primarily a looker-on would have found it hard to decide. Possibly, had the said looker-on been a person of tolerable shrewdness, he would have distributed the blame equally on either side.

For Selina Temple did not mean to be unkind or cold to these young girls, so sadly and grievously bereft. She was sincerely desirous to do her duty by them, to make them a comfortable home, to give them all due affection and care. If some thoughts of self-seeking mingled with more generous motives, we must not be too harsh upon her. For hers was a small nature; and to look for ocean-depths in a tea-cup or for seething linn-passages in a saucer is hardly reasonable: neither is it more reasonable to expect unmixed nobility of tone in a character the outlines of which are not noble. And when Selina Temple had given up the quiet of her home, had gone to all this trouble and expense, for the sake of—well, of them and herself too, but certainly for their sake—it was a little hard to receive mere cold gratitude in return, and a scant supply of even that so far as expression was concerned. It was a little hard to find Violet week after week shyly repelling all caresses, and Lettice week after week the same silent unsmiling girl, with no thought or interest in life beyond the hourly tendance of her little sister.

Whether Miss Temple set to work in the right way to bring about a different state of things, may be more than doubted. It was hardly likely that she should do so. For she had not large sympathies, or much power of realising others' conditions apart from her own; nor had she tact or wisdom in the management of young people; nor had she, least of all, the spirit of overmastering Christ-like love, which might have swayed her actions into the right channel, despite faults of natural character.

So she fumed a good deal, and complained very often to Lady Bartlett, and made the life of her unfortunate brother a burden to him, through her daily reproaches for the burden wherewith he had saddled her. It was singular, and it seemed to Vandal himself well-nigh inexplicable, that the very thing which he on principle did most systematically abstain from doing,—the giving of advice,—should be the very thing which Miss Temple was for ever accusing him of having done. Man-like, he had his own private definition of the word, and used it according to that definition, unknowing or not caring whether the world would accept his meaning in lieu of its own, more generally received. "I never give advice," was Vandal's favourite assertion; by "advice" meaning, and meaning only, the utterance of counsel prefixed by the distinct explanation, "I advise you." Miss Temple, with perhaps more reason, considered that if, by any manner of means, intentionally or unintentionally, he swayed her right or left to a decision, he had offered advice. He rather meant "influence." And since Vandal Temple, no more than any living man, could forbear the exercise of personal influence, and since Miss Temple was among the most easily swayed of human beings, though she generally swung back to her original notions so soon as the swaying force was removed, he was likely to find himself "giving advice" many times without deliberate intention.

However, in this particular case, he certainly had given advice, if not something stronger than advice. "But for him," Miss Temple daily declared, "she would never have taken Lettice Majendie into her home. A cold ungrateful ill-tempered hussy!"

"Well, my dear sister, you are not bound to continue keeping her there," Vandal suggested meekly one day. "We might make some other arrangement for Violet, when she is a little stronger, and Lettice could take a situation as governess. Many girls in her position do so."

But at this Miss Temple was aghast. A member of the Temple family to sink to that? Never. What would Mrs. Temple say? And what would Sylvester feel? And how could she face Brentwood friends? Vandal tried once to make her perceive that the upshot of this reasoning was to cast the onus of the plan on her shoulders, not his. But logic failed to carry weight. Miss Temple listened, assented, went away calmed, and next day, reappearing in his study, began all over again from the beginning.

Except to her brother, who never repeated anybody's remarks, and to Lady Bartlett, who seldom heard half that was said to her, nothing of this appeared. To friends, Miss Temple was still the self-denying affectionate benefactress of "those two poor girls." And without the least intention of deviating from a line of strict honesty, Miss Temple did somehow manage to keep afloat this popular idea—which had in it a certain amount of truth, and yet ran wide of the mark,—by the manner in which she talked of them. "Such a kind spirit!" "Such a feeling heart!" "What a mercy for the poor girls to have found such a friend!" thus ran the verdict among the shortsighted herd of ordinary acquaintances.

The Temples of the Hall saw deeper. But to them Miss Temple did not "let out" her true sensations. She had a wholesome respect for their opinion, and a restraining consciousness that her manner of conduct towards the two girls would not meet with their approval.

For despite any amount of general desire to do her duty by them, and to make them happy, Miss Temple did not show them unvarying kindness. Hers was by no means a disciplined nature; and her stock of patience was not large; and "constraining love" did not bring in a reign of supernatural meekness over natural pride, for she had it not. Whether pride be or be not in any sense, according to popular sense or delusion, a rather fine type of evil, it exists often in exceedingly narrow characters, and displays itself in far from noble methods. Miss Temple possessed an abundance of the quality, and it lay so near the surface as to be easily wounded.

With Miss Temple, wounded pride meant annoyance, and annoyance meant a show of temper. At first a measure of conventional constraint limited this greatly; but as time passed, the constraint vanished. She fell into a habit of displaying vexation unreservedly, not by outbursts of anger, but by a species of small harassing pin-pricks, as it were; by a worrying style of complaint; by petty denials; all calculated to try to the utmost a girl like Lettice. For herself Lettice did not care. Her great sorrow had left her for the while indifferent to the manner of her own surroundings. For Violet's comforts she did care, acutely and sorely, and Miss Temple speedily learnt the fact that if she would gall Lettice it must be through Violet.

Therefore, if Lettice said or did aught that aroused Miss Temple's displeasure, it was Violet who suffered—not in any open way, but by the withholding of some little gratification or luxury pleasant to the child. Miss Temple was not "bound," she told herself, to give this, that, or the other; and instead of giving, as a matter of principle, whatever she could, she gave, as a matter of feeling, when she felt inclined. So it grew to be no uncommon thing for little Violet to whisper to her sister, "Miss Temple is cross to-day, Lettice; we shan't have a fire to-night when I go to bed," or, "Miss Temple was angry with you at breakfast, Lettice; we shan't have anything at dinner that I can eat."

Yet all this while Lettice by no means stood in the position of one persecuted, and meekly enduring persecution. There was no manner of meekness about her behaviour, but only resolute determination to do nothing which might deprive Violet of a home. She bore much and could bear much for Violet's sake. She writhed and smarted often at her own position, yet not so keenly as she would have done had her sensibilities not been in a measure blunted by what she had gone through. But the blunting was only temporary.

It seemed to Lettice that she had indeed found her way into the black pool after the foaming linn-passage, and she had no thought of getting beyond it. She expected nothing more than the dull stagnation of continual shadow. And she never realised how resolutely she was lingering under the shade of the overhanging rocks, refusing to pass onwards with the current of life into possible gleams of sunshine.

Lettice, as well as Miss Temple, was to blame for the state of affairs; and when all excuses are made for her, still the blame remains due. She had not acted rightly. She had not behaved kindly. She was in effect ungrateful to Miss Temple, cold and repellent to her benefactress. While pitying herself for her sorrows, she did not see how she and Violet had grown into a definite trial to Miss Temple. She forgot that though Miss Temple's heart might not be wide or deep, yet to have that heart's outgoings, such as they were, steadily repelled, could not but be pain, albeit not the bitter pain of a more passionate nature.

Lettice wrote regularly to Mrs. Canynge, but, as she had said, she was not a good letter-writer, and her sheets contained little information, beyond a bulletin of Violet's health, a few facts as to weather or walks, and affectionate allusions to and inquiries after all near the old home. Mrs. Canynge at length—and this was a few days before Brena Temple's return to the Hall—wrote as follows:

"Vicarage.

"My dear Lettice,

"I am not satisfied. Write and answer me plainly one question. You say you are slow to make friends. So be it. But whom in Brentwood have you begun—even in the least degree—to love?

"Your affectionate,

"J. Canynge."

Lettice did not ponder the matter long, since a very simple reply was all that could be sent. She took a sheet of paper then and there, and wrote back in her clear characteristic hand:

"My dearest Aunt Jeannie,

"I have no one in the world to share my heart but Violet and you. In Brentwood I love—Violet.

"Yours very affectionately,

"Lettice."

And there came a longer letter quickly in response:

"Vicarage.

"My dearest Lettice,

"You will forgive my saying it, but you are wrong—wrong—altogether wrong. Why are you to stand utterly alone in life because God has taken your dearest? Has He placed you alone? Is it His will that you should shut your heart stiffly against all who are about you. For I know it is so; I know it, as if I were by your side. I know your character well, child, and oh, Lettice, I fear for you.

"It is not right, it is not wise—it is not Christ-like. Think of our loving Saviour, and see yourself in contrast. I have said this before to you maybe, but it can't be said too often. All the world couldn't be His beloved John to Him, and if John had been removed maybe there wasn't another man on earth that could have filled his place to the Lord Jesus. But what of that? His holy heart was wide as the ocean, and could take in all,—aye, not only help and heal all, but love all.

"I never could see for my part aught that is grand in shutting up oneself within oneself, and presenting a dead wall to the throng. Some folks plume themselves on it. You call yourself a river, but a river is approachable, while you are fencing off with sharp spikes the whole world of loving hearts around you. For hearts do love, Lettice, and they will if you will let them; and with all the faults and foolishnesses of folks, there are few hearts you'll come across which haven't some power of giving love.

"Are there no kind and pleasant people about you in Brentwood?—none whose hearts are ready to meet yours in touch of sympathy? Lettice, child, I know there are. Brentwood isn't a desert. There are men and women about you, with hearts and interests and joys and sorrows. And you need them, and they need you. What if you think your heart is seared, and wants no friends? It is not so, but let that alone, and remember they want you. They want love and kindness and sympathy, and you have these to give, and God expects you to give them.

"I am fearing for you, Lettice, and that is why I write strongly. You are young now, and you are taking shape for life; it is the old tendency in you, which I saw long ago. But things are worse than they were. For you make your very sorrows an excuse to stand aloof, and by-and-by you will have put yourself into that habit of mind that you can't get free. Habit binds us in iron fetters as we grow older. And there is no habit of mind which so grows with use or shrinks with neglect, as the habit of giving sympathy.

"And you have to train Violet. Would you turn her into a stunted creature, with no thought for anyone in life beyond herself? Take heed, Lettice. Your influence over her is great, and it is a serious thing to have the shaping of another's mind. Don't turn her into a Devonshire lane, with all that is sweet in her cramped between two high hedges.

"But the lesson I want to impress upon you, you'll learn best at the Master's feet. The more you drink in of the spirit of Jesus, the more your heart will open to all about you. I don't say people may not have their disagreeables; but have not we the same? Love can ride over them.

"Write quickly, and tell me of a change, for I shall look for it.

"Your ever-affectionate friend,

"J. Canynge."

And Lettice read the letter, and sighed as she folded it up.

RAROTONGA.

VISIT OF H.M.S. "TURQUOISE."

ON Thursday, October 21st, 1880, Rarotonga was favoured with a visit of H.M.S. "Turquoise" (s), Captain Medlycott. She was sent to the Hervey Group by Admiral Stirling in consequence of disquieting rumours of impending French aggressions. After spending a pleasant day at Mangaia, the "Turquoise" came on here. But as there is no anchorage for so large a vessel, and the weather being rough, she remained only thirty hours.

Captain Medlycott brought the welcome news that as Great Britain and France adhere to their old determination to maintain the independence of the Leeward Islands, the French protectorate flag provisionally hoisted at Raiatia has been lowered. He met the chiefs of this island and stated the interest felt in their welfare by Great Britain, and expressed his conviction that there is no present need for anxiety on the part of the chiefs of this group, so long as they remain united and true to themselves.

Queen Makea formally presented a copy of the code of laws observed here. At the request of the captain, I gave a running translation as he turned over its pages. Makea then said, "There is a number of foreigners living here. If any of them break our laws, what is my duty?" Captain Medlycott replied that it is incumbent on all foreigners residing here to make themselves acquainted with the laws and obey them. Failing this, they must suffer the penalty, or leave the island. Of course he advised that they should be treated with courtesy and kindness.

Captain Medlycott noticed the Rarotongan flag flying close to the landing-place, opposite to the chief's residence. Being informed that this was not a thing of yesterday, but long ago adopted by the warrior chiefs who accepted Christianity and civilisation, he offered to salute it on the day following.

Several of the officers enjoyed a stroll on shore. Captain Medlycott and his chaplain supped and slept (as well as the mosquitoes would permit) at the Mission House. In 1872, I had the pleasure of meeting the chaplain at Samoa, then in H.M.S. "Cossack." Various objects of interest mentioned in the Earl of Pembroke's book were pointed out. The venerable woman, Tapairu-ariki, who in 1823, guided the martyr Williams to Rarotonga, was visited. She must be eighty-four years old. But for her this beautiful island might have remained for some years longer unknown to the civilised world. Our friends were much pleased with the singing (in English and native) of the students and boys at family worship. A number of questions in geography were correctly answered by the lads. Their writing too was approved of.

At dawn, on Friday, our usual service was held, the chaplain kindly taking my place, and giving a most excellent address, which I had the pleasure of translating.

We are so far civilised at Rarotonga as to have vehicles to convey passengers and produce round the island. After breakfast, the leading white residents formed a party, with our visitors, to drive to the other side of Rarotonga. We stopped half-way to look at an old marae, or sacred grove, where Tangaroa, the principal deity of Polynesia, was worshipped with bloody rites down to 1823. The aged priest, still living and hale, explained to us the worship formerly offered there. There lay the stone, somewhat like the palm of a hand, on which the reeking head of the human victim was laid, the body fitted on, with the feet towards the ocean. There, too, were the seats of priests and chiefs. Sitting in state, the priest would split open a young cocoa-nut and then insert between the jaws of the victim half the kernel, himself eating the remainder. Happily, this once famous marae has long since been deserted and desecrated.

On our arrival at Ngatangiia, we found the entire population drawn up in gala attire in two columns, between which we had to pass to get to the verandah of the house. Speeches were made in English and native, abundance of presents offered, and general good-humour prevailed. It was the first visit of a captain of a man-of-war to that district. The drumming was incessant, until at the early hour of ten A.M., we sat down to a substantial dinner. There was no escape from the kindness of the chiefs of Ngatangiia.

Our homeward drive was agreeable. We picked up our old friend the priest, but had no slight difficulty in preventing so aged a man from tumbling out. He was delighted, this being his first drive. At Avarua we found the natives of the western part of the island waiting to deliver their presents to the captain, and to get a shake of his hand. I may safely assert that not a person in Rarotonga failed to secure at least one shake! To our dismay we learned that a liberal spread had been made by Makea on the occasion, and that the captain and all the white residents were expected to sit down to it! Captain Medlycott presided, and made a neat little speech to the foreigners present.

But the grand event of the day was the recognition of the Rarotongan flag. It was indeed a fine sight at one o'clock P.M., to see the noble vessel steam in abreast of the flag-staff and fire a royal salute. The guns were heard all over the island. A European wiseacre remarked, "I only saw eleven guns." Captain Medlycott quietly said, "We have guns on both sides of the 'Turquoise!'" The difficulty was how to give a return salute, as we can at present boast of only three rusty cannon; but at considerable peril to the gunners three rounds were fired.

As the natives of these islands are passionately fond of music, in compliance with repeated requests from Makea, the band was kindly allowed to come on shore. The performance was admirable and much appreciated.

Numbers of young men went off to see the vessel, every part of which was most considerately explained to them (most of the natives understand English). On returning, a young Irish gentleman fell into the sea and would have been drowned but for the gallantry of a British tar.

Captain Medlycott inquired of Makea whether there had been any fighting of late years between the three different tribes in Rarotonga. The queen was surprised and asked for an explanation. Captain Medlycott reiterated, "Have you had any fighting, say within the last ten years?" Turning to me, her uncle and spokesman said, "Tell the captain that when our fathers embraced Christianity fifty-seven years ago, we gave up fighting altogether. Should Christians fight?"

At sunset the "Turquoise" steamed for Atiu, leaving behind a most salutary impression. At Atiu no man-of-war had previously been seen. Taking it for a foe, the entire population stood in groups gazing at the monster so rapidly approaching, and weeping at their supposed impending fate! But when at length they saw their chief Makea Taue (husband of Queen Makea here) in the pilot-canoe waving an extemporised flag to reassure them, their joy knew no bounds. Most gladly did they receive their unexpected guests. In allusion to this pleasant revulsion of feeling, their native pastor subsequently preached from the happy text, "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowler; the snare is broken, and we are escaped."

It is more than eight years since a British man-of-war was seen in this group.

BIBLE EMBLEMS AND ORIENTAL PROVERBS.

THE MORNING CLOUD AND EARLY DEW.

(Hosea vi. 4.)

THE morning cloud is very beautiful with its golden hues, while every blade glistens with the early dew,—but both cloud and dew soon pass away. The Arabs say, "The servant, deceived by the cloud of the morning, provided no water for the heat of the day." The Shánti Shek says, "As the lightning by its flashes merely drives away the darkness for an instant, so are those who decide for awhile to root out sensual desires from their minds." The Telugus compare doubting to "a cat on a cross wall," that is, she can jump down on either side. The Malays to "a saw with a double edge, it cuts both ways." The Russians say, "Hunt two hares at once you catch neither." The Afghans, "He says to the thief, 'Steal,' and to the householder, 'Look out.'" The Turks, "He who stands hesitating between two mosques returns without prayer." The Arabs, "He riding between two camels is kicked by both." And they describe a man as "riding two horses at the same time."

WORDS SMOOTHER THAN BUTTER.

(Psa. lv. 21.)

These words were applied by David to his son Absalom, who drove him from Jerusalem. Judas betrayed Christ with a kiss. So the Telugus say, "A bear's hug." The Malays, "He planted sugar-canes on his lips." There is an Urdu proverb, "The cat having killed seven hundred rats is gone on a pilgrimage to Mecca." The Telugus say, "At home a spider, abroad a tiger." The Russians, "By his beard he looks an Abraham, by his deeds he is Cain;" "He kicks with his hind feet, licks with his tongue." The Raghuvansa, "They concealed their anger under signs of joy, as a tranquil lake hides the alligator."

WHITED SEPULCHRES.

(Matt. xxiii. 27.)

The Persians say, "Water under the grass." The Chinese, "The mouth of a Buddha, the heart of a snake." The Japanese speak of "clothing a wolf in priest's clothes." The Telugu poet Veman has it, "His forehead is that of a worshipper, his mouth that of a wolf." The Bengalis say, "The heron is (in appearance) a saint as long as the fish is not in sight."

MORE UNGRATEFUL THAN THE OX OR ASS.

(Isa. i. 2, 3.)

"The ox knows his owner, and the ass his master's crib;" but man does not remember with thankfulness his Creator and Preserver. The Telugus say, "Blows with stones to the bearing-tree." The Bengalis, "Having crossed the river he calls the ferryman a rascal." The Turks, "Even the hen when it drinks water looks up to heaven." And there is an Urdu proverb, "Making a hole in the vessel out of which one has eaten."

PURITY OF MIND A SINGLE EYE.

(Matt. vi. 22.)

The Turks say, "The chimney catches fire from within." The Russians, "The fox sleeps, but in his dreams catches hens." The Arabs, "The contemplation of vice is a vice." Veman, "The hypocrite's meditations are like those of a dog on a dunghill." The Telugus compare a double-minded man to "a post in the mud swinging to and fro," or to "one who wakes the master and gives the thief a stick."

SHUNTING-POINTS OF HISTORY.

IT is very curious, and, rightly considered, it is as solemnising as it is curious to look along the course of history, or the lines of individual lives, and observe how trivial and insignificant in themselves have been the incidents which have here and there given direction to the whole current of them.

Such incidents in history have often been discussed. Everybody has heard it said, that if Cleopatra's nose had been a trifle longer the fate of the world might have been different. A grain of sand in Oliver Cromwell's tissues changed, says Macaulay, the order of events in Europe. "If," says a well-known writer, "the messenger which Henry VIII. despatched to the Court of Rome with a conciliatory proposal had not accidentally been delayed on his way, the angry decree which separated England from the Pontifical See might never have issued."

History is full of these little pivots on which events have turned—these little shunting-points at which the train of incidents has struck into a new course. And so, if we did but observe them, is almost every individual life; indeed, history after all is but an aggregate of individual lives, and nothing is more striking and impressive than to come every now and then upon some trivial incident—utterly insignificant at the time—which proves, as years roll on, to have been the starting-point of a train of events affecting not only the whole after-life of the individual concerned, but the after-life of nations, and the progress of the world.

It is but rarely of course that we can thus trace out the ultimate effects of trivial deeds and incidents, and it is but rarely that we endeavour to do so, or we should often be struck by the critical character of the pettiest incidents of life.

Take the case of Luther as an illustration. The son of a poor miner, struggling to obtain a little schooling that shall enable him to rise above the lowly circumstances of his birth, he has already had to shift from Magdeburg to Isenac, on account of his poverty. He has relatives at Isenac and hopes to get a little assistance from them, in his struggle to keep body and soul together, while prosecuting his studies; but his relatives are themselves too poor to help him, and he is reduced to the last extremity. He and some of his companions in poverty, have been singing from door to door, after the manner of poor students of his country at that time, but he has been repulsed again and again, and he is in the deepest dejection. He is about to return fasting to his night's quarters. He must give up his studies and go back to the mines of Mansfield, and settle down to the life his father has led before him. This is what he feels, and he stands motionless and melancholy for a moment. And at that very moment Ursula opens her cottage door, recognises the lad as one she has noticed as a sweet singer, and a devout worshipper in church, and she invites him into her house. She and her husband supply his necessities, afford him a lodging in their house, and thus enable him to pursue the studies so necessary to the great work before him. Still more remarkable was his casual finding of the Bible in the library at Erfurt. He had taken down many books, curious to note the writers' names. Amongst them was the sacred volume, which he had never seen in its completeness before. He began to read, and with what momentous results all the world has heard.

"We know not whether the story of Newton's apple be true," says an anonymous writer, "but it may serve for an illustration, and if that apple had not fallen, where had been his 'Principia'?" David Livingstone as a lad takes up a book and it gives a religious bias to his whole life; he listens to a single appeal, and it makes a missionary of him, and millions of his fellow-creatures have been influenced by that momentous decision. If the Lady Egerton had not missed her way in a wood, says somebody, Milton might have spent the time in which he wrote "Comus" in writing "Accidence of Grammar," and it is a chance question of Ellwood the Quaker which sets him to work on "Paradise Regained." Columbus begs a glass of water of a total stranger with whom he gets into conversation and who chances to be able to give him an introduction which affords him the means of discovering America. The mere fact of Charles Abbott having a husky voice saved him from being a Canterbury barber, and gave the turn in his life which made him Lord Chief Justice of England. Most persons have heard the story of his life, which has many a time been given as an illustration of the success which the poorest lad may attain to in this country.

Young Abbott was a steady, well-conducted boy, but so dull that his father feared he would never be able to succeed him in his barber's business and thought he should have to find some occupation requiring less genius. A snug little post worth 70*l.* a year became vacant in the choir of Canterbury Cathedral, and the barber's son became a candidate, with rather more than a fair chance of obtaining it, for his father had shaved and cropped all the cathedral dignitaries, and was a great favourite with them. They were all anxious to elect young Abbott, but they found that he had such a rough, husky voice that it was really impossible to do so, or he might have settled comfortably down for life as a hair-dresser and chorister. When he had become Lord Tenterden, and was visiting his native town with his trumpeter and shrievesmen before him, he pointed out the individual who had defeated him in the singing contest. "Behold, brother Richardson," he said to his fellow judge, "that is the only human being I ever envied. When at school, we were candidates together for a chorister's place; he obtained it. If I had gained my wish he might have been accompanying you as Chief Justice and pointing me out as his old schoolfellow the singing man."

There was a crisis in the history of Lord Eldon at which, looking back upon that history, it seems to have been for a time doubtful whether he should become a Newcastle "coal-fitter," or Lord Chancellor of England, and Earl of Eldon. His father was on the point of apprenticing him, and wrote to his eldest son to inform him of his intention. "Send Jack up to me," replied the elder brother from Oxford; "I can do better for him here." And so Jack was shunted on to another line.

It was owing to an attempt to deprive him of a part of his patrimonial estate that Sir Matthew Hale became one of the greatest ornaments of our judicial bench. But for this unjust assault upon his rights —which no doubt at the time he felt to be a grievous injury—he might, says one of his biographers, "have turned out a 'Captain Dalgettie,' passing as a mercenary from the service of one military leader to that of another, to swear strange oaths, and to carouse 'potations pottle-deep,'" for at the time he was full of enthusiasm for a soldier's career, and was actually about to start for the Low Countries to offer his services to the Prince of Orange. Providence had other work for him. Somebody attacks his property; he runs up to London to see a barrister about it, and the barrister is the very man he needs to direct him to that work. He is a profound lawyer and a good man, Serjeant Glanville, and he points out the peril to his religious and his moral character involved in the soldier's life in Holland; and urges upon him to consider whether the profession of his father would not be a more useful and honourable career than the one he was about to rush into. His influence prevailed, and young Hale at once threw himself into the career in which he rose almost to the highest point for ambition.

This incident in the life of Hale illustrates very strikingly the vast influence often exerted by lives in themselves comparatively obscure and seemingly uninfluential. Serjeant Glanville possibly might not have made a great judge himself, but he calls into play forces which produce a great judge, and it is worthy of notice that his opportunity for doing so is afforded by an attempt at flagrant injustice. Thus, curiously enough, an act of wrong is primarily the means of seating on the bench of justice a man of conspicuous uprightness and inflexible integrity.

Things often fall out in this appropriate way. Thus, for instance, it was no doubt the brutality of the gaolers in Brest that eventually gave the special direction to John Howard's beneficent career and brought his besom of reform into the prisons all over Europe. Howard was a man of means, and compassionate nature, and partly by way of change after a bereavement, and partly with the view of doing what he could to mitigate the sufferings of the people of Lisbon after the great earthquake, he set out for Portugal. It must have been extremely difficult for the good man to have realised the wisdom and beneficence of the hand which thwarted his benevolent design. But he was thwarted. We were at war with the French, and the vessel in which he sailed was taken prisoner. He was carried into Brest, thrown into prison and treated with a barbarity which no doubt opened his eyes and quickened his sympathies and had no little to do with sending him by-and-by on a tour of mercy to every prison in Europe. That imprisonment in Brest it was which no doubt was the real shunting-point into that particular sphere of benevolence which has immortalised his name.

But among what may be called the appropriate issues of trivial events neither public history nor private life even, we imagine, afford many such striking instances as that to which our engraving refers. Referring to this incident, Southey in his Life of Cromwell says: "There are few facts in history which have so much the appearance of fatality as this." Others will see in it the Divine providential purpose. The incident itself is familiar to all readers of English annals. "Unable to govern with a parliament"—to adopt Southey's summary of the situation—"and impatient of being governed by one, Charles had tried the perilous experiment of governing without one." The experiment had so far succeeded that many lovers of freedom, despairing of the liberties of their country, believing the nation to be doomed to the loss of its liberties and resigned to its doom—resolved to seek a land of liberty elsewhere. Oliver Cromwell was one of them. He realised his property, wound up his affairs, and, as our illustration shows, was on the point of embarking —some say had actually embarked—with his wife and family, when an Order in Council stopped him, the King forbade him to go.

What a trivial thing it seems for that trooper to put his sword across the gangway, and stop that insignificant Puritan emigrant. There is a moment of incredulous astonishment, perhaps a little ineffectual expostulation, a stern, indignant protest, and the little group turns sorrowfully back. That sword across the gangway seems in the Providence of God to have changed the whole course of public affairs, and to have made that plain country gentleman the most powerful ruler in Christendom. By that act of arbitrary power King Charles brings back the very man destined to be his overthrow.

It seems easy to believe we can trace the hand of Providence when things fall out like this—when a gaoler's barbarity calls forth a powerful friend of prisoners, an act of injustice calls forth an eminently upright judge, and an act of tyrannous rulership sweeps away the tyrannous ruler. But there is a danger in drawing special inferences with regard to the acts of God's Providence, no less than when He seems to be dealing in judgment. We are able, it is true, often to see wickedness defeating itself, and in the end contributing to the promotion of virtue and the advancement of humanity. But we cannot trace out the details of God's management of a world like this with any certainty that our tracing is right. Even in our individual paths, we are wofully apt, with our limited view and imperfect knowledge, to assume that we see providential turning-points, when we see only the corners made by our own wilfulness and folly, to assume that God has led us, when He has been simply permitting us to follow our own inclinations. We are very apt to misinterpret the past, and it is useless if not presumptuous to speculate on the future.

But it is well, nevertheless, to look back occasionally over the path we have come, and around us over the world at large, and to observe how inextricably mixed up are the "little" and the "great" events of life; to notice how continually it happens that the "great" events—those that come on to the stage with the blare of trumpets and the beat of drums—dwindle and shrivel into insignificance; while the really great and momentous occurrences are the opening of a door, the taking of a particular seat, the casual picking up of some book, the accidental running up against some friend at a street corner. There are those who will point out to us that the cackling of a goose once saved the Roman Republic and preserved the world's civilisation from going down under a deluge of barbarism, and yet they will reject as altogether incredible the idea of a Providence which takes note of the very birds and beasts. They will grant us, perhaps, that there may be some controlling mind in the great crises of history or the most stupendous events in the course of nature. The overthrow of kings, the conflict of armies, the rise and fall of nations, the tornado, the thunderstorm, the earthquake, the pestilence; the deluge of rain which brings ruin and devastation to a whole region, or the drought which brings famine to a whole people; if there is anywhere in the universe a Power ruling and directing moral forces these things must surely be subject to that control. There are few if any who do not feel that. But when we consider how marvellously the greatest effects grow out of the most trivial causes, it becomes apparent that it must be all or none. It is as absurd to imagine that the greater events and issues of our lives are the subject of Divine solicitude but that the details of our daily existence are unnoticed, as it would be to imagine the engineer of a complicated railway system concerned for the destination of his trains but altogether heedless of the shunting-points; as absurd as it would be to imagine a reasonable man anxious for his harvest, but yet deeming the scattering of seed a matter too trivial for his attention.

The truth is we can form no intelligent idea of any control at all, in the moral and material forces around us which does not take cognisance of all events, however great or however seemingly small. The careful study of the daily incidents in any and every life, their bearings on the course of the life and their influence on the world around, must inevitably force us to one of two conclusions. either that there is no Providential hand about us, or else that our Saviour spoke only the words of absolute truth, when He said, with solemn emphasis, "The very hairs of your head are all numbered."

A Hollow in the Heart.

IN my heart there is a hollow
Which the hand of grief has made,
And beneath, in stony silence,
Many a shattered joy is laid;
Love in all her strength and sorrow
Keepeth watch beside the gate,
Lighting up the empty chamber,
Vast, and bare, and desolate.

For the gate is always open,
And the passage always free
From the surging world around me
To this chamber's secrecy:
And my heart can never, never
Be as it has been before,
It must keep the deep-hewn hollow
Till this mortal life is o'er.

Lord, I come to Thee to fill it,
Not with earthly vanities,
But with Thine own promised blessing,
With the peace that never dies;
Like the dew from heaven descending,
Like the gentle, healing rain,
This shall still its fevered throbbing,
Soothe and hush its weary pain.

Let it never be the dwelling
Of a slothful, selfish gloom;
In its still and solemn precincts
Let no murm'ring thought find room:
Nor the strength and vigour given
Day by day the sword to wield,
Linger drooping on the threshold,
And forget the battle-field.

Make it, Lord, a sacred chamber,
Where my willing soul may learn
Heav'nly lessons, rare and precious,
It could elsewhere scarce discern:
Sheltered from the daily tumult,
Sheltered from the world's broad glare,
Let me see the things eternal
With unclouded vision there.

Let it be a quiet haven
In the stormy sea of life,
Where my soul may flee for refuge
From the waves of care and strife;
Where the winds may fold their pinions,
And the billows cease to roar,
And the distant voices echo
Sweetly from the farther shore.

Make it as a window, open
Always to the sky above,
To the pure, celestial breezes,
To the beams of heav'nly love,
To the sound of angel singing
All along the shining way,
That from earth leads ever upwards
To the land of endless day.

Make it as a fountain, hidden
In the secret depths below,
Whence the cool, clear waters issue
In a pure, unmingled flow.
Streams of sympathy outpouring
Loving word and gentle deed,
Comfort for the tried and burdened,
Succour in the time of need.

And, as from some mighty organ
Rolls the swelling tide of sound,
Onward through the vast cathedral,
Filling all, above, around,—
Grant, Lord, that my heart's deep hollow,
Till its close, with earthly days,
May be filled with heav'nly music,
Echoes of Thine endless praise!

ALL THINGS WORKING FOR GOOD.

"And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."—Rom. viii. 28.

HERE are three things especially that might trouble the life of the Christian: 1. Sin, with its guilt and consequences; 2. The corruption of nature, abiding in him; and 3. The crosses and miseries, both outward and inward, arising out of these two.

For the first of these troubles, the guilt and punishment of sin, provision is made in those words and promises which faith in the finished work of Christ rejoices to rest upon. "Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God." And again, "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to Himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses."

When the soul can rest in faith on such words as these, the guilt and punishment of sin need not give much trouble.

For the second trouble, that of indwelling sin, that which caused Paul so to groan, being burdened, and to cry, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" our comfort is that Christ is not only our atonement, but our righteousness also, that we are complete in Him, and although sin remaineth, yet its dominion is shaken, its power is broken. "If Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness."

For the third kind of troubles, those which arise out of sin, and corruption, whether they are bodily trials, or bereavements, or crosses of any kind, our text furnishes the sweetest comfort; " We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to his purpose."

Notice the privilege and the persons to whom it belongs, for we must not separate these.

We know that all is for the best. We know, not we suppose, we hope it may turn out to be so, but we know that all things work together for good to the Lord's people. We know it by faith in the truth of God's word, for He hath said it; we know it by Scripture examples, many of them just as plain as that of Jacob when he said, "Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take away Benjamin also: all these things are against me," and the Lord was all the while working out the deliverance of himself and his people. We know too by experience—for how often has the Lord out of seeming evil still been educing good, how often has He shown us the truth and beauty of the promise: "I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them" (Isa. xlii. 16).

Well, then, we know that all things—all, yea, all things, good and evil, work together for good.

To begin with good things. The Lord Almighty works all things for the good of his people. Known to Him are all things from the beginning. He worketh all things according to the counsel of His own will, and of Him, and for Him, and to Him are all things.

God the Father is for them, for He loved them from eternity, and that in foresight of their fall and sin; "I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously, and wast called a transgressor from the womb. But for Mine own sake will I do it." "He that spared not His own son, but freely gave Him up for us all, will He not with Him also freely give us all things?"

God the Son is for them. Having loved his own which were in the world, which were given to Him of the Father—having loved them with an everlasting love—having loved them so as to die for them—He loveth them to the end. "I will betroth thee unto me for ever," is His promise to the Church; "Yea, I will betroth thee unto Me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in lovingkindness and in mercies. I will even betroth thee to Me in faithfulness: and thou shalt know the Lord" (Hos. ii. 19).

God the Holy Ghost works for them. He convinces the people of God of their sin, He brings them to Christ, He seals their redemption. He teacheth them to pray, helping their infirmities, and making intercession for the saints according to the will of God. He dwelleth in us, and leads us, and quickens us; and He teacheth all believers to call God, Father; witnessing with our spirit that we are the children of God; and if children, then surely we know that all things work together for our good.

Then, of created things, angels are ministering spirits sent to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them" When the servant of Elisha had his eyes opened, he saw the mountain full of horses and chariots of fire round about them! They were to defend him when he knew it not.

The means of grace work for good. The ministers of God are appointed for the people of God, as watchmen to warn and give the alarm, as shepherds to feed and take charge of the flock, as stewards to bring forth and dispense the things of God.

We might go on to mention the word of God, and his providence in casting our lot where his name is known, and his ordinances and services maintained. We might mention Christian friends who have taught and cheered us on our way, and many a help besides, which each individual heart best knows, giving to God the praise and thanks for his goodness and mercy.

But to go on to what may not be so obvious: things evil, or which seem evil, work also for good to them that love God. One might be ready to make one exception, and say, "Can sin, the worst of evil, work for my good?" Yes, the Holy Spirit has made no exception to the "all things." Even sin has been overruled for the glory of God. "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." When Judas betrayed Christ for gain, and the priests delivered him, from envy, and Pilate, from fear, Satan and wicked men were working their own ends, but it was all by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, "to do whatsoever his hand and counsel had determined before to be done." These sins were working together in the providence of God for the salvation of the Church.

So of sins in the Lord's own people. Their falls recorded in the Scripture have been warnings to thousands of believers in all times, beacons to them to avoid dangers, and, at the same time, giving encouragement and hope to the truly penitent. If God pardoned Manasseh, who sinned with so high a hand and caused others to sin; if He restored David after such crimes; if He acknowledged Peter after denying Him with an oath; if He healed Mary Magdalene, who had seven devils—if He pardoned them, surely his mercy reaches to me. He is able and willing to save to the uttermost.

But, on the other hand, if Hezekiah, if David, if Peter, if these men of God fell, oh, let us take heed, let us watch and pray, that we may be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. This was what Paul felt (1 Tim. i. 16–17): "Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first, Jesus Christ might shew forth all longsuffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe."

If, then, sin works for good, will any say, "May we not sin that good may come?" This is just what St. Paul anticipated might be said, when he had shown how grace abounded where sin did abound: "Shall we then continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid! How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" They who could think such a thing are yet in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity, whose damnation is just.

Again, our indwelling sin, our corrupt nature, is made to work for good. How? It makes us know our guilt, and feel our own helplessness more; it keeps us humble and dependent on God. It makes more precious to us the perfect righteousness of Christ, which is unto all and upon all that believe, and covered with which we shall appear faultless before God. Even falls and backsliding from God may be made to work for good. Thus Peter's fall wrought for his humility and cured his self-confidence; taught him that his strength was not in himself, but in being kept by the Lord; so that after his recovery he was more able to strengthen his brethren and to feed the flock of Christ. The believer often can say, "Rejoice not against me O mine enemy: when I fall, I shall rise again; and stronger from the fall." We have learned where our weakness is; we are taught better how to use the Christian armour, the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God, the shield of faith, the breastplate of righteousness; we are taught the need of praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, by watching thereunto with all perseverance, and in all things to trust to the Lord for strength and help in the time of need.

Thus even spiritual evils work for good. But more obviously outward evils do so. Affliction works for good. It is a blessed sickness which brings a man to the Physician of souls. Many a poor leper and diseased person came to Christ when on earth for the cure of the body and were sent away with sin also forgiven. Little did Naaman think of his soul when told of the prophet in Israel; and, oh, how many of us have to bless God for sickness and trouble, and can say with David, "It was good for me that I was afflicted: before I was afflicted I went astray, but now do I keep Thy law." "This is my comfort in my affliction, that Thy Word hath quickened me." "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth."

And not only affliction of body, but of mind and estate; poverty, losses, bereavements—all those manifold trials which bring the spirit into heaviness are made to work for good. It is the Lord's usual way to call his people. "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction." "I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant." It is in time of trial that He openeth the ear unto discipline, and sealeth instruction.

Then, also, it is by new trials that He often recalls us when wandering from Him, and it is by continued trials, by our streams of earthly comfort being dried up and our resting-places one by one taken away, that we are made more and more dead to the world, and drawn to the Lord as our unfailing, everlasting portion.

Thus it is that all things, evil as well as good, are made to work. "For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."

This text, then, may well be a support under trials and crosses. It may teach us to believe and hope against hope. It may comfort and console us when everything to sense is dark and mysterious. The way of the Lord is often in the sea, and his path in the great waters, and his footsteps not known, but what we know not now, we shall know hereafter. Even now, in looking back on the way the Lord has led us, do we not see wisdom and mercy in what we could not then understand. When going on frowardly in the way of our own heart, how merciful was the judgment that arrested us. When joined to idols, how wise the providence which brought us back to the Lord. When enjoying to the utmost the blessings God had permitted us, how kind the warning voice, "Arise, this is not your rest," "set your affection on things above."

Ah, yes, "He leadeth His people by the right way;" it may be dark, it may be rough, but it is the right way, "to a city of habitation."

A verse like this is one which is likely to give cheerfulness in trial, and comfort for past things that are over and cannot be helped. As Joseph said, "Be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves; ye sold me hither; but God turned it for the best, God sent me before you to preserve life."

It is good for a contented spirit also. It was through much trial and painful experience Paul "learned in all states therewith to be content." But when he was thus contented how well can we conceive Him saying: I know that "all things work together for good to them that love God, that are the called according to his purpose."

"O Lord, how happy should we be
If we could cast our care on Thee;
If we from self could rest,
And feel at heart that One above
In perfect wisdom, perfect love,
Is working for the best."

Sabbath Thoughts.

STRANGERS.

"The land is Mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with Me."—Lev. xxv. 23.

THE true Israelite was not allowed to forget his position. Even in the laws regarding the possession of property he was to be reminded that he was but a stranger on earth; and it is interesting to observe how often this truth is brought forward, and what varied lessons arise from the consideration of it. Beginning with the verse before us, we find that land was not to be alienated: "The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine; for ye are strangers," etc.

Again, in Ex. xxiii. 9, kindness to strangers is enjoined by the touching consideration, "ye know the heart of a stranger;" and the prophets severely rebuke those who, forgetting this, "have dealt by oppression with strangers" (Ezek. xxii. 7; Mal. iii. 5).

From this thought David brings a reason for giving liberally to the service of God (1 Chron. xxix. 14): "All things come of Thee, and of Thine own have we given Thee. For we are strangers before Thee, and sojourners, as were all our fathers."

In Psa. xxxix. 12 David urges this truth in another form, and pleads before the Lord his stranger condition on earth as a claim for mercy: "Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear unto my cry; hold not Thy peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with Thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were." The stranger needs a guide, a friend, a helper, and he turns to his God.

But he not only seeks the aid of the Lord, he asks as a stranger for the lamp that is to enlighten, for the map that is to direct him. Psa. cxix. 19: "I am a stranger in the earth: hide not Thy commandments from me." God's commandments, God's revealed will, are very precious to one who truly feels himself a stranger on earth.

The Psalmist remembers that all his fathers were, like himself, strangers and pilgrims, and so does the apostle (Hebrews xi. 13), where, in urging the examples of the patriarchs as men who lived by faith, he points to the hope which animated them, and the holy desires which inspired them; they "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." And he reminds those who are true children of Abraham, that "here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 14).

There was One who for us and for our salvation came to this earth, and was indeed a stranger here below. Those who have learned of Him would like to think of his Father's house as their home, where He is, and where He has prepared a place for them. Cherishing this hope, they find it not hard, but pleasant and profitable to say with David, "I am a stranger and a sojourner," a "stranger with Thee," not a "stranger to Thee," for this makes all the difference! He who is a stranger with God, walking in communion with Him, having His word for his guide, and heaven for his destined home, may well be content to be a stranger on earth, and need not be ashamed to declare plainly that he seeks a heavenly country.

MAY 15.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS. LUKE XVI. 16-31.

GOLDEN TEXT, PROV. XIV. 32.—'The wicked is driven away in his wickedness: but the righteous hath hope in his death.'

CONNECTION.—The foregoing part of the chapter contains two discourses, one to Christ's disciples, the other to the Pharisees. Of the former the great lesson is, 'Make wise and faithful use of your possessions and opportunities for good;' of the latter, 'Seek to be accepted with God rather than with men.' Both these lessons are embodied in the parable before us. The 'rich man' was an unfaithful steward; Lazarus, rejected by men, was accepted and honoured by God.

I. THE CONTRASTS OF EARTH.—Read vers. 19-21. The rich and the poor side by side: one of the commonest of sights, Prov. xxii. 2; and a fact in accord with the arrangements of Providence, John xii. 8. Hence the sin of this rich man was not in his wealth, but in his failure to employ his wealth aright. Purple, fine linen,* sumptuous fare, were not in themselves wicked, but his use of them for entirely selfish ends was so. That his sin was, so far as we know, simply neglect, is all the more impressive. He is not described as cruel, unjust, or oppressive; he did not ill-treat the pauper at his gate, he was only selfish, caring not for others. But, in the sight of God selfish neglect is cruelty and injustice. 'Inasmuch as ye did it not.' He did not feed the hungry; he did not compassionate the miserable. For a contrasted picture of a rich man's life, see Job xxix. 11-16. It is an expressive touch that the name of the beggar is given—the only instance of the kind in all Christ's parables. He is thus distinguished from the rich man, who may have been well known and famous on earth, but whose name was not 'written in heaven,' ch. x. 20.

> It is singular that readers in general, as if to maintain the balance of the story, have given a name to the rich man, using the Latin word for rich. Hence the parable is generally known as that of Dives and Lazarus.

Lazarus, or Eleazar, 'God is my help;' German, Gotthilf, a name symbolically chosen (the name also of Christ's 'friend' at Bethany, who was probably a rich man). Laid at the rich man's gate ('portal,' a word denoting stateliness), and full of sores; he was in the very extreme of outward misery; desiring, or longing in vain, for scraps and crumbs. The rich man had not the excuse of ignorance (not that ignorance is any real excuse for ignoring the poor and miserable around us), for, as the sequel shows, he knew Lazarus, at least by name. The dogs were the wild, unowned creatures who roam the streets of eastern towns; they licked his sores, perhaps with a touch of brute compassion, shaming the heartlessness of human kind, but more probably from a fiercer instinct; and it added to his wretchedness that he had no power to drive the very dogs away! So was it to the end, but in this beggar's heart was the love of God, as the next scene proves, and so he was happier there in his rags and hunger than the richly-clad lord of the mansion and the feast.

* Literally, byssus, used for the inner or body-garment. Pliny tells us that the finer kind of this was worth its weight in gold. The purple dye was also very costly, and was used for the outer garment, or robe.

II. Contrasts of the Unseen World.—Read vers. 22, 23. Death comes ('with equal foot' as the Roman poet has it) to the rich man in his palace, and the beggar at the gate. The former had his funeral, being buried, no doubt, in a manner befitting his condition. This also was a point on which great stress was laid. What became of the beggar's body our Lord does not say; nor did it matter, for his happy spirit was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom; set down in an honourable place at the heavenly festival.

> The imagery is that of a feast: see ch. xiii. 28, 29, where the guests at the great banquet are described as 'sitting down' with 'Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob,' in the kingdom of God. The place next any one at table on his right hand was described as being in his bosom. So John with our Lord (John xiii. 23).

What follows relates to the condition of the dead in the world of disembodied spirits; the 'intermediate state' between Death and Judgment. See here the 'Golden Text.' Our Lord describes unseen realities in a form accordant with Jewish ideas about the future world; but by adopting the representation He attests its substantial truth. Hell in this passage is hades (Heb. sheol), the invisible world, into which the spirits of the righteous and the wicked passed—the same word as in Acts ii. 27 (Psa. xvi. 8), 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hell.' Lazarus and the rich man, therefore, were both 'in hell,' but in different regions of that world, called by the Jews Paradise and Gehenna respectively: the latter was the place of torments; the celestial banquet was spread in the former, afar off.

> Paradise, then, is not the final heaven. See Luke xxiii. 43; 2 Cor. xii. 4. Hence the harmony between the words of the Apostles' Creed, 'He descended into hell,' and the Saviour's own promise, 'To-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise.'

III. Appeal of the Lost Soul and the Answer.—Read vers. 24–26. The vision of the heavenly feast may have brought to mind the banquets of earth; but the delicacies spread stir no longing, the one desire is for a drop of water to cool the tongue—the tongue that had been the means of sensual gratification before, now parched with flame! Are we to understand a literal fire? No more than a literal feast, a literal gulf. These all are emblems of spiritual realities, in their joy or their terror. In particular, the flame may denote an ever-present remorse, with a vain desire for soothing. Observe the rich man's appeal, Father Abraham, claiming still his privilege as a Jew (John viii. 39). And Abraham acknowledges it too! Son, literally, child, remember! Words strangely gentle, addressed to a lost soul. Note, again, the tone of command, Send Lazarus! The rich man cannot lay aside his old habit of claiming as a right the services of others! Solemn is the answer in its twofold force. Remember! Memory will be a chief source of future anguish—the old life lived again in thought, with its mistakes and failures, neglects and sins, all seen in the 'fierce light' which shows all exactly as they are. Thy good things, according to thine own standard, thy choice, thy fancied happiness. You had them all, what reason can there be to complain? Lazarus evil things, not his, but such as an allwise Providence, apart from his own choice, allotted to him. To say 'My life is mine,' is the way to fearful loss! The great gulf is an emblem of the distance between souls. There was such a gulf between Lazarus and the rich man even on earth; but now the gulf is fixed, Rev. xxii. 11. For these two reasons, therefore, the request is inadmissible. In his agony, then, the lost one utters another desire.

IV. Appeal of the Lost Spirit for His Brethren, and Abraham's Reply.—Read vers. 27–31. Therefore, seeing that there is this gulf between Paradise and Gehenna, may there not be a passage from Paradise to the earth? These places at least are not so far apart! Might not Lazarus be commissioned on an errand of kindness? What, we may ask, was the secret of this lost man's anxiety for his five brethren? Was it all selfish—lest they should add bitterness to his pangs in the place of torment? Undoubtedly the lost will aggravate one another's pain, by mutual reproaches—the tempter and the tempted—confederates in guilt—those who might have helped, but did not! All this may have given earnestness to the request. But we cannot suppose this to have been the only motive. It was with a touch of natural tenderness, that the sufferer remembered his father's house, and sought to spare his brothers the woe which he himself must endure! Yet he was mistaken. And here our Lord teaches the highest lesson of the parable, what we understand by the sufficiency of Scripture. Moses and the Prophets, yet more, Christ and His apostles, in the written word and the preached Gospel, are able to 'make wise unto salvation,' 2 Tim. iii. 15. If these fail, there are no other and mightier means in reserve. We might be ready to say, with this son of Abraham, Nay, but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. Yet a second thought corrects the impression. What new truth could the visitant from the invisible world communicate? What mightier motive could he bring to bear than that which has been successfully resisted—the love of Christ? The spirit of unbelief has strange power now; would it not in the supposed case assert itself even more strongly? 'A spirit came to me and told me of the fire unquenchable. It was very terrible; but was it all real? How am I to know that it was not a delusion—an overwrought mind—a waking dream? My reason tells me that there are no such things as ghosts! Then, after all, he only told me what I knew before. It was just diseased imagination, my own fancies and fears coming back to me in that way.' So the impression would be lost, and the message of Lazarus would die away even more quickly and utterly than the message of God's ministers had died away before!

The secret of irreligion is not the want of evidence, but a hard heart, and this only Divine Love can overcome.

> Besides, the experiment has been tried, though in another form. Soon after these words were spoken a Lazarus did come back from the dead. Was Jewish scepticism convinced? On the contrary, it was only embittered against the Saviour. And when He himself arose, His testimony was spurned, and His Gospel rejected: see John xii. 10, 11; 37, 38.

Questions.

1. Show how this parable illustrates the sayings of our Lord uttered just before:
   - a. 'Make to yourself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness.'
   - b. 'That which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God.'
   - c. 'It is easier for heaven and earth to pass than one tittle of the law to fail.'
2. In which passages of the Gospels does the word 'hell' denote 'Hades,' the invisible world? *
3. Cite passages illustrative (a) of the adequacy of the Old Testament—'Moses and the Prophets'—to set forth the way of salvation; (b) of the sufficiency of Scripture generally to produce conviction.

* It is to be hoped and expected that the forthcoming Revision will render this question less necessary, by giving in these places the right translation.

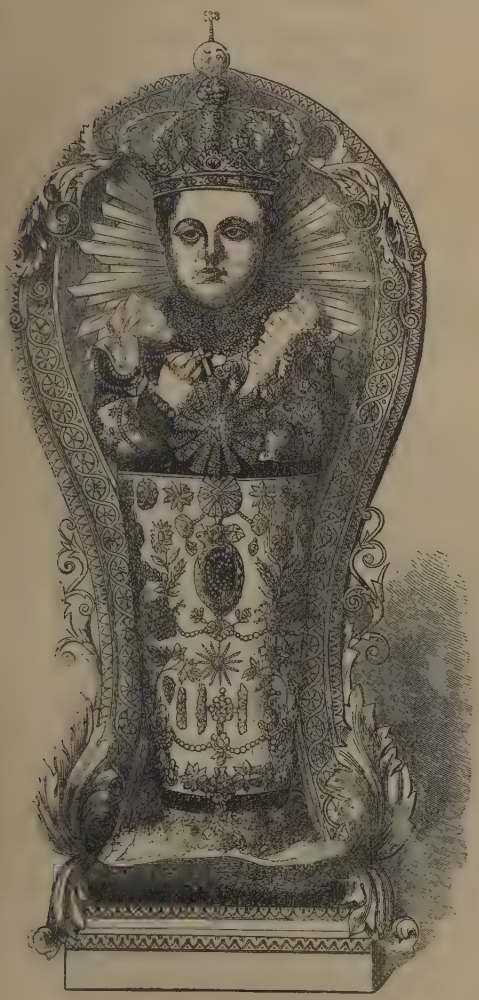
THE SACRED CRÊCHE AT THE CHURCH OF ARA CŒLI.



THE BAMBINO.

AS quite a little girl, I remember reading in the pages of the "Sunday at Home" the story of the abduction of the "blessed Bambino," which is fully authenticated and mentioned in Story's "Roba di Roma." Years gone by, the Bambino kept his state carriage, and drove out when required to visit the sick, but since his treacherous detention and midnight walk home, he has never left his sacred crêche at the church of Ara Cœli on the Campidoglio, and there I visited him during my first visit to Rome.

Having found the sacristan, an old monk of the Franciscan order, we were taken into a side chapel, and unlocking an old panel door in the wall, waxen figures of the Virgin kneeling, and St. Joseph standing over her, came to view, and in a drawer beneath, reposes the wooden Bambino. He is said to have been carved from an olive of Gethsemane, and painted by St. Luke in exact representation of the infant Saviour. There he lies in his drawer on a white satin cushion, embroidered, dressed in a miniature cope of gold, further trimmed with tinsel, a golden crown on his round wooden head, richly studded with jewels of all sizes and of every description, his feet encased in tiny embroidered slippers. Over and above all this he is almost completely covered with votive offerings from his fairer worshippers, consisting of jewelled necklets, pendants, brooches, bracelets and rings of all descriptions, the latter being stitched to his dress. The good friar was enraptured with its beauty and wealth: "Is he not pretty, signorina? Ah, what jewelry!" he said rubbing his hands; and my wish that he would have bestowed but a little upon me he received without the least horror, answering with a chuckling laugh. He asked me eagerly if I would like to kiss its feet, which I deliberately declined, when, doubtless to compensate to the treasured Bambino for such heretical contempt (great licence being, however, allowed to the English signorina), the old man bent himself and kissed the little feet with most reverent affection. Several poverelli had of course found their way into the little chapel, and were kneeling behind, one or two old women, and a mother with two or three little ones, and these as we turned to go left off muttering their prayers, to make their invariable request for small money, and the mother, giving her eldest girl a sou, bid her go forward. We waited a moment to see the kiss given, and the old priest did in this case exhibit decided horror as the child offered to kiss the face!

The next winter I was present at the Befana or the Bambino's Epiphany fêtes, one might well say his receptions.

In a side chapel, near the entrance of this grand old church, is fitted up the stable. Through the open door one sees a distant Eastern view. Above is represented the Almighty and the dove; angels in the foreground playing on various musical instruments, vanishing away at last into countless and ever-diminishing seraph heads. The whole scene is very theatrical in effect, to which the dress of the Virgin Mother lends itself well also, it being of some gauzy material, apparently having done business at some evening party. The sacred Bambino reclined on her lap, St. Joseph standing over them in a Franciscan's habit, and near kneels a Roman contadina, doubtless the representative of that church. After the eve of the Epiphany, the kings and magi have their part in the representation. These last knelt and tendered their offerings, while behind stood the kings, most richly attired, as were their attendants, and it struck us with amusement that these were apparently the ladies of their seraglios. The peasants crowded round so that it was difficult to obtain a good view.

A counter-attraction soon, however, drew off many spectators, and us among them. This was the children's appropriate recitations. A rough platform, or sort of pulpit, is erected opposite at some distance, and to this come small preachers of every class, instructed at their convent schools. The two little performers in this case were of the upper class, the elder, being one of two little sisters, dressed in the greatest elegance and simplicity, attended by an imposing lackey in livery; the other apparently a schoolfellow. Very pretty and effective was their discourse, which was delivered with the natural dramatic gestures and expression of these southern children, who seem not to know, as a rule, the shyness or self-consciousness of ours. It was much in the form of a play, one demanding of the other the meaning of the music she heard, the second, listening a few minutes, stretches forth both arms and exclaims with rapture, "Yes, my dear Amelia, yes, 'tis the song of the angel hosts, they proclaim the birth of the child Christ; let us go with them to adore," etc. So they tell the story of the Nativity; and very sweetly it sounded from their musical little Italian tongues, spite of their affected raptures and manners.

After all, this kind of poetic recitation may help in spreading instruction among the poorer people, who listened with pleasure to the graceful children of the rich when doubtless one of the Reverend Capuchins might have preached in vain. Indeed, my friends and I could not help thinking it would not be a bad method sometimes to adopt in our Sunday-schools. The children themselves took an interest in their parts, and their sweet childish voices ensured it from their audience.

Some time after a poor mother put up her little child, apparently also about six or seven, who made a short oration in verse, but not with the same sangfroid as the last; still the mother's pride was evident as she encouraged and kissed her.

On the day of the Epiphany, I was not backward in going to witness the blessing of the Bambino. The steps of the church, which rise near those to the Capitol, were thronged with people and children. Rosaries, pictures of the Bambino, delectables, and small wares of all kinds, were offered for sale. The crowd in the church was denser than that without, and had not the greater part formed into procession, I doubt if my labour had not been in vain. The procession was formed of monks, acolytes, bearing crosses and lights, and people following, chiefly of the lower grades. A high dignitary carried, raised aloft, the sacred Bambino in all his pomp and splendour. In the centre of his back was an enormous emerald, which, if it be real, must be of great value. Most people knelt as it passed them; many lifted up children to touch it; and the door was opened, and the image shown to those without, who received it with applause, and having made the tour of the church, the Bambino was placed upon the high altar. A service was then read, being the blessing of the Bambino, during which its hand was raised in sign of benediction. This I was not near enough to perceive, but my padrona di casa exclaimed, "How dear it is, signora; how it raises its little hand in blessing!" A pastoral was beautifully executed, and the service was ended; and the Bambino is afterwards returned to his drawer until the next Christmas.

My good landlady, or padrona, was eloquent on the subject of the Beato Bambino, as we wended our way home, and told me how he had wrought wonderful cures for many who were dangerously ill and even despaired of, and said at one time he had received larger fees than many physicians. Being a great favourite of this honest woman, as I am bound to say I was, I ventured to remark to her the absurdity of believing that that wooden image, wholly impotent of itself, could possess a divine power; and I told her that I had heard the tale of its being kept back and another substituted, and said candidly that the priests knew this to be too matter-of-fact an age for the fable of its "miraculous" cures to be believed.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

"YOU AGREE WITH ME, DON'T YOU?"

THROUGH THE LINN.

CHAPTER VII.—A RESOLUTION.

THE day of Brena Temple's first visit was the day after the arrival of Mrs. Canynge's last letter.

Lettice was dressed for a short walk, having been incited thereto by a lecture from Miss Temple on the necessity for exercise, and by Violet's consequent fears for her health. She had just arranged her little sister in an easy-chair beside the blazing fire, and was standing upon the rug, in the act of drawing on her gloves, when Susan announced, "Miss Temple." Lettice looked up, puzzled for the moment, knowing no "Miss Temple" save the mistress of the house, and forgetful of the Brentwood Hall branch of the family. Recollection grew clear with the sight of the pretty figure and fair face, which stooped first to kiss Lady Bartlett, and then came quickly across the rug.

"We almost know one another already, don't we?" said Brena, her soft blue eyes looking full into the irresponsive grey ones of Lettice Majendie. "How do you do? I am so glad to see you at last. And this is little Violet?"

Lettice's hand-shake was chill, none the less so because she had at that moment a distinct remembrance of Mrs. Canynge's letter. She did not care to know Brena Temple, and had no intention at all of accepting her as a friend. Brena concealed her disappointment at the cold reception, and kissed the child affectionately, Violet submitting with a half-smile, in place of shrinking.

"You are just going out to walk, Miss Majendie. Don't let me keep you in," said Brena, not venturing on the "Lettice" which would have come more naturally to her lips. For though the girls had not met before, yet they had heard of one another from earliest childhood. It was the family fashion to look upon them as "almost cousins."

"It is of no consequence. I was only going because Violet wished it," said Lettice stiffly.

"Miss Temple says Lettice will be ill if she doesn't," murmured the younger sister.

"Every one ought to get out sometimes. It is not good to sit always indoors," said Brena, in her bright tone; "and the day is lovely!"

"It is of no consequence," repeated Lettice; "I do not care for walking."

"Oh, but it is good for you. Violet and I are agreed about that. I dare say you don't like leaving Violet alone, for fear she should be dull. They told me at the door that Miss Temple was gone out. But I have nothing to do just now, and I should quite enjoy staying for a little chat with Violet, to make the time pass while you are away. You won't mind that, will you, dear?"

Violet's "No" though shy, was confiding. Lettice hesitated, but gave way to renewed pressure, and left the house.

It was a lovely day, as Brena had said. Slight snow had fallen, hardly to a greater thickness than a full hoar-frost, but every tree and roof and paling was clothed in glittering diamonds, and the sun shone in a cloudless sky of deep blue. Sunshine without, but no sunshine within, as regarded Lettice Majendie; for in her sad and burdened heart she could see no ray of light, could feel no change in the black-pool darkness, could find no lessening of the heavy rock-shadows. There were some who noted pityingly the pale girl in mourning, with her firm step and downcast eyes—some who would have stopped and spoken kind words to her. But she was bent on remaining alone in her sorrow. If they caught her eyes at all, she only bowed and passed on.

Coming home, Lettice and Miss Temple met from opposite directions in the garden. "So you have been out," said Miss Temple; "though you declined to come with me."

"Violet pressed it; I did not intend," said Lettice.

"Do you ever do anything, Lettice, except in obedience to that child?"

Lettice looked up, and then dropped her eyes quietly. "I really do not know," she said. "I never troubled myself to consider."

"Well, it seems to me you are on the high-road to ruining your own health and hers too—not to speak of her character. I believe the happiest thing for you both would be to be separated."

It was a mere passing notion, vaguely rising and vaguely uttered. But the idea no sooner sprang into being, than it gained a certain hold in Miss Temple's mind.

Lettice made no answer to the remark, but went straight into the drawing-room. Violet lifted a bright face from a prettily-bound book.

"O Lettice, are you back? I wish you had come five minutes sooner. Brena has only just gone. She says I am to call her 'Brena,' and she is so sweet! I think she has the very prettiest smile I ever saw in my life. Look, Lettice, she has given me this book. And she is going to bring me a box of moist paints to-morrow, so that I may learn to illuminate."

Lettice was amazed. Violet did not look like the same child as the white-faced languid creature of weeks past. She bent over her half jealously, to say, "Are you glad to see me back, my pet?"

"Of course. I never like to be without you for one minute. Sit down here, Lettice, and look at my book. Brena read some of it to me, and she sang—oh, so beautifully! I wish you could sing like that. I think her voice would send me to sleep when I am tired—any time."

"I often do sing to you, Violet."

"Oh, yes, I know you do, darling. Only Brena's voice is so different from everybody else's—just as her face is different. I think I never saw anyone so loving. I have been sitting ever so long with her arms round me, and she doesn't feel a bit like a stranger."

"I must take off my hat," said Lettice coldly, rising.

Violet looked at her in perplexity. "Lettice, you don't mind me liking Brena, do you? I thought you liked her too."

"Everyone worships her, I believe," said Lettice curtly.

And she went upstairs, remaining there a considerable time. When she came down again, Violet's happy excitement was gone, and the little white face was still as usual. Nothing more passed between the sisters on the subject of Brena, only Violet sat clinging long to Lettice, as if under a misty impression that she had somehow wronged her. And the next day, when Brena came again, Lettice remained present, and Violet's passive shyness could not be overcome. Lettice knew herself to be unwise, to be selfish, in her desire to keep Violet to herself. Yet none the less she desired it passionately. "Just this one," she pleaded in her heart when conscience spoke. "Only one to love—that one her all—surely she might keep Violet! Brena was loved by so many." But why was not Lettice?

Miss Temple found her way into her brother's study on a certain day, brimful of ideas,—or rather brimful of one leading idea, round which clustered others, like chickens round a hen. Having had it brewing in her mind some days, he was not without an inkling of the same, since she never kept anything from him. True to his principle of non-intervention he had abstained from expressing an opinion on the matter. Now he lifted his eyes gravely, wiped his little pen upon his favourite penwiper, and silently awaited what might be coming.

"Vandal, I want to talk something over with you. Of course you can spare me half-an-hour."

"I am not likely to be allowed much choice," said Vandal, puckering up his thin cheeks after a distressful fashion of his own.

"Why, you have nothing particular to do. You have the whole day at leisure—nothing to do, but just to sit still and read and amuse yourself."

Vandal made no attempt at setting up any defence. He bit the end of his pencil in a cogitative style, and gazed into the fire.

"Men never seem to mind that sort of life," said Miss Temple, plunging into generalisations. "I couldn't put up with it. I must be busy about something or other. But of course if you are satisfied it isn't any business of mine, only I believe you would be twice as well if you were obliged to work for your living, instead of sitting in your arm-chair and doing nothing whatever from morning till night."

"Was that what you came to say?" enquired Vandal.

"No, it was not. I came to speak about those girls. I have made up my mind—quite made up my mind—nothing shall move me from it—to send Violet to school."

"Lettice is too old to go as well, I suppose," said Vandal composedly.

"Lettice! What are you thinking about; I never heard such an idea. Lettice! Why her education is finished. She is nearly twenty years old."

"My dear sister, I don't need a tornado of words. I am quite convinced."

"But, Vandal, what do you think of the plan?"

"Your mind is made up. My opinion can be of small importance."

"I came on purpose to get your opinion. Now don't be tiresome, please, but answer me. You know I never like to do anything that you don't approve."

Vandal looked meditatively up and meditatively down, ere he slowly observed, "If it is for their happiness——"

"Of course it is. That is my reason."

"Then the matter may be regarded as settled. You are the best judge, no doubt, as to what really is for their happiness."

This did not satisfy Miss Temple. She wanted unqualified approval, wanted to be able to say afterwards, "I acted by your advice." That was the very possibility which Vandal wished to prevent.

"The fact is, you don't understand Lettice, or you would see things as I do. I have been talking with Anna Temple, and she quite agrees with me that it is a most unhealthy state of affairs—most unhealthy, and quite unnatural. That child is being ruined. Lettice simply slaves for her, and never gives a thought to anyone else. She is growing a peevish, miserable, spoilt——"

"Who? Lettice?"

"No, Violet. A peevish, spoilt little creature, with hardly a civil word or look for anyone in the world except Lettice. I never saw anything like it in all my life. As for gratitude, I suppose one ought not to expect it from girls trained as it is plain they have been. But one does expect common civility, and to be treated as the mistress in one's own house. Lettice never dreams of such a thing. She does not care in the least what kind of inconvenience she puts us to, if Violet's fancies are concerned. My dear aunt is getting into years, and ought not to have her habits broken in upon, though of course, for myself I should not care. But as I say, I do expect a measure of gratitude, or at least of civility—and really I have neither from Lettice, and she is training Violet to be every inch as bad as herself. The thing can't go on, Vandal. I have quite made up my mind to separate the two; they will be more manageable apart I should hope. Violet must go to school, and Lettice——"

"Yes,—and Lettice?" echoed Vandal, who had listened with a tried expression to this tirade.

"Lettice of course will remain here. Without Violet's fancies to control her, she may improve. I shall endeavour to train her into some sort of companion to myself."

"The parting will be a trial," murmured Vandal.

"Partings always are a trial. But everybody undergoes them. Who ever thinks of that when children have to go to school? It is a necessary part of education, and Violet's education has been shamefully neglected. I never saw a girl of her age such a complete baby."

"Her health——" said Vandal.

"That is just the excuse. She will forget to be ill among a number of other children. Lettice coddles and nurses her, till she really makes her ill. Half of it is fancy, and half the result of Lettice's treatment. I do not believe Violet is at all more delicate than I was at her age, but I never gave way to it as she does. It is very easy to shake your head; you always do that if you don't agree with me and have not anything more to say. But you don't know half how bad things are. I assure you—" and Miss Temple laid emphatic though needless stress on the pronoun—"I assure you, brother, Lettice is jealous to that degree, that she positively will not allow Violet to be fond of anyone except herself. Brena came in the other day, and sat with Violet, and quite won the child. Violet was delighted with her. She will hardly kiss me—ungrateful little thing—but she sat on Brena's lap, and the two fussed over one another for a whole hour, for my aunt saw it all, though she could not hear what they were saying. Would you believe it? Lettice turned as black as night when she found Violet liked Brena, and the child has not dared to show a grain of pleasure since at seeing her. Now, ought that sort of thing to go on? Is it right? I put the question to Anna, and she said unhesitatingly, 'Certainly not.'"

"It is melancholy," said Vandal.

"And you agree with me now that separation is the only course. You agree with me, don't you?"

"My dear sister, I am quite content to leave the decision in your hands," mildly responded Vandal. "The responsibility is yours, not mine."

"You can't shirk all responsibility; I am not sole guardian."

"Practically so, I think. My name was added later by Richard Majendie, no doubt with a view to the property—the need for a business-head. But the property is gone. With the girls themselves you must be a better judge than I as to plans and expedients."

"Well, it isn't much use coming to you for help," said Miss Temple. "But I have quite made up my mind. Lettice may say what she likes, she cannot move me. Violet shall go to school at Mrs. Marks'. I know her well, and it is a first-rate school, and unexceptionable in every way."

"London!" said Vandal.

"Why, yes—Sydenham. A nice open healthy part, and she will be near the Crystal Palace. I shall not wait for Easter. No use in delay. If I get her off next week, she will have half of the present term. I shall ask Mrs. Marks to pay all due regard to her health. Things are growing unbearable, and there must be a change. No one can say anything against this. It is no saving of expense to me, I am sure—but I am willing to undertake it for the child's sake. You agree with me that delay would be unwise?"

Vandal gazed hard at the cornice. "They do say that if a man's head has to be cut off, the more quickly it is done the better—as a matter of mercy."

"Head cut off! What nonsense you talk!" said Miss Temple, ruffled. "Why, I am only going to do what almost all the mothers in the land do with their children."

"I suppose the first half-year at school is always painful to a shy child," said Vandal. "However—I hope your scheme may prove successful."

"How can it be anything else?" asked Miss Temple sharply.

Vandal responded not, and she rose to leave, her parting words being, "I see you do really agree with me, though you won't say so."

She went home, with her head full of the plan, having, as she said, "made up her mind." It was a true assertion, for this process had taken place before her conversation with Mrs. Temple, as well as before her conversation with her brother. The effect of the two conversations had been to greatly strengthen her in her resolution; less through counsel received than through her own reiterated assertions. She had now no manner of doubt as to the wisdom of her own intention, nor as to the kindness of what she proposed to do.

One step Miss Temple had forgotten—a certain preliminary step, not habitual with her in matters either great or small. She had not spread this question before her God, and sought Divine guidance. Miss Temple's faith was a vague faith, not a practical one embracing everyday matters. It was quite a correct and necessary thing in her eyes to pray for "all sorts and conditions of men," and to beseech—at least in word—for outpourings of grace upon the heathen. But to pray about the "condition" of the two orphan girls in her home, to entreat that God's grace might be showered upon them, to seek to learn the will of God respecting the manner in which they were to be trained, was quite another matter. She never even thought of such a thing. Possibly, had the sense of responsibility in connection with her guardianship of them pressed upon her more heavily, she would have been driven to ask for the Heavenly wisdom which she needed.

Reaching home, Miss Temple found the two girls seated, after their common custom, beside the blazing fire; the younger clinging to the elder. It vexed Miss Temple. She thought, and thought not wrongly, that the habit was an enervating one. She thought also, and thought not wrongly, that hours of idleness were bad for both. But she had not the loving patience which would have considered to the full their great trouble, and won their love, and gently led them where she vainly tried to drive.

"Really, Lettice, you and Violet waste your whole time in doing nothing. And no wonder Violet gets pale and chilly directly she leaves the fire. Do move a little farther off."

"We have not been long here," said Lettice quietly, but she paid some slight regard to the command.

"That is not far enough to make any real difference. Have you done nothing at all this whole afternoon?"

"I have read to Violet."

"A story-book? It seems to me you never think of such a thing as improving your own mind."

Lettice made no answer, and the subject was dropped. Miss Temple had great difficulty in restraining utterance with regard to the uppermost thought in her mind, until later in the evening. She did not wish to tell both girls together. When Violet went to bed she said to Lettice,

"I want to speak to you as soon as Violet is asleep."

An hour later, Lettice came down, cold and shivering, from the fireless bedroom. She stood warming her hands, and Miss Temple looked up from her work to say,

"I thought you were not coming!"

"Violet is only just asleep. She has gone off more quickly than usual."

"It would be a great deal better for her to be left alone to sleep, like other children," said Miss Temple. "You are ruining her health and her character by all this coddling."

"I am the best judge as to that. No one knows Violet as I do."

"We all know her pretty well by this time," said Miss Temple, with a slight sneer in the tone. "When you first came, I thought you foolish, Lettice, but I did not say much. I was determined to wait patiently, and observe for myself. But things cannot be allowed to go on so any longer. It is quite out of the question. It is bad for Violet, and everyone is made uncomfortable."

"What do you wish changed?" asked Lettice calmly.

"Everything. I can't have it continued. It is a constant worry to everybody, and upsets all comfort in the household. I have been consulting with my brother and with Mrs. Temple, and they both agree with me. I have quite made up my mind to send Violet to school."

The blow fell sharply, and it was an utterly unexpected blow. Miss Temple saw that. Lettice had learned self-command during these past months, the fictitious self-command of pride and reserve, but her start was irrepressible, and her face grew white.

"It is of no use to make a fuss, Lettice, or to look at me like that. I have quite made up my mind. If I did not know by this time that it is useless to look for gratitude from you, I should say it was a thing you ought to be grateful for. It will be the best thing possible for Violet. She will grow strong and healthy among other children, and she will have a first-rate education. It is a school with which I am well acquainted."

Lettice's gaze had never moved from her face, since the first utterance of the word "school." She said now huskily yet sharply,

"It cannot be. Violet cannot go to school."

"Violet most certainly will go. It is quite a settled plan. I have written this afternoon to the principal, making arrangements: I happened to hear quite lately that she has a vacancy. Violet will go next week, so as not to lose the remaining half of this term."

A look of suppressed wildness and of fierce determination was creeping over Lettice's face, transforming every feature. Her cheeks flushed deeply, and her eyes shone—almost glared.

"Violet cannot go to school, Miss Temple. She is not in health for it. Mother always said so, and she is weaker now. She shall not leave me."

"She will be far better apart from you—and I am not the only one who thinks so. It is no use to struggle, Lettice. I have quite made up my mind, and nothing can change me. Violet will go next week."

"If she goes, I go with her. We cannot be parted."

Miss Temple was trembling with anger at the opposition, anger not unmixed with a touch of positive fear at the look in the other's face.

"You are talking foolishly, Lettice, quite foolishly," she said, in some agitation. "Your education is finished. Who do you suppose is going to pay the expenses of your schooling? Not I, I can assure you. You have not a penny of your own, please to remember; Vandal says you will not have a penny when all demands are paid. It is plain enough now. Your only home is here, and Violet of course will come here in the holidays. It is only a few weeks to Easter, and it is much best that she should go first for only half a term instead of a whole term. I hope you will be wise, and not excite Violet, or make her fancy herself ill. If you do, I shall be obliged to send her off at once, before she imagines herself unable to travel."

"I cannot part with Violet," was the answer, uttered hoarsely by rigid lips, that seemed as if they could scarcely move. "I cannot do it, Miss Temple. You are asking a cruel thing of us."

"I do not ask it; I insist! Where you see cruelty, other people will see kindness. We have said enough now about the matter."

"I will do anything you wish," began Lettice, struggling for voice; "anything in reason. I will try to train her into your ways. Only we cannot be parted. She is all I have left."

"You seem to forget that the decision does not rest with you," returned Miss Temple. "All this excitement only convinces me the more of the need there is for such a plan. It is useless to talk, Lettice. My mind is made up, and nothing can move me. Violet will go to London early next week—if not sooner. That must depend upon your conduct."

Lettice said not another word. She turned and went swiftly away upstairs into her own room. Then she double-locked the door, and stood at the foot of the bed, looking upon the little pale-faced sleeper.

PARABLES CONCERNING SPRING.

BY PROFESSOR GAUSSEN.

III.

THE Jews have a beautiful custom when they enter a cemetery in order to bury any one of their people. They bend themselves, we are told, three times towards the earth; then, taking the grass of the grave which they are going to dig, and casting it behind them, they chant these words of the prophet (Isa. lxvi. 14): "Thy bones shall spring up again like grass, O my brother." To-day I take, so to speak, handsful of the grass and the flowers with which the spring has re-clothed our fields, and amidst these concerts of nature's revival, and the life which makes itself heard all around us during this season of marvels, I cry out to you: "Resurrection! resurrection!"

What delight to think that God makes us witness each year the revival of all the plants, and the grains, and the trees, and the insects of the country, only to cry out to us all, in the midst of his works: "Child of the dust, thou shalt arise from the dust, and thy bones spring up again like the grass!" What delight to be told that if our Creator has been pleased thus to show us every year, in the spring, dead nature raised to life, and millions of revivals on the earth, in the air, and in the waters, by an immense power of resurrection which penetrates the depth of the soil, and covers it in a few days with life and with beauty, it is because He wished to recall to our eyes, it is because He wished to attest to our minds, it is because He wished to cry to our consciences, that there is a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust, and that the day must come when our bodies shall spring up again like the grass.

After having shown you, in a preceding discourse, how the parables of spring preach to us the spiritual regeneration of the soul in this life, I am going to remind you here how they proclaim to us the resurrection of our mortal body on the last day. The teaching of the spring is more beautiful than all its splendour. As it might be said of a hymn both melodious and sublime, "The meaning is more beautiful than the melody."

The words of the angels, for example, who sang above the plains of Bethlehem at the birth of the Saviour, were they not a thousand times finer than all the harmony of their song? If, on that miraculous night, you had heard resound in the regions of the air their magnificent choirs, without understanding their language, these celestial voices, although perhaps they may have been more delightful than the spring and more pure than the heaven, would have caused in you only vague emotions, and would have been for you after all, but ravishing music; whilst for the shepherds of Bethlehem there was in these chants a meaning; there came from them that voice, more sublime and sweet than even the harps of the angels, that voice which announced to the world its Saviour, and which brought the tidings of great joy, the coming of Christ, the birth of the Son of promise, glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good-will towards men.

Well, my brethren, it is thus with the songs of spring, and with all the harmonies of nature. There comes forth from them, for the Christian soul that knows the language of Zion, and for it alone, a voice a thousand times more touching than all the prodigies of nature, a voice that cries to it thus: "I announce to you the tidings of great joy. You have a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord; your brothers will rise again, and your bodies revive like the grass. Glory, then, to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good-will amongst men!"

You remember, no doubt, that miracle of the dry bones, which was presented, in a prophetic vision, to the eyes of the prophet Ezekiel (chap. xxxvii.). There are very few scenes more imposing. The Eternal had transported him into the middle of a vast desert covered with withered bones. "Son of man," said He to him, "can these bones live?"

"Lord God, Thou knowest?"

"Prophesy then, over these bones, and say to them, Oh, dry bones, hear the word of the Lord."

Then, as soon as Ezekiel had done what had been commanded him, a sound was heard, and behold, a movement took place, and these bones came together; then he beheld, and behold, sinews came upon them; and there was flesh, and skin extended on them above, but there was no spirit in them. Then Ezekiel cried out on the part of the Eternal: "Holy Spirit, come from the four winds and breathe on these dead, that they may revive!" And immediately the Spirit entered into them and they revived, and they stood upon their feet, and were an exceeding great army.

This scene is magnificent and stirring. Does it not seem to you, that if it had been granted you to behold it, nothing in the world could have made you lose the wondrous remembrance? And yet, we have all been the witnesses of a spectacle much more imposing, and which would have transported us with an admiration full of enthusiasm, if the same which ought to render it still more admirable, I mean its frequency and its return every year, had not accustomed us to look upon it with indifference. What a spectacle of wonders! what a resurrection wrought in all nature! What enchantment! The earth some months ago was a vast desert of ice; on it everything was silent; everything appeared to be without life. The plants were withered; their beauty had vanished. They presented to us everywhere only the sad and frightful aspect of death; the trees, stripped of their leaves struck one against the other, like the dry bones, their bare boughs; the streams and the torrents had stopped their course; their waters stood still, with motion suspended; and instead of the breath of life which to-day animates all things, the wind of the north, like a breath of destruction, walked alone over this vast cemetery.

Which of us, if habit had not familiarised us with all the wonders of spring—which of us, at the sight of all this death, would not have been tempted to say: "Lord God, can all these live again?" And yet what have we seen? From the first days of the spring, the Eternal has prophesied over these dry bones; they have seemed to move, they have become covered with the sinews of life; they are animated, they breathe; and loaded now with verdure and flowers, behold them, so to say, raised on their feet; they form a large army, to the praise of their God. To-day movement, progress, joy, life, are seen everywhere, where was formerly immobility, silence, sadness, death. A spirit of resurrection and a living soul, have they not entered into all this nature? Has not the Spirit of God blown from the four winds on these withered bones? Have not millions of animated beings come forth every year into the air, upon the earth, and into the waters, as the elect will do on the blessed day of the resurrection of the just? These flowers, which on all sides come forth from the soil, as from their tombs, fresh as the dew, in number like the sand of the sea, and more beautiful than the royal robe of an emperor ever was on the day of his glory, were they not, a few months ago, either large and clumsy roots, or grain very much like the vile dust that we tread underfoot? And see now, these roots and this grain lately buried (like the human body, which in the tomb is only an object of horror)—these roots and this grain, which become corrupt and decomposed in our furrows before they rise again, are become to-day the ornament of the country and the charm of our eyes! Behold how also every day, these miracles of resurrection far from ending, go on and extend with as much rapidity as beauty! How many millions of plants and millions of insects, by an incomprehensible operation of God, come forth continually from the earth, to praise as in concert the all-powerful Creator who has lately freed them from death, and made them come to the light of our finest days! See how all creation released from the tomb, seems to be penetrated with life and kindled with joy!

What do all these marvels teach you, then? What do they say to you, all these things? They are there, you see, to show you the truth, the reality, the certainty of all the promises of God. They are there to reproduce them to you, if I may dare so to speak, in the image of the trees, of the flowers, of the insects, and of all parts of the creation. They repeat to you, each in its own way, that the day must come, when this earth, formerly cursed, will see arise on it the morn of eternal spring. Then (you know what the Bible tells you on this subject) —then all the dead which are in the grave shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and those who have known Him shall live (John v. 28). Then our Saviour, clothed with light and glory, shall descend from heaven with the angels of his power, and with his saints. He will come with a cry of exhortation and the voice of an archangel, and with the trumpet of God; for the trumpet shall sound! Then a scene more astonishing, if it is possible, than that of creation, will be made manifest. Then the voice of the Son of Man, penetrating the depths of the tomb, shall be heard by the dead, without any exception, and their bodies will rise again like grass. Then the sea will give up the dead that are in its depths; and the graves, the dead which they contain (Rev. xx. 13). Then will come forth from the earth the children of God of all places, of all conditions, of all ages! Light shall be restored to them; a new earth shall be prepared for them, and new heavens shall be unfolded to them; they shall sing the songs of the resurrection; there will be no more mourning, for sin shall be no more; death itself will not be there; swallowed up in victory it will be no longer.

All this is certain, as the return of a new spring after winter was certain at the commencement of this year. It is as certain as every word of God, who cannot lie (Heb. vi. 18). This promise is as sure as the fidelity of the Being whom all the laws of nature proclaim to us.

Then men shall appear in the cities, as say the Scriptures, as the dew of the earth. Then will be fulfilled this word: "Thy dead shall live, even my body shall live. They shall rise again. Awake and rejoice with a song of triumph, you inhabitants of the dust; for thy dew is as the dew of the grass, and the earth shall cast out its dead" (Isaiah xxvi. 19).

And is it not evident, my brethren, that the goodness of God has been pleased in nature to present to man's reason these prodigies of his power, and these innumerable resurrections, in order to dissipate, with an abundance of proofs, all the doubts which may rise in the hard heart of man, so slow to believe; and that after having set under our eyes the great truths of the future, He has been pleased, so to speak, to make them evident to our understanding?

When we contemplate the prodigies of the Divine power manifest at this season, can we imagine that a being who finds himself surrounded, if I may so say, with the resurrections and the innumerable miracles of spring, can yet say, as the incredulous of Corinth of whom St. Paul spoke, "But how," said they, "can the dead rise again, and with what body will they come?" Might we not answer such a questioner as our Saviour did those Sadducees who denied the resurrection, "You know not then the Scriptures, nor the power of God"? Or rather must we not say to him with grief as did St. Paul, "Fool! What, then, is not thy Creator all-powerful? Does He not call the things which are not as if they were? His eternal power, his invisible perfections, his divinity, are they not clearly seen when thou considerest his works?" "Thou fool, the God of the spring, is He not also the God of the promises? Cannot He exercise his power in the sepulchres of man, as you have seen it displayed at every return of this miraculous season, in the innumerable sepulchres of the plants which revive, and of the winged insects which come forth into life? This God, who from the dust of our furrows, makes come forth the anemone, the rose, the lily, fruits, magnificent grapes, can He not from the dust of the sepulchre make come forth also a man, a redeemed child of God, a friend of Jesus, whom we may have laid in it with so many prayers and so many tears? This God, who every hour changes the water into sap, into the wood of your vineyards, and into the stalk of your corn; this God, who soon after will change this sap into wine and wheat; this God, who will afterwards deign to change this water, this sap, this wheat, into life-giving blood, circulating in our veins, in our lungs, and in our arteries; this God who every day, every hour, every instant of the day, makes come forth from the earth millions of winged insects; this God, who drew from the dust on the sixth day of the creation the body of our first father, will He then have more trouble to draw a second time this same body from this same dust on the day of the resurrection?"

"Thou fool," said the apostle, "that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat: or of some other grain: but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him, and to every seed his own body . . . . So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power."

But before passing to other reflections, let us note another of the parables of spring, which shows us, if it is possible, still more evidently and precisely this important truth? It is at this time of the year that all the winged insects, the laborious bee, the radiant butterfly, the caterpillar, the lady-bird, the may-bug, the silkworm, the devouring locust, go forth by millions upon millions from their eggs, from their shells, from their cocoons, and from their chrysalises. See what it was at first, and what it is now become, this beautiful insect, this light and graceful inhabitant of the air, that resembles a flying flower in our gardens, and that by the elegance of its form and the brightness of its colours, becomes the charm of our eyes. It was at first a creeping thing, a hideous grub, the object of our disgust. Some weeks ago, or some months, it seemed to be dying; we saw it turn pale, change its colour, then cease to eat and to move, and soon after, shut up in a kind of tomb, get rid of its mouth, of its eyes, of even its head and its feet, and become like the dead that we have folded up in its coffin, or the mummy of the catacombs that has been plunged into bitumen and enveloped in bands. Moreover, before undergoing this death, it had buried itself in the soil, or rather it had taken care to enshroud itself in a bier; and we might have seen it in its grave-clothes as we find the embalmed carcases of the Egyptians in their sycamore coffins.

But see now, as soon as it felt the life-giving breath of spring, we must admire what the power of God has done. Would one say that it is the same being? It has torn its shroud; it has broken its bier; and you have seen it come forth, in newness of life, a creature aerial, winged, lightsome, splendid in beauty, provided with new senses and new faculties, in order to go and seek, in an element more exalted, purer nourishment and more noble enjoyment. This new being seems to have preserved nothing of the lowness and misery of its old state. The abject caterpillar which had been buried, and the happy winged insect which you have seen come forth, appear to you totally different, and the raised creature recalls to you the dead one rather by its contrast. The first crept like ourselves on the earth, exposed continually to a thousand accidents; the second rises into the air, it keeps no longer to the earth, and after it has taken its spring, it disdains in any way to fix itself there. The first repelled our regard by its hideous and repulsive appearance; the second, gracefully adorned with the most brilliant colours, becomes the charm of our eyes. The first was blind, the second is provided with most admirable eyes, resembling, by their innumerable and brilliant phases, richly-worked diamonds; it has acquired, it is believed, a new sense, in its mysterious horns; it enjoys a thousand sensations, which formerly it did not know of. The first was nourished with common and gross food; now, after its resurrection you see it fly from flower to flower, living on honey and dew, enjoying freely all the productions of nature, and embellishing nature itself, whilst still purer enjoyments enliven its existence.

There is yet another spring-parable which I cannot but mention; for it is rich in doctrine and full of consolation. Let me remind you of the wonderful preservation of those innumerable germs, which every spring makes come forth at the same time in all parts of the air, of the earth and of the waters.

The grain is to the plant what the egg is to the insect or to the bird which we have seen come forth. In every egg there is a germ containing the lineaments of a small animal which requires only the heat in order to develope. In every grain also, there is a germ whence comes forth the plant. And as no vegetable is produced without the grain to which it owes its existence, so no animal comes into existence which has not been prepared in an egg. Now, science reckons already on our globe more than ten thousand species of insects, and more than twenty-four thousand species of different plants, proceeding each one from a germ of its own kind. And yet, my brethren, admire how, not only all these grains of plants and all these eggs of insects are spread in all places by millions upon millions without the spring being ever wrong in her innumerable resurrections, without the cochineal ever coming forth whence the ant was expected, or the tamarind in the place of the sycamore, or the mint and the cummin instead of the hyssop or the mustard plant. But admire, especially, how all these germs are able, before they revive, to brave the efforts of the elements, the dampness of the nights, the vigour of the winters, often even for years, and sometimes also for centuries, without having lost any of their germinating virtue, or the mysterious vital power that they contain within them. You have heard, no doubt, how some Greek missionaries, now 1,300 years ago, brought over secretly from China into Europe, in the hollow of a pilgrim's staff, the first eggs of those admirable worms, which to-day give us silk, and which by their labour, every year, enrich so many countries. You know also how in European markets people traffic in their germ, under the name of grain, as you might do in the seed of poppy or that of wheat.

We know that there are minute animals whose germs sustain without perishing the heat of boiling water; whilst others, still more remarkable, the germs of distempered wheat, for example, or those of fresh-water polypi are preserved when dry, during many years in a state of apparent death, the one in flour, the other in dust. Both in Europe and in Africa wheat has been discovered, which was buried many ages ago, in silos (or underground stores) and whose germs have recovered life as soon as one of our springs has come to shed on them its vivifying breath.

And to say something else, have you not heard of those Celtic tombs, of those skeletons and of those grains recently discovered in France, near Bergerac. Under the head of each one of the dead (buried, it is known, nearly 2,000 years ago) the superstition of the Druid priests had put a tile; and under each of these tiles, into a small circular hole plastered with cement, some small seeds. Well, gathered and sown with peculiar care, this grain rapidly germinated, and people saw come forth, to revival of life, after twenty centuries of burial, the heliotrope, the trefoil and the blue cornflower; so that you could have last year contemplated visibly these wonderful plants, displaying with beauty, at the light of our spring-time, all the grace of their flowers, after their germs had slept two thousand years under the head of the dead, and in the dust of the tomb.

O my beloved brethren, O my companions, travelling towards the sepulchre which awaits us, are not these noble and solemn parables? Had I not reason to say that they are rich in doctrine and full of consolation? Is not God indeed good in placing every day such prodigies before our eyes? Are they not meant to tell us that these dead themselves, whose dried skulls contained in their germ the heliotrope, the blue cornflower and the trefoil, shall rise again also from their own dust on the great day,—when Jesus Christ shall come in the clouds, and make alive the mortal body of his saints, by his Spirit dwelling in them? Read truly in nature all these parables of the God of the Bible; read them with the instructions that your Master gives about them himself in private, in his word, to all his faithful disciples; read them, remembering all the promises which they bring to you, and confirm to you; but read them especially in looking to Jesus Christ, who is the Resurrection and the Life Eternal, and in whom all the promises and all the words of God are Yea and Amen.

Would that I knew how to show you all consolations! Would that by placing them before your eyes, I might teach you to leave perishable things, to look upon the invisible, to seize the promises of life, and the kingdom which cannot be overthrown! Happy should I be if I could make you all without exception long for the privileges and the peace of the redeemed; happy if I could make you thirst after righteousness!

What indescribable peace there is for the Christian, who relies thus on the promises of his Master, and who sees that this all-powerful God recalls them to Him everywhere in nature, and confirms them to Him at all times! He does not see a plant, not a grain, not a flower, not a worm, not an egg, not an insect, not a blade of grass, which does not say to him: "Here thy God again speaks to thee; Jesus also cries to thee, as He did to Mary: 'Thy brother shall rise again;' thou also shalt rise again; thy body shall live again like the grass; thou hast a heritage in the house of thy Father; thou shalt be made bare only to be clothed again; and if this tent in which thou lodgest shall fall into the dust, thy God prepares for thee in heaven an unchangeable and blessed abode! Thy God is a God of love. The Eternal is thy God, as He is the God of Abraham. He is not the God of the dead, the God of the dust, the God of nought; and by giving thee faith, He has marked thee for the great day of the resurrection of the just!"

MY BOYHOOD IN THE EAST.

V.—THE PIRATE FIGHT.

ON one occasion when I entered the hut of my Báttak friend I found with him a professed astrologer and necromancer. I cannot be sure whether he was the Burmese priest to whom I have referred. If not, both carried about books containing pictures rudely drawn and highly coloured. As I entered, my friend said to me: "There is a man who will tell you what has been the chief event in your past, and what will be the chief event in your future life; try him!" I readily consented, and the man held towards me a book much longer than it was broad, with the edges of its leaves upward, and giving me a wooden pin, told me to put it among the leaves wherever I liked. He muttered a prayer as I did this, and said the picture which I touched would denote the chief event of my past life. The book opened at a representation of a ball of fire, from which were drawn lines like burning rays of light. He said, "You have been struck by the sun, and will carry the effects of it with you throughout your life." The book was then closed, and I was told to put the pin in again as before, the fortune-teller again muttering a prayer. The book opened at a picture in which was seen a huge bird of gorgeous plumage, flying from the left lower-hand corner of the picture towards a daub at the right-hand upper corner, which I was told represented a strip of land with a seashore in front, and some trees and houses behind. There was the indication of my future. I should soon leave the place of my birth for a distant country, and that would become my home. Let me say that at that time there was no arrangement whatever for my departure for England. It had of course been thought of, and sometimes talked about, but the difficulties in the way were very formidable and peculiar. The man might have learnt of the actual past and naturally conjectured what the future would be, but it has always seemed to me strange that I should have opened his book at the two pictures I have described,

Soon after, however, and very unexpectedly, it was determined that I should go to England. So suddenly was the decision reached that I arrived in England before any letter had been delivered announcing that I was on the way. It arose from the circumstance that a kind friend to whose charge two nieces had been assigned through the death of his sister and her husband, felt it to be his duty to take them "home," and he offered to include me in his charge.

I am now referring to the last days of the monopoly of the East India Company. The ships by which passengers to and from India sailed were the famous "East Indiamen," and it was customary for passengers from the Straits of Malacca to meet the Indiamen on their return from China to England at some point in their direct route. And accordingly we sailed from Penang (December, 1833) in a brig belonging to the friend already referred to and named after his sister, the "Harriet," of about 180 tons, and commanded by a captain who was, like myself, a native of the island. The meeting-place fixed upon was North Island, lying at the southern extremity of Sumatra, and close to the Straits of Sunda.

On our way we touched at Malacca and at Singapore. Was the manner of our arrival at Singapore an intended warning? There are several entrances to the harbour. The owner of the brig wished to proceed by the nearest route, and this from the point we had reached was practicable for boats only. A boat was accordingly lowered, with four Lascars to row, a few biscuits and oranges, a couple of muskets and a flask of gunpowder. At my earnest solicitation I was included in the party. We started in the afternoon, but soon a squall came on and the tide turned, and we were carried out to sea. All night we were vainly struggling with the elements, wet, hungry, the rowers utterly exhausted, firing our muskets occasionally as signs of distress, but with trepidation, lest these should only bring upon us the orang laut (men of the sea, or pirates); till in the morning, discovered by the crew of a Chinese junk, we were, to our inexpressible joy, picked up, and finally brought into harbour to find there our brig anchored, and our friends in alarm and distress about us.

At Singapore I visited some family friends and managed among them to catch the measles. The vessel was consequently detained somewhat longer than was intended, and during the detention one of our passengers suggested that as we might have to wait for the Indiaman a good supply of gunpowder would be useful to kill time as well as birds. I believe on investigation it was found that there was in effect no powder on board. Muskets, blunderbusses, cutlasses were in abundance, and "Quakers" (wooden blocks cut and painted so as to look like guns and called thus because they will not fight), showed themselves conspicuously at the port-holes, and I think there were four six-pounder guns as well as a swivel-gun. Malay pirates had never as yet attacked a vessel carrying the British ensign, and hence, I presume, the carelessness as to a supply of gunpowder. However, the mistake was rectified and some twenty canisters of powder were here shipped.

On the 22nd December, some days after leaving Singapore, at four A.M. we weighed anchor, but in the evening our vessel was in a narrow strait, having on our right Pulo Buru and on the left Middleburgh Shoal, so called possibly from a vessel of that name having been there wrecked. The tide was against us and there was no breeze. The captain accordingly deemed it desirable to drop anchor for the night. Our crew consisted of about a dozen Manilla Lascars, two half-caste apprentices, with the captain and mate. The passengers were my friend and his two nieces another Penang merchant, whose brother was our mate, and myself.

Next morning, about nine o'clock, three prahus were seen doubling the farthermost point of the island. We had not long weighed anchor, and the breeze was very light. The boats did not make direct for us, but hugged the shore, and yet were evidently getting nearer and nearer to us. We soon found that as they approached, the crews were raising at the bow of each boat a barricade, and a small gun was finally discerned at the top of each. Suspicion had somehow been awakened from the first few minutes after the discovery of the boats. Pulo Buru is, I believe, uninhabited. The boats were large and crowded. What were they doing there? Why did they hug the shore while plainly intending to approach us? The barricades and guns settled the question. Here were some hundred men, at least, of the ruthless and determined robbers of these seas bent on securing our ship and possessing her cargo. To do this they would not scruple to destroy every one on board. Escape seemed impossible. It was resolved to sell our lives dearly. One gun was removed to the stern. On our starboard were two. On the larboard one. On the bow our swivel. The stern gun was loaded with shell and the others with grape. The canisters were broken; and at the foot of the companion-ladder I helped to fill the canvas bags and make the cartridges.

It was evident that the enemy intended approaching us at the stern. Doubtless they did not like the look of the "Quakers," and steadily kept their barricades towards us. They pulled cautiously, but at last were within speaking distance. Very distinctly could we hear the tom-tom-tom of their drum proclaiming defiance to us, and a means of inspiration to themselves. The mate shouted, "What do you want?" A burst of uproarious and scornful laughter was the reply. Another shout from us, "Pull back, or we fire," was followed by another peal of defiant laughter. Immediately the stern gun was fired. It had evidently not been seen, being partially masked by the jolly-boat which there hung. The shell fell among the oars and made splinters of them. Our foes were confounded and pulled back a few strokes. Then crying out to each other, they advanced again and fired the three small guns which were at their bows. We replied by a "broadside" of grape. And thus the conflict continued. On their part advance followed by retreat; from us shell and grape. But, alas! there was no more breeze than barely sufficient to turn the ship's side upon them. At any period five minutes of resolute pulling would have brought them on our deck, and five minutes more would have seen us all in the agonies of death.

The miscreants continued to hover near us until, I believe, two or three o'clock in the afternoon. It was evident that they hoped to exhaust our powder. And the powder was fast disappearing. We had done them but little harm. Some oars broken, some men wounded, some bodies of the dead or dying thrown out of the boats—this was all we had done. But they had no leader worth the name.

With one brave plucky English rascal among them to cry, "On, on!" and the whole matter would have been settled in fifteen minutes. As for ourselves, there was no wind to take us away, and we were fast reaching the end of our powder. What was to be done? Let us try stratagem. It was plain they were cowards; let us, defenceless though we really were, put on a brave face, screw up our courage, and do a daring thing. Let us turn the vessel round and bear down upon them! This was, after some debate, agreed to. Oh how slowly did our brig obey her helm! How gradually did the surrounding objects change their places—the island which had been on our right now on our left, and the boats behind now in front! What a protracted season it was of suspense and agony! Would not our destruction be thus made certain? Were we not inviting it? This was doubtless to each of us the most awful crisis of his life. I can distinctly recall the pallid faces, knit brows, and quivering lips of the officers and passengers, and how the Manilla man at the wheel trembled in his every limb. As for myself, in the excitement I lost all thought of danger, but now and then momentarily pictured the horror and distress at home when the news should arrive of our slaughter—my father sobbing, my mother paralysed, my sisters weeping, "Tom" and the family servants crying aloud. I have no recollection of any religious emotion during these minutes of overwhelming anxiety. It was a desperate venture—would it be escape and life, or bloody fight and miserable death?

No sooner was the vessel round, than the villains pulled away with all their might and main! The fright was now theirs. It was our turn to shout, and shout we did again and again!

It was afterwards ascertained that these prahus were at Singapore when we were there, that the crafty occupants knew there was no powder on board, left beforehand to waylay us in intricate navigation, were surprised by our firing, and on our bearing upon them concluded that this was not the ship they expected; and when we were gone remained waiting for days in hope of at length seeing the proper vessel.

We arrived at North Island on the 31st December. The interval of waiting was much longer than was expected. I remember that our stock of provisions ran low, and our water was exhausted, that with everyone armed we ventured to land on the Sumatran beach to get fowls and water, that we suffered no stranger to come on board, fresh painted our veteran "Quakers," and to every inquiry answered that it was a Kapal jaga jaga (a guardship). Not till the 7th of January did our hearts begin to beat quietly again, for then the H. E. I. C.'s teak-built ship "Vansittart" arrived, and the passengers were at once removed to a secure home in the noble and stately vessel. Soon after we touched at Angier Point and took on board a much larger company of passengers, in the form of "Java sparrows" and monkeys, scarcely one of the latter, however, living through the cold weather of the Cape. Frequently did my thoughts return to the scene at Pulo Buru—and from it I have certainly gathered practical lessons for life, and I hope impulses to thanksgiving and consecration.

"The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? When the wicked, even my enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear: . . . And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me: therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy; I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the Lord."

MY SECOND CURACY.*

I.

MY second curacy! With what very different emotions does a minister of Christ enter upon the duties of a second sphere of duty from those which animated him when he was first ordained. Then, all was new and strange, and fresh, both in manner of life and habit of thought. Holy aspirations filled his breast, a steady determination to fulfil in some faint degree the various offices of his sacred calling was seated deep within his heart, a burning zeal to win souls to Christ, and to rouse up the careless and indifferent, spurred him onward in his work.

But the feelings which we experience as we enter upon a second field of ministerial labour are different. We may be just as earnestly resolved to work to the utmost in the Lord's vineyard, but our zeal is sobered, we are not so sanguine of success, we have met with disappointments and with failure, our warnings have been unheeded, our kindness misunderstood, and our motives questioned. We are conscious, too, of having very frequently ourselves fallen far short of what an ideal minister should be; our life has not been as consistent as it ought, we have been at one time too much elevated at some partial success, at others too much depressed by some little failure, and these things have left their mark upon us. Thus we enter upon our second curacy with mingled feelings.

It was much in this frame of mind that I entered upon the duties of a large metropolitan charge, and what a contrast was it in every way to the one I had left. Instead of Devonshire lanes and "tors" and wide expanses of moorland scenery, my present parish lay in the midst of the great capital.

I will proceed to describe it, and if I give details of a secular kind, the reader will regard them as necessary to understand clearly the sphere of labour, and the information may be useful to some brother in the ministry called to labour in a similar field.

In the first place, the houses themselves are not by any means as bad as thousands to be found elsewhere in the metropolis, in fact, they boast of being in general in good repair. One thing is certain, they are never empty. In the whole parish containing a population of sixteen thousand, I do not know a single uninhabited house. This state of things partly arises from its position being central, and partly from the different kinds of work carried on in the district. Of course no tenant thinks of occupying the whole of his house, even the more respectable of the tradesmen let off their second and third floors, and sometimes their first in addition, reserving only their shop and parlour. The reason for this is, that rents are exceedingly high, and lodgers are profitable. As a general rule, the whole house is taken by the person occupying the parlour, and if there is a landlord he is either a mechanic or small tradesman. The average rent he pays is about 60*l.*, and he lets the kitchen, as he calls what in other towns would be termed an underground cellar, for 3*s.* a week. He reserves the front parlour for himself, the back one, being commonly a small one, he lets for 3*s.* 6*d.* or 4*s.* The first floor is let into front and back rooms; for the front room he will receive 5*s.* 6*d.* or 6*s.* a week, and, if a small closet is added, 8*s.*, while the back will bring him in 4*s.* 6*d.* We now mount to the second floor, and here each room lets for 4*s.* 6*d.* or 4*s.*, while the third floor or attics will fetch nearly if not quite as much, as the greater amount of light in these upper rooms causes them to be eagerly sought after by the tailors or shoemakers who work at home. The prices may be higher now, but such was the state of matters ten or twelve years ago.

Now one of the petty annoyances experienced by a district visitor, when making his or her rounds among houses of these descriptions, is to know which bell to ring, or how many raps to give for the particular person you want. You see a row of bells before you, and you feel puzzled as to which you should pull, until looking into the pages of your district-visiting book, you find you have to ring the second bell twice for a person living on the second floor back. But sometimes your puzzle is made more difficult, when arriving at the indicated house you find a row of bells on each side of the door, and consequently feel quite at a loss to know which of the bells is the one you want. Again, as is sometimes the case, there are no bells, but a knocker instead. How many times it is used in one day I leave my reader to guess, but as five knocks or even seven are no uncommon number required to bring down the third-floor people, the daily average must be great.

Another arrangement made between the landlord and his tenants (I am now speaking of the out landlord to whom the whole house is let), is concerning the cleansing of the stairs, which, from the amount of traffic on them, quickly get very dirty. Each floor is made responsible for the stairs leading to their particular room—I say room, because very few of the inhabitants can afford to pay for rooms. Of course the persons who occupy the first floor have the hardest work in this respect, as all the lodgers have to pass them, with the exception of the family living in the kitchen. This last-named family have also a great deal of cleaning to perform, as every one has to come to the common water-cistern, and other arrangements on the basement floor.

Sometimes, the rooms are let ready furnished; but more generally unfurnished; the tenants are weekly ones, and unless they have been residing some time in the house, are seldom permitted to get more than a fortnight in arrears with their rents. The inhabitants of these houses are mostly mechanics, or else women employed in making up materials for the larger shops of the metropolis. The greater number of women in my district, either wives, or widows, are waistcoat-makers. It is surprising how much privation and misery is caused to one offshoot of the waistcoat-making trade (I refer to the makers of white waistcoats) by such an accidental circumstance as a court mourning. I have known scores of women at one time, who have been depending upon the return of the season for supplying the necessities of the whole year, have their hopes dashed to the ground by an event of this sort happening.

* The writer of these recollections, the Rev. E. J. Cooper, died soon after they were placed in our hands. He had filled various posts of usefulness at home and abroad, latterly as a chaplain in the Bombay Presidency.—Ed. S. H.

The waistcoat-makers are well paid upon an average, and would live comfortably if work were constant; but what they suffer from, is either a glut of work at once, or a continuance of many weeks without any. Of course both extremes are bad, for when work is sent in, it must be finished by the time ordered, however short that may be, for, as ladies with their milliners, so gentlemen with their tailors, frequently give an order which must be executed in a ridiculously short space, causing the weary worker to sit up sometimes the whole night, and even to work throughout the Sunday, in order that the articles may be made by the given time. If she fails, never again will she receive work from her master. She is thrown out of employment, and will experience many hardships before she succeeds in obtaining a job from a fresh employer; for the number of women striving to gain a livelihood by waistcoat-making is much greater than the demand, especially since the introduction of the sewing-machine.

However, a few years hence, the present evils will be greatly mitigated, as the waistcoat-makers are not bringing up their children to follow a like occupation. The same may be said of the needlewomen; the sewing-machine has produced a great revolution in all trades in which the needle figures as the principal instrument; and no doubt its introduction, though a positive good to the community at large, has been attended with the greatest evils to a very numerous, and for the most part, a deserving class. The privations endured by the needlewomen of London, particularly since the sewing-machine has so effectively occupied their ground, can never be exaggerated; and those only who have been intimately connected with this class can have any idea of the widely-spread distress that has ensued. And yet it was time that these women should be overruled in their attempt to gain a livelihood, even against their endeavours to retain the existing state of things; for with many it was an attempt only, ending in miserable failure. Thus, I have known women in my district, making up shirts of a coarse description, working four button-holes, finding their own needles and thread, yet only getting 2½*d.* paid on each shirt; while for finer ones with six button-holes, the pittance doled out was 3½*d.* and this sum not paid until the garment is stretched and weighed in order to see that the work has been well performed, and not a shaving of the material wasted or stolen. Think, gentle readers, how many shirts must be made in the year to enable a woman to live, and to provide for her rent!

The making of soldiers' accoutrements is another branch of industry extensively carried on in my district, and since the erection of some large premises to compete with the government stores it has largely increased. Those who at present work at home are employed in making soldiers' caps, belts, and straps. One man who works at these last-mentioned articles showed me his work; he had to double the leather, sew and bind it, make the holes, sew on the buckle and thong, and when he had completed two of these straps he received five-farthings. Working sixteen hours he would be able to earn 2*s.* 6*d.* His wife had been bedridden for years, and he himself was fifty years of age.

Now without taking any more individual cases, I would say a few words upon the education of my people, and here with regard to their secular education, I can speak favourably. Nearly all the people could read and write, the tailors particularly, being good scholars, though complete radicals in politics, and freethinkers in religion. The children were generally sent to the large national schools of the parish, which ranked among the very best in the metropolis. There were no Board Schools at that time. The parents knew from bitter experience, that unless a young man has an education of some kind, and that of a superior class, he cannot raise his position in London or even secure good wages.

Another thing may have had much influence with the parents, and that is the crowded state of their one, or at the most, two rooms, and the danger of allowing their children to play in the streets. To school on week days, therefore, most of the children went. On Sundays it was different. I do not mean to say but that many went to the various churches and Sunday-schools, but in proportion the attendance was much less on the Lord's Day than other ordinary week days. Either the parents took them to Kew, Richmond or Highgate, or the parents went alone, after giving their children their dinners, and starting them off to play in the park. This kind of training obviously acted badly in after-years, and shows its fruits in the non-attendance of the youth of eighteen or nineteen of both sexes at a place of public worship.

The parish itself was divided into three districts, one allotted to each curate as his particular charge, while the vicar overlooked the whole. Each curate had under him as his assistant a Scripture-reader and a staff of district-visitors. These communicated the wants of their portion of the district to the curate, who then either visited the more important cases himself, or directed the Scripture-reader to attend, or if necessity required it reported the matter to the vicar. The special duties, both of the district-visitor and of the Scripture-reader, were to act as pioneers and to pave the way for the clergyman's ministration; they had to seek out and induce neglectful parents to go themselves, and to cause their children to go, to a place of worship and to a Sunday-school, to report progress on the sick cases, to act as almoners, to bring under the notice of the poor the various clubs of the parish, to point out the advantages of depositing their spare pence in the saving fund, the clothing and shoe-club, the maternal society, the needlework charity, etc., etc. Besides these duties, they had generally to make themselves acquainted with the habits and characters of the people among whom they worked, and the changes that took place in occupation of the several rooms and houses. To receive these reports, and for the purpose of consultation, the clergy assembled in a particular room at a certain hour daily, and to this room was admitted any of the poor who wished to make any request, either to be relieved temporarily, or to give information of the illness of any of their family, or other matters.

And here I may observe in passing, that relief except in the case of very urgent sickness, or sudden death, leaving a family unprovided for, was very seldom given in money, almost always being given in kind, or rather in orders upon the different tradesmen of the district for a certain amount of goods. We found that this plan answered extremely well.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

MAY 22.

PARABLES ON PRAYER. LUKE XVIII. 1–14.

GOLDEN TEXT, CHAP. XI. 9.—'And I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find, knock, and it shall be opened unto you.'

CONNECTION.—Jesus was now on His last journey to Jerusalem, to keep His final Passover and to die, ch. xvii. 11. His discourses have assumed a more deeply solemn tone than ever; dealing much with the terrors of coming judgment and the coming of the Son of man. With the thoughts and anxieties thus awakened the former of these Parables has to do, as is plain from ver. 8. Perhaps the errand of His fellow-travellers, bound for Jerusalem and the Temple, may have suggested the second.

I. FIRST PARABLE: PERSEVERING PRAYER. THE JUDGE AND THE WIDOW.—Read vers. 1–8. In this parable, unlike most, the lesson is placed first, as though to prevent any mistake as to its application. Men ought always to pray, compare 1 Thess. v. 17. Not to be always praying in outward fashion.

> Those who, as monks or ascetics, retire from the world and its cares that they may pray uninterruptedly, spending hours on their knees, nightly rising from their slumbers to engage in acts of devotion, do not (to say the least) more truly fulfil this command than those who in the 'trivial round' and amid the 'common tasks' of life remember God.

And not to faint, or 'lose heart.' This defines the special aim of the parable; and that the disciples may more strongly apprehend it an extreme case is chosen. In one point the conduct of the unjust judge is likened to the dealings of God—in listening to urgent prayer. The unlikeness in all other points between the two only makes the lesson the stronger. Our Lord's argument may be expressed by the words 'How much more!' A series of contrasts will clearly bring out the lesson.

1. An unjust judge: the all-righteous God.

2. A solitary suppliant: God's own elect.

3. The widow's own case: the purpose of God Himself.

4. Yielding to mere importunity: bestowing in fatherly love.

1. Look at the judge's character (only too common in Oriental tribunals); its complete worthlessness. With many who fear not God, and so miss the highest law of conduct, regard to man comes as a kind of substitute. It may take one of two forms: a real kindness of disposition, an unwillingness to inflict pain upon others; or a fear of what people will say. Both these motives, especially the latter, of themselves keep many who recognise no loftier rule of conduct, tolerably 'straight.' But this judge had not even such influences to restrain him. In a word, he cared for nobody but himself. Yet he consented to do justice in the end. How much more, the all-righteous God.

2. The widow is universally presented in the Scriptures as an object of sympathy and help. Her cause was evidently just. The word avenge means strictly 'deliver by legal process:' and her adversary was an oppressor. All this was in her favour, but she was one, and alone, and had no relationship with the judge. Yet he righted her; and how much more will God help those whom He has chosen—His own people—the vast innumerable company of His elect.

3. Then, the trouble was the widow's own. It was nothing to the judge either way. (It is not said that the adversary bribed him—no uncommon case, in the courts of that period.) Yet she obtained a decision in her favour. How much more will God do for His people, what He himself wills, what He has promised, what will bring to pass the purposes of His own wisdom and love.

4. The judge is very honest with himself, and lays bare his motives to us. Writers on Eastern customs have often described the persistency with which suppliants will waylay those from whom they seek a favour, waiting for hours at their gates, forcing a passage into their houses, stopping them on the road, falling at their feet, shrieking aloud, imploring bystanders to take up their cause. The judge begins to feel it a nuisance, as his expressive word shows—not simply weary, but worry me.* To this, and not to the justice of her cause, nor the fear of human opinion, he gives in. How much more will God answer the prayer of His children, to whom He 'waits to be gracious!'

This is the argument, quite sufficient to meet all difficulties arising from delay. No doubt that delay is sometimes distressing. Take the parable in two ways—in reference to the Church at large, and to individual Christians. From the former the cry Thy kingdom come is as the widow's plea, and how long the kingdom seems in coming! The latter, in their various wants and trials, seem at times to pray in vain. Picture Martha and Mary at Bethany, waiting for Jesus, who did not come for those two dreadful days! The expression, though He bear long with them, means 'though He is long-suffering in their case,' His forbearance is with their enemies. Note the word speedily, in reality, if not in seeming.

> 'God never is before His time
> And never is behind.'

Our Lord closes with an impressive warning. Faith should be the faith—the faith of which He has spoken, the faith that prays, waits, expects. When the Son of Man cometh, to reveal Himself in all His love, and to answer His people's prayers, will He find that they have looked for Him thus?

> So when He came by his angel to deliver Peter from prison, Acts xii., it was not found that the church in Jerusalem really expected such a rescue. His gifts are still before our expectations, and beyond our hopes.

II. SECOND PARABLE: HUMILITY IN PRAYER. THE PHARISEE AND PUBLICAN.—Read vers. 9–14. Here, again, the lesson of the parable is given at the beginning. Certain who trusted in themselves, not precisely Pharisees, but professed disciples of Christ, or people generally in whom He discerned this spirit at work. Self-sufficiency exhibited in prayer is brought to the test and shown to be most hateful. A Pharisee, chosen as a type of those who were held in popular estimation among the best; a publican, or tax-gatherer, among the worst. They went up to the Temple, the building being in the higher part of the city. The Pharisee stood—the usual posture for public prayer. To sit in the Temple was forbidden. He prayed with himself. To utter such a prayer aloud would have required too great hardihood even for him! I thank Thee. Self-sufficiency in the form of thankfulness is most hateful, 'the pride that apes humility.'

---

* The word is originally taken from pugilistic encounters, 'strike beneath the eye:' hence 'pester,' 'annoy.' It is only once beside found in N. T: 'I keep under my body,' says the Apostle Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 27.

> Alford calls attention, by way of contrast, to the declaration of thankfulness in 1 Cor. xv. 10, 'also made by a Pharisee, and also on the ground that he was not as other men, but how different in its whole spirit and effect! There, in the deepest humility, he ascribes it to the grace of God that he laboured more abundantly than they all, "yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me."'

This Pharisee seeks Divine favour on the ground of his freedom from gross vices, which vices he freely attributes to other men, i.e., the rest of mankind, with a glance at the tax-gatherer, who had perhaps entered the Temple by his side. But it is evidently the ritual on which he most prides himself. The other claims are negative: this is positive religion. To what does it amount? I fast twice in the week—(Monday and Thursday) instead of once in the year, on the Day of Atonement, Lev. xvi. 29, Num. xxix. 7. I give tithes of all that I possess, or gain (not capital but income). This also was more than the law required, tithe being levied only on the fruit of the field, and the offspring of the cattle. So that what he relied on were works, works of outward service, works of supererogation ('more than sufficient')—a threefold mistake! So the Pharisee ceases 'praying' and yet there is not a word of prayer in it all! It is a boast from beginning to end, only the more offensive for the word of thankfulness with which it begins.

Now look at the Publican—First, his attitude, standing* afar off from the entrance to the Sanctuary, as unworthy to draw near; secondly, his action, smote upon his breast, expressing thus the agony which a sense of unworthiness had caused; and, thirdly, his prayer, God be merciful to me a sinner—literally, 'be propitious,' as if with some reference to the sacrifice through which suppliants approach to God: and 'the sinner,' singling himself out as the 'chief of sinners.'

> "Two went to pray: or, rather, say
> One went to brag, the other pray;
> One stands up close, and treads on high,
> Where th' other dares not send his eye:
> One nearer to the altar trod,
> The other to the altar's God."
> Crashaw.

Our Lord continues the contrast to the impressive close, showing us the two men as they went down to their respective homes. The publican was justified, i.e. freed from guilt and condemnation, not by the humility he had expressed, but by the mercy he had sought. The other had sought nothing, and so had found nothing. In fact, he was not justified at all. The moral of the whole implies that to be justified is to be truly exalted.

QUESTIONS.

1. Show that the Old Testament ideal of a good judge was one who feared God and regarded man.

2. Quote passages to show that in the times of the prophets the oppression of widows was a crying sin in Israel.

3. Illustrate the Golden Text from these two parables, showing especially how it expresses the urgency of true prayer.

4. Show from Scripture the different kinds of posture in prayer.

5. Prove from Christ's teaching that the Pharisees as a class were chargeable with the sins from which this Pharisee declares himself to be free.

6. What was the place of faith in the 'justification' of this Publican?

* There is a subtle difference in the form of the word used for the Pharisee—stood, and that employed for the Publican. In the former case it suggests that he had deliberately postured himself for prayer, in the other that he stood just where he happened to be, in an unstudied attitude.

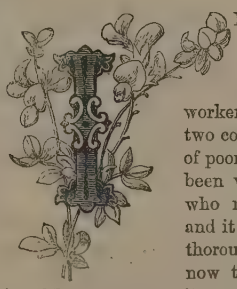
THE TWO NEIGHBOURS.

I.



IN one of the small suburbs of the city of Brussels, among streets of old-fashioned, low-roofed houses, occupied chiefly by poor lace-workers, there stood, some years since, two cottages, a little apart from these rows of poorer dwellings. One of the two had been vacant as long as Nicholas Heyse, who rented the other, could remember, and it had been suffered to fall into such thorough disrepair, that it seemed unlikely now that anyone would wish to tenant it. Master Heyse, it must be confessed, looked with some satisfaction on the decaying tenement, which stood by the side of his own neat dwelling; and this he did, less on account of the contrast the two presented, than because, so long as the cottage remained empty, he enjoyed the use of its small garden as well as his own. The frail paling which separated the two had long been broken down, and the house-owner had made no objection to his one remaining tenant cultivating both plots of ground.

Under these circumstances, therefore, the rumour that the cottage was about to be occupied again afforded but little pleasure to Heyse. He looked sourly on the men who were engaged in repairing it, put every possible hindrance in their way, and grumbled as much when a new, strong fence was put up to separate the two gardens as if by the separation he had been robbed of his own lawful property.

"I will take care that our new neighbours don't stop long when they come," said he angrily to his wife, on the evening of the day when the fence had been raised; "I won't be defrauded of my ground."

"But the garden wasn't our own, Nicholas," mildly remonstrated his wife; "you know we only expected to keep it so long as the house stood empty."

"I don't know any such thing," was the husband's hasty answer. "We had had it so long that it was as good as our own, and why need anyone have come asking after the place, when there are plenty of other cottages standing empty round about? I daresay the man thought I should have left the vegetables I have planted standing in the garden, but I hope I know better."

Frau Heyse did not venture a second remonstrance. She stood at all times a little in awe of her husband, and seldom offered to express an opinion which differed from his; she was, by nature, a gentle, timid woman, and cares and troubles of one kind and another had given her an habitually meek and subdued air, which contrasted strongly with the self-asserting and overbearing manner of her husband.

To all of his acquaintances who came to watch the progress of the improvements which were being made in the empty house, and to question him about the coming occupants, Nicholas gave short, indifferent answers, calculated to impress the questioners with the belief that he knew little, and cared less, about his new neighbours. But, in reality, this was far from being the case. There was no scrap of information respecting them too small to be eagerly picked up by him, and his wife became the reluctant recipient of all this news, and also of the ill-natured comments which her husband almost invariably appended to it.

At last the new neighbours took possession of their house, entirely ignorant of the offence they gave by so doing. Frau Heyse, knitting in hand, was standing at the door on the evening of their arrival, and watched with kindly interest the movements of the family.

"Come indoors, wife!" Heyse was heard to say, quite loudly and angrily, from the interior of the little parlour. "You have no call to stand watching those people; they are nothing to you or me either."

"I didn't speak a word to any of them, Nicholas," pleaded the wife, moving reluctantly away from her post of observation. "I only wanted to catch a sight of them. Poor things! they look pale and sickly enough."

"Yes, they have been living in one of the worst streets of the city, at least so Gunther the cobbler told me, and they have had a deal of illness there."

"Poor things!" repeated Frau Heyse reflectively; "I don't see how they will manage, for the father doesn't look anyway fit for work; I saw him leaning quite heavily on his son, as they went into the house."

"It's the son that keeps them all," answered Nicholas, imparting the latest information he had received respecting his neighbours, "and even he can't do much, for the fever laid hold of him, too, at the time his father sickened, and he had to give up his work."

"Then what does he do now?" asked the wife, with awakened curiosity.

"He has hired a dog, and made shift to buy a sort of cart. He picks up a good deal of money in the city by carrying parcels from one place to another. And now, wife, let us have supper," finished Nicholas, rather hastily, conscious that he was displaying more interest in his neighbours' affairs than was quite consistent with the reproof he had recently addressed to his wife.

The information which Gunther, the inquisitive and loquacious cobbler, had furnished to his friend the gardener respecting the newly-arrived family, was, in most respects, true. Paul Meyer, with his wife and children, had lived for years in the heart of Brussels, and had only been driven from his home by long-continued illness. His son Martin had earned good wages in a large lace manufactory, until sickness had laid him low also, and weakened him so much that the confinement his work necessitated was more than he could bear. Whilst seeking vainly for some easier employment, he had been advised to buy one of the powerful dogs which, in Brussels, are much used in place of ponies and asses, to draw light loads. No stranger passing through that beautiful city can fail to notice these strong, patient animals, as they trudge along the streets with their burden, or lie down to rest by the side of the roadway, in the hot days of summer. Martin could not afford to buy a dog, but he hired one, and prospered well in his new business, so well, indeed, that the family were enabled to leave their unhealthy dwelling in the crowded street and rent the small cottage which stood side by side with that of Nicholas Heyse, the gardener.

They had been there some weeks before either father or son suspected their neighbour of bearing any enmity towards them, but little by little the animosity showed itself.

One evening Martin came home from his work, looking vexed and troubled. "Is anything ailing the dog, my son?" asked the father a little anxiously.

"No, no, father, Count Egmont is well enough," answered the boy, caressing his huge favourite, "but I've been getting into trouble with Master Heyse on his account.

"How do you mean, Martin?"

"Why, father, he is restless and wakeful of nights, you see, and Master Heyse declares that he will get us turned away from the house, if we don't quiet him."

"I don't think Master Heyse has any good-will to us," said the mother, who was setting the supper-table.

"I don't like him at all," announced Ernst, the youngest boy, "for when I climbed up the fence the other day, to look at his beautiful tulips, he told me he would flog me, if ever I touched one of them. I didn't want to touch," added the child indignantly, "and I told him so, but he said he knew better."

"He kicked my cat, too," said little Clara plaintively.

"Come, children, that will do," said the father gently; "we shall not do ourselves any good by talking over other people's faults. Sit down to your supper, Martin, my son; you must be hungry after your hard day's work; and Ernst, do you fetch the Bible, and lift it on to my knee, and I will read to you how it tells us to act towards Master Heyse."

The little boy obeyed, and there was deep silence in the room as the father turned reverently, one by one, the leaves of the sacred book, and read, slowly and distinctly, the great command, "'Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father, which is in heaven.' Do you understand that, Ernst?" The child looked bewildered, but more from weariness than want of apprehension; his father, therefore, cut short his reply by a good-night kiss, and his mother carried him away to bed.

As the door closed behind them, Martin rose from the supper-table, and came to where his father was sitting.

"Father," he began, "I wan't to tell you about Master Heyse."

"But, my son, we shall only make ourselves angry if we begin to talk about his unkindness again."

"I don't want to talk of him at all, father, only I thought you would like to know the reason of his dislike to us."

"What is it, Martin?"

"He was allowed to use our garden as well as his own, so long as the house was empty, and he grudges it to us now."

"Ah! I see," assented old Paul meditatively, and Martin had to repeat the news for the benefit of his mother, who had just entered.

From this time forth the family lived in much dread of their exasperated neighbour, for Nicholas was known to be a determined and unscrupulous man, and certain threats which he had uttered respecting the Meyers hung like swords over the heads of these innocent objects of his wrath. Good old Paul never understood the meaning of such a word as retaliation, indeed he strove in every possible way to conciliate his neighbour; and Martin, although young and therefore liable to feel Master Heyse's injustice more keenly, and resent it more strongly than his father, seconded the old man's efforts. Often, after a long and exhausting day's work in the hot city streets, he would sit up far into the night, until Count Egmont slept so soundly that there was no danger of Nicholas being disturbed, but the object of all these kindnesses was obstinately insensible to them, and unwearying in his efforts to eject the Meyers from their home, and his ill-will at last found vent in such unprovoked acts of malice and uncharitableness that even his timid wife remonstrated strongly with him on their account.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

HOME. [Sir T. Lawrence.

THERE is a saying so familiar as to have passed into a popular proverb, that "Charity should begin at home." However this may be, there is a divine precept about piety, which is plain and easily understood, namely, that Piety should begin at home. The reference was first to filial duty, but reaches through all the relations of life. "Let them learn first to shew piety at home" (1 Tim. v. 4).

There are men, and still oftener women, who are ready to think they have a vocation, or a "mission" of some sort or other—in the church it may be, or in the school, or the hospital, or other public position. Perhaps some of them have such a call, but the apostle reminds us of other and earlier duties, and more imperatively demanding attention. These first, he said, those afterwards; "These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone." Paul would have had very little patience with the people who rush here and there to "services" to hear a favourite preacher—perhaps almost as little as if they had been hurrying hither and thither to hear a favourite singer—if the while there was a pile of work left undone at home, or left for other fingers wearied with work to do. And Paul's Master might be made angry (for angry He sometimes was) by the sight of effusive sympathy shed in sighs, and tears, and gold, over suffering strangers, while a pining sister "in weariness often" had to drag on many a lonely hour, perhaps in a sick-room, seldom cheered by the presence or loving help of those who are busy out of doors instead of first showing piety at home.

Each word of the text is suggestive of thought, and worthy of consideration. Let them learn: Home piety does not come of itself, nor is it always understood and practised, even by those who have long been professed Christians. There are many who never seem to have more than a smattering of it. It must be learnt in the school of Christ. The disciple must go to school to Jesus, we might almost say, with Jesus, at Nazareth where He was brought up, and beside the holy family; of which each believer may become a member, for He counts everyone that does the will of His Father, as His "brother, and sister, and mother." There and thus shall you "learn first to show piety at home."

Home piety must be learnt first: not last, as some seem to think graceful, outwardly at least, abroad, and really disgraceful at home: not even second, as many seem to fancy, less careful about prayer in the closet than in the sanctuary, about practice in the home than in the church. Home too often has the worst of the evil that is in us. It should have the first of the good, and if the first fruits be holy, the lump will be also holy. The life that is beautiful in flower in secret, will be beautiful in fruit in society. Home has a right to the first and best of everything from us, the right of relationship. Our nearest are there and our dearest. There dwell, or once dwelt, those who suffered most from us, and laboured most for us, and loved us best.

We are to show piety at home, not to show it in any ostentatious way of course, that would be the very last thing to be desired, the very opposite of the apostle's meaning. Those of whom he wrote delighted in display, but he wrote to correct them, to bring them back to simplicity and truth.

"To show" in fact is to be taken just in the sense in which we are once and again commanded to shine, to let what is in us be seen and manifested. But to show what? In its earliest and nearest sense piety denotes family affection, and conscience points out this as a principal part of piety in the larger meaning of the word. Yes, bind them together, bind them very closely, these two good words, these two sacred things—piety and home. It is at home that the purest breath of the Divine life is felt, and there the sweetest notes of the new song are heard.

What a little world home is to those whose lives are almost wholly spent there. It is a little world to all of us, but a great world to them—just their world, with its affections, its agitations, and, alas, its animosities; with its occasions of joy and sorrow, and, alas, of sin. "Family life," says Count de Gasparin, "claims every-day sacrifices; one of its excellences is that it inconveniences us, and subjects us to the discipline of self-renunciation. It gives much because it exacts something. Where a household will not consent to this sacrifice of personal convenience, where everyone gives himself up to his own passions, however legitimate, to his own plans, studies, and tastes, our preferences become a sort of article of faith, a sort of sacred ark, which no profane hand may touch without committing sacrilege." What scope this affords for the working of the good spirit, and, indeed, of the evil too; room enough for the practice of every piety—and of every impiety.

Let us think, also, what a glorious thing home is, especially our English home, for is it not almost a national institution, almost country-born? The French have not even a word for it. In no other country do the same associations belong to the idea of home and home life. To find its original, we must go back to patriarchal lands and to patriarchal times, to find it a place not merely for sleeping and eating but for living; for rest after toil, for joy after sorrow; and in sorrow too; "a refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat, when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall." The focus of affection, the meeting-place of many hearts and many joys, the castle, whether of the chieftain or the cottier, buttressed by love and fortified by confidence. All this and more, home is or may be; sad to think it ever should be anything else! But we may mar it or undervalue it, like any other blessing of God. And for the most part, even where the home is bereft of some of its beauty, there is something left to awaken pride and occasion joy. It is commonly the place in which men try to show the results of efforts and labour elsewhere. If they have one thing better than another, every right-minded man will feel home is the place to show it. And in this, we must not stop at material things of comfort or display; with pictures and works of art; nor with mere mental things, with tastes and accomplishments: we must add the moral and the spiritual. Some, indeed, have no spiritual to add, and little enough of the moral. And this place of peace and rest, as it should be, they disfigure with their sin. They trellise not jasmine but jealousy about the porch, and hang not myrtle but rue from the window.

The very opposite is what Paul, what God, requires of us. The contribution He would have each make, the offering He would have each lay on our altar and hearth, is Piety. That which is holy, so the word means, and such the contribution ought to be. The altar is holy, and so should the offering be. When the feet of the priests (and every parent is a priest) touch the threshold they should remember that the place whereon they stand is holy ground. When the hands of children mingle in work or in play, though their first thought of home may well be "it is a happy place," the second should be and will be, unless the ark of God has been taken, it is a holy place too. Piety, then, we define according to its derivation, that which is holy. This is the tree.

But "the tree is known by its fruit," and the fruit of the tree, "the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." As I read the list from Gal. v. 22, 23, my eye falls involuntarily on a very different list, in which I find such undesirable companions as "hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings and such like." But we will not speak of this evil inventory, we want yours to furnish only the good. And is there any place on earth better suited for their display than home? And is there anything on earth that would make home more beautiful than these virtues and graces of character and life?

Would to God we all liked always to show such "piety at home!" For if we did, all fathers would be fatherly (which they are not) and mothers motherly; brothers would never fail to be brotherly (as they now do fail), nor sisters sisterly. It were heresy to say that morality or amiability constitutes piety; but it is no heresy to say (unless Paul were a heretic when he wrote that letter to the Galatians) that amiability and morality are parts of piety and very important parts too.

But you will mistake the meaning utterly if you think it is enough to be always gentle, genial, docile to our superiors, and delightful to our equals. We want the root as well as the fruit. If the fruit be home virtues, the root is home holiness, even as the flower is the home happiness.

We have been standing among the fruits, let us go back, go down to the root; the root is holiness, the root is Christ. Show holiness at home, show Christ at home. Let the Christian husband show Christ by beginning and never failing to continue family prayers. We said the archetype of our English home is to be sought among the patriarchs; well, wherever they went we read, "there they builded an altar and called on the name of the Lord." Let the Christian wife show it by gathering her children, even if she cannot get her husband, and praying for him if she dare not pray with him. Let Christian sons and daughters show Christ, not only by the sweetness of their lives, but by words for Jesus, and work for Him. And let Christian servants show their piety by diligence and faithfulness, not with eye-service, but as in the sight of God. So, one and all, learn the divine secret, how to "show piety at home."

But what is the secret? The secret is Christ, and the Spirit of Christ. Did you not notice that those fruits, homely as they were, which we said even the mere moralist would confess to contain the very witchery of home happiness, were set down in Scripture, every one of them, as being the fruit of the Spirit? They are all traceable to God, and are never found in perfection where God is not found.

To show piety you must have it to show, and to have it you must have God first; you must be "partakers of the Divine nature," partakers of Christ. "Be filled with the Spirit," and you will be "filled with the fruit of righteousness." Let heaven be your home, and your home will be heaven. Then will our home life be Christ-like, when to us to live is Christ, and we shall show piety at home.

J. B. F.

THROUGH THE LINN.

CHAPTER VIII.—A GRAVE STEP.

IT seemed to Lettice that if her life lately had been in the black and shadowed pool, she had suddenly come out of it only to pass through another Linn. She stood at the foot of the bed, thus thinking, outwardly calm, with clasped hands, inwardly convulsed by a storm of passionate anger and anguish. The fierce rush of fretted waters was there, pent up between narrow rocks, threatening each moment to overflow. Yet for an hour Lettice thus remained, motionless except when from time to time shaken by intense trembling. Her eyes never stirred from the little sleeper's face; her hands never loosened their tight clasp. Violet slept on peacefully the while, with long dark lashes lying on the thin cheeks, and lips half-parted in a smile.

The candle flared up and flickered down, suddenly. Lettice had not known it was so near its end. Darkness if continued would soon wake Violet. She had always been used to sleep with a night-light, and this luxury Miss Temple allowed her, having a fellow-feeling on the subject. Lettice hastily moved to the table, and held a match to the expiring flame. She did not wish to leave the room in search of another candle, so she lighted the night-light. Then she came back to the bed-side, and hung over the child.

"My own little Violet! My one darling! The only thing I have in all the world belonging to me. Sweet one, she shall not separate us. I could not bear it, nor you either. It cannot—must not—shall not be."

But what could be done? How escape the separation? That consideration came after. The fixed resolution took place first.

"No—it cannot be," she murmured. "It shall not be. It would be too cruel—too terrible. Life without Violet would be worse than death. I should have nothing to do, nothing to live for. And Violet could not get on without me. She would pine away, like a little flower. No one knows how frail she is. If Selina Temple knew, I do not believe she would wish this—or if she knew half how we love one another. And it cannot, cannot be God's will. Miss Temple's will,—but not God's will."

A rash decision, for how did she know? How often it is God's will that the dearest ties should be wrenched asunder, just because they are so dear that they shut off the heart from God. In very tenderness and pity, how can He leave the poor heart to freeze and die in the outer darkness of separation from Himself? In very love He sends the severing stroke which sets the wanderer free to come back into the sunshine of His smile.

Lettice sat down by the table, and sank into deep thought. How long it lasted she knew not, cared not. Minutes passed, and half-hours, and hours, and she grew cramped and cold, yet still she did not stir. The striking of the clock she heard as in a dream, from time to time, but she did not count the strokes. When a single stroke sounded she lifted her head, and shivered, with a dim momentary smile, but remained where she was. All energy to move seemed to have forsaken her.

Energy to think and feel remained. Through those silent night-hours, Lettice's mind was busily at work. She did not pray for help, or seek God's guidance. She only revolved scheme after scheme, thinking this, weighing that, wondering how one or another plan would work. And through it all remained one resolution, fixed and strong, "We will not be parted."

Morning came, and Lettice had not been in bed. As the light of dawn crept through her venetians, she rose and undressed slowly, that Violet might not discover the fact. She even lay down beside Violet for half-an-hour, and then again dressed herself, Violet, just awake, watching her with sleepy eyes. A restlessness was on her which made repose impossible.

"Lettice, you do look so tired this morning," the child said.

"Do I, darling? I was a little worried last night, by something Miss Temple said. But never mind; it will all come right."

Violet gazed wistfully, asking no questions. Miss Temple met them both with unusual kindness at breakfast-time. She did not wish to appear hard, and was really sorry to see the signs of suffering in Lettice's face. Once she took an opportunity to say to her softly, "I see you are acting wisely and rightly. You have told Violet in a way that has not made her cry."

"I have not told Violet."

"Not told her!"

"No, not yet. Please leave that to me."

"Very well—but it must be done soon."

Lettice pressed her lips together, and turned away.

The day passed much as other days passed, though Violet's eyes many times sought her sister's set pale face, in wondering suspense as to the thoughts beneath. Lettice tended her and read to her as usual, but gave no hint. In the middle of the day she went out for an hour, but briefly declined Miss Temple's companionship, seemingly indifferent to offence given. In the afternoon she disappeared for a considerable time, and when on her return questioned by Miss Temple she said curtly that "she had been upstairs."

"Where, Lettice?"

"In my room."

"Very cold for you there. What were you doing?"

"Arranging some of my things."

Miss Temple could not make her out. There was a suppressed glitter of excitement in the grey eyes which caused Miss Temple a vague sense of uneasiness. But what more could be said?

"I hope you will be in bed in good time to-night," she remarked. "Susan tells me your candle was quite burnt down this morning, and you had a good length. Your face shows want of sleep to-day. I shall be out this evening, you know, dining at the Hall."

Yes, Lettice knew that and calculated on it. She merely answered, "Susan should attend to her own concerns."

"You forget yourself, Lettice. If I ask her, she is right to answer, and candles have gone very fast lately. I could not understand it."

The matter dropped there, and an hour later Miss Temple went to dress for her dinner-party. Preparations for an evening out were always a serious matter with her. More than another hour passed before she was ready to start; but at length the rustling blue silk vanished, the fly wheels rumbled quickly into the distance, and the sisters were left alone with Lady Bartlett.

Lettice said nothing then, though she could have done so safely under cover of the old lady's deafness. Tea took place soon, and after tea Violet usually remained for half-an-hour in the drawing-room. Lettice made no change in this plan. She even lengthened the half-hour to three-quarters of an hour. Lady Bartlett talked of retiring early, as she always loved to do when her niece was absent; and presently a general move was made.

"I am glad we are upstairs. I am so sleepy," sighed Violet.

Lettice's answer was to wrap round her a thick shawl, and to lay her on the bed.

"Now, my darling, keep quiet and listen to me," she said, in a low quick tone. "I have something to tell you, and you must be good, and not cry or call out. We must be quite quiet, or I cannot do what I want to do."

"Yes, Lettice, I'll be quiet," promised the child. "What is it?"

"Miss Temple wants to separate us. Don't cry or be frightened, for I will not allow it. She wants to send you to school in London, quite away from me. You could not bear it, could you, my precious?"

"Oh, Lettice! Oh no!" Though quiet, as she had said, the two little hands clasped Lettice tightly, and the lips grew white, and the chest heaved.

"We have no one but one another in all the world. It would be cruel, cruel work to be parted. My darling, I want to save you from the pain of it, if I can. Will you be content to leave Miss Temple and Brentwood, and come away with me—away from everybody?"

"Where, Lettice? Oh yes, I would go anywhere with you. I don't mind leaving Miss Temple. Shall we go back to dear Aunt Jeannie?"

Lettice shook her head. "No, that will not do. Aunt Jeannie would write directly to Miss Temple, and would say we ought to submit. But I cannot submit."

Violet looked wistfully into her face. "It would be very hard," she said slowly. "But, Lettice, darling—suppose—suppose we really ought—suppose God wishes it——"

"God does not—He cannot," said Lettice, low and passionately. "I do not believe it for a moment. Violet, could you bear the parting?—for I could not. I think it would break my heart to feel that you did not mind."

Violet's answer was a flood of tears, and Lettice saw she had gone too far. She soothed and caressed the child for some minutes, and then whispered,

"Say—what shall it be? School, or a home with me?"

"O Lettice, a home with you, please. Oh no, I couldn't bear to leave you, and school would be dreadful," sobbed the timid child. "Lettice, my head does ache so."

"It will be better presently. You are not going to be ill just now, my pet. We have a long journey before us. If we don't get off to-night, we may not have a chance. There is a train leaving for London in another hour from now. I have put together as many things as I could in my small portmanteau and hand-bag. I can carry the portmanteau, and you shall carry the hand-bag. The difficulty is to get out of the house unseen. But we shall manage it—only you must keep quite quiet and good, and not cry."

"But you have no money," said the trembling Violet.

"Yes, I have. I went to that little jeweller's this afternoon, where it is put up in the window that they buy old trinkets—and I sold my brooches and bracelets."

"All?"

"Not quite. He would not give me much for each, so I had to part with a good many. I have two or three left."

Violet asked no more questions. She allowed Lettice to wash her hands and face, and to dress her warmly, as for a walk. Once she said wistfully,

"Is it right?"

"Think, Violet: can you make up your mind to the other?" said Lettice.

Violet sighed a long quivering sigh, and hesitated no longer.

Little time remained. Lady Bartlett was gone to bed, one servant being with her, and the rest in the kitchen. Still, there was risk of detection, since one of them might at any moment, or in any part of the house, be encountered.

Lettice did not put on her own hat and jacket till the last moment. She went down first, and unbolted and unlatched the front door. Then a second time, trembling and hastening like a guilty creature, she came down with the little portmanteau. It was heavily packed, yet in her excitement she made nothing of the weight. Hurrying through the door, she carried it to the darkest side of the house, and deposited it among some bushes.

Indoors again, moving quickly and tremulously still; jacket and hat were rapidly donned, and a warm shawl was wrapped round Violet's shoulders—for her own comfort she thought little. Then, taking the small bag in one hand, and leading Violet out of the bedroom, she gently locked the door, and put the key into her pocket.

Now was the moment of risk. If they were seen, all was over. It was not easy to walk softly in their out-of-door boots, yet they did so. A servant crossed the hall below, and Lettice's heart stood still. What if the unlocked condition of the front door should be discovered? What if the girl should come upstairs?

No—she passed into the kitchen, and Lettice heard the welcome swing of the green baize-covered door. Then, holding Violet's hand, she passed swiftly down the flight, and out of the front door, shutting it behind her as noiselessly as might be.

Violet gave a sharp shiver at the touch of the night-breeze.

"Are you cold?" whispered Lettice. "Never mind, it will be warmer in the train."

She went for the portmanteau, and took it in her right hand, having Violet clinging to her left arm.

"Now for the station! We must go by the lane, darling. No chance of being seen there. We have only just time, I am afraid."

Violet grew breathless, but they pressed on. Miss Temple's clocks were given to lagging, and when they reached the station Lettice saw that there was not a moment to be lost. She put down the portmanteau beside Violet, and rushed for the tickets. Coming back to take it up, she was anticipated by a porter. He asked,

"Where for, miss?"

"London. Never mind about having it labelled. I can take it with me in the carriage."

The man, knowing them well by sight, looked at them in some perplexity, struck, as anyone might have been, by Lettice's suppressed excitement; but he did not venture to say anything. She was already leading the way to the train, and he followed.

"Just going to start, miss. Second class?—this way. It will be a cold night."

He shoved the portmanteau under the seat, helped Violet up the long step, and touched his cap in return for a couple of pence put into his hand. Then the door slammed, the whistle sounded, and they were off.

Ay, they were off; a pair of homeless friendless orphans, cast adrift upon the wide world! And in that moment it came over Lettice what she had done. The terrible and reckless nature of the step she had taken stood out before her in blank bare reality. No one was with her in the carriage save the timid child cowering in the corner. Lettice sat upright in her seat, and gasped aloud with the sense of lonely fearful oppression. Orphans—friendless—homeless—soon maybe, to be penniless also? What had she done? What had she been thinking about? Was this indeed God's will for them?

Violet crept closer to her.

"Lettice, it feels strange. I don't like it. I wish we were at home. I wish we had not come."

Did not Lettice wish the same at that moment? She began to think seriously whether even now it might not be best to get out at the next station, and to go back by the first return-train. Had a station occurred immediately she would probably have done so, but it lay far ahead. She had time to think, time to recover from the first keen sense of unprotectedness, time to picture the manner of reception likely if she did return. Pride rose indignantly against the thought of the position in which she would find herself. Then, too, came rolling in upon her mind a realisation of all that must follow—of Violet pining for her in loneliness and weakness among strangers—of the dreariness of her own life, with none at hand who loved her. And Lettice's heart cried out wildly, "Anything rather than that!" and in the sudden revulsion, her wavering determination gained double strength.

"It will not feel so strange in a little while, Violet; it is only just at first," she said calmly. "Come and sit on my lap, and you will soon feel warm. I have some biscuits here for you to eat presently. How do you feel now?"

Violet sighed, "I should like to be in bed; I am so tired;" she said. "Where are we going?"

Lettice considered before answering. She had taken tickets to London, but it occurred to her that by going there she would run some risk of being stopped. What if Miss Temple went to their room on her return, and discovered that they were gone? Nothing would be easier than to enquire at the station whither they had booked, and to send a telegram that they must be met on arrival. If Miss Temple returned early, as was likely, a telegram could reach London before Violet and herself.

"I was thinking, darling," she said, as the question was repeated. "I want to go to Brighton, and I did think of going through London. But there is another earlier station where we can change trains, and get across to Brighton by another line of rail, without going to London at all. I think I shall do that, though it will cost a little more, for they cannot possibly trace us then!"

"Are we going to Brighton?" Violet asked.

"Yes,—you know we have been there twice in old days, so it will not seem quite strange to us. I think I might get work to do in some of the shops where we used to buy things. And I mean to paint pretty flower and text cards, and to make money that way. We shall not spend much, you know, just we two. Of course I could part with my remaining brooches, so as to help us on till I find work—or even my watch and chain, but I should be very very sorry to do that."

"And shall we get to Brighton soon?"

"I am afraid not till past nine to-morrow morning. We have a long time to wait at one or two stations, going this way. I shall wrap you up in shawls, and make you go to sleep on a waiting-room sofa. When we get to Brighton I can leave you in the waiting-room, while I look out for lodgings—the cheapest I can find—or if you are not too tired we can go together."

"Oh yes—I would rather keep with you."

Violet was satisfied with these plans, little dreaming, poor child, how different a matter was that finding of regular work from the easy thing of course which she and Lettice supposed. The two were not ill-matched in their ignorance of life, beyond one simple phase of it. She curled herself up in Lettice's arms, and slept peacefully. Lettice, despite her previous wakeful night, had never been farther from sleep in her life. Unused to travelling, the fear of passing the junction where they had to change would of itself have sufficed to keep her awake; but apart from that repose was impossible. Though her determination faltered no more, she was oppressed by a sense of deep distress and loneliness and humiliation. But for Violet, she could have wept beneath it like a very child.

Miss Temple came home late, and did not go to the girls' room. She remarked to Susan, "I suppose Miss Majendie has gone to bed?" and was satisfied with Susan's answer, "Oh yes, ma'am, I tapped to ask if Miss Majendie wouldn't have any supper, and the door was locked, and I got no answer, so I suppose they was both asleep."

Whereupon Miss Temple went to bed herself, and thought no more about the matter.

Coming down to breakfast next morning, she found that Lettice had not yet appeared; an uncommon occurrence, for Lettice was a girl of early and punctual habits. She waited five minutes, had the bell rung a second time, and then sent Susan with a reminder. Susan reappeared after some delay, looking perplexed.

"If you please, ma'am, I can't make Miss Majendie hear. She must be oversleeping herself, and Miss Violet too."

"Oversleeping themselves at this time of day! Nonsense, Susan,—quite impossible. I dare say they are talking and laughing, and did not hear you. Knock again, and knock louder. Tell Miss Majendie I wish her to come down immediately. The coffee will be quite cold."

Susan disappeared anew, and in due time returned, looking almost pale. She had knocked in vain, and called in vain, and the young ladies certainly were not talking and laughing, for she could not hear a sound within. For the matter of that, she might have added what she had in her mind, that the young ladies never did talk and laugh like other young ladies.

"Extraordinary!" said Miss Temple, and she proceeded upstairs forthwith. The locked door would yield to no handle-turning and pushing. Miss Temple tried that first; then from rapping she advanced to hammering, from speaking to shouting, and from annoyance to genuine alarm.

"Something must be very wrong, Susan. What can it be? They cannot both be taken ill, surely. Miss Violet is a light sleeper, and would be roused to a certainty. What shall we do? Get help, pray,—or suggest something."

"I'll call cook, ma'am—and Andrew."

The rest of the household—cook, housemaid, and gardener—speedily appeared. Lady Bartlett's voice was heard calling queries from her own apartment, but no one had time to attend to her.

"The door must be broken open, Andrew, at once. Can you do it, or shall we send for the locksmith. Dear, dear me, what a thing it is, to be sure, to have charge of other people's children!"

Andrew proved equal to the occasion. He drew out two or three screws, and then, in response to Miss Temple's impatience, tried rougher measures. The door was weak and his muscles were strong. There was a crash, a creaking of woodwork yielding to pressure, and the way was barred to them no longer.

No one within! That fact became in one moment plain.

Miss Temple saw and understood. She gave one horrified stare round, and then rushed frantically to Lady Bartlett's room.

"Aunt Letitia—Aunt Letitia! What shall we do?—what can be done? Those miserable girls—they are actually gone—gone—fled—run away. The disgrace—the disgrace of it—what will be thought of me? I am sure if I had known—but who could have guessed—and Vandal approved. Aunt, what can be done? Do tell me—do help me. I feel quite ill—quite upset."

"My dear, I really do not understand what is the matter," said the trembling Lady Bartlett. "I wish you could tell me more gently, my dear, for you do agitate me so. I shall not get over it for hours. Did you say the cook had run away? I don't know why she should, for she has a most comfortable place?"

"Lettice Majendie!" shrieked Miss Temple. "Lettice Majendie has run away, taking Violet with her. Lettice Majendie—ungrateful miserable girl—without a penny of her own. Why, they will be starved—they will get into bad hands,—they will be ruined. There is no knowing what may not happen to them. And think what will be said of me? Merely because I wished to send the child to school for a few months. But who will believe a girl could act so insanely, for no greater reason? I shall have all sorts of things said of me. I always did think there was something thoroughly bad about that girl—locking her door too in such an underhand deceitful way. What shall I do, aunt? What shall I do? What can be done?"

"Send for Vandal, my dear," feebly suggested the overwhelmed Lady Bartlett, as her niece's excitement threatened to culminate in a fit of hysterics.

"Vandal! To be sure, the very thing," she cried, relieved. "How came I not to think of him at once? I will go to him directly."

"Hadn't you better look through the house first, my dear? They might be in some other room?"

"What! and leave their own door locked? But I'll tell Susan to look, while I am dressing."

The search proved vain, and Miss Temple, with bonnet-strings and necktie in an unwonted state of disorganisation, was soon hurrying at full speed through the streets. Reaching her brother's house, she burst, unannounced, into his breakfast-room, paralysing him with her tidings in the midst of eating an egg, the bottom of which he never saw. Another mouthful became impossible. He sat with suspended egg-spoon and parted lips, listening to her outpoured narration, and striving to gain a clear idea of the state of affairs. At the first pause, when it became possible to utter a word, he said, "We must act, not talk."

"But, Vandal, what can we do? That ungrateful girl—heartless—wicked—after all I have done for her—why, they will die of starvation. And think what will be said. Everyone will suppose I have driven her to it."

"That is of minor importance. The question is how we are to rescue the children—poor silly things."

"Silly, yes—and worse than silly—but if I said so you would cry out upon me for hardheartedness. Minor importance, is it—yes, I dare say, to you. It isn't of minor importance to me, I can tell you. Would you advise me to telegraph or anything, Vandal? What shall you do?"

"Go to the station first, to make enquiries."

The fire was left untouched for once, and not even the chair upon which he sat was put back against the wall. In less time than Miss Temple could have believed possible with one of his slow habits, he was hurrying along the street towards the station. Though generally a most deliberate walker, he now went at a pace which she found it hard to rival.

They had not far to search for information. In the booking-office they learnt at once that Miss Majendie had taken two single tickets to London by the evening train, or rather one whole and one half ticket. The porter, who had carried the portmanteau for Lettice, supplied further particulars. No doubt remained as to the fact of their departure.

"I thought somehow, sir, things didn't seem right," the man remarked, looking at the two troubled faces before him. "But what could I do, sir? The young lady seemed quite determined, and to know all about it."

"You did your duty, you could do no more," Vandal responded, turning away. "Now, Selina——"

"Determined!" repeated Miss Temple. "Yes, that is Lettice all over, just bent upon her own way, and caring for nothing and nobody else. She is mad, Vandal, I do firmly believe—stark staring mad."

"There is nothing for it," announced Vandal, with a deep sigh of resignation. "I must go to London."

"You, brother?"

"I!"

"To London! Now!"

"Now, immediately. Strange,—with my horror of travelling,—the second time it is needful. But my duty is plain. The children must be rescued."

"I should not know what to do if I went," said Miss Temple.

"No, no, it must be I, not you. If this fails we can advertise, but whether Lettice will see any papers—— I am going to telegraph now to Mrs. Canynge."

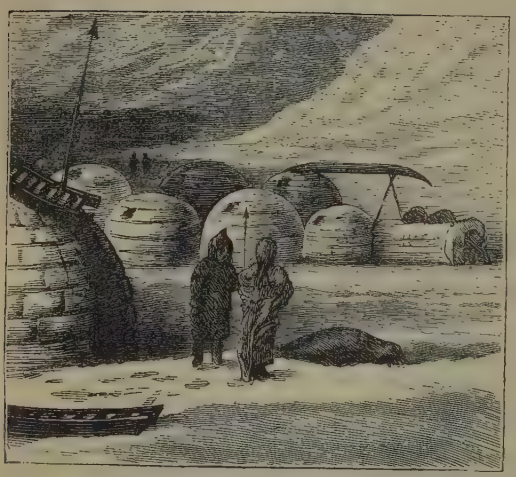
"Mrs. Canynge! The vicar's wife! To be sure. I never thought of her. Lettice is certain to go there. I wonder it never occurred to me. Mrs. Canynge is too sensible a person to support her in rebellion."

"That is it! I wish I could think Lettice would go there. I shall telegraph, but I shall not wait for a return telegram. It would be wasting precious time. The London train starts in an hour and a half,—just time to make preparations."

He made them, and went by the said train, throwing himself into the breach heroically as any Roman of old. During the two days of his absence Miss Temple did much in the way of talk, and made out the best possible case for herself in Brentwood. Some shook their heads dubiously behind her back, notwithstanding, and no one was more concerned than the Temples of the Hall, or more grieved than Brena.

For Vandal's efforts were ineffectual. All traces of the missing pair were lost before he reached London. He sought, enquired, advertised, but in vain. Lettice and Violet Majendie appeared to have slipped as completely out of the little Brentwood world as if they had never been known there.

THE ESQUIMAUX.



THANKS to the numerous accounts of voyages devoted to the exploring of the polar regions, there is not, perhaps, one amongst our readers who does not know the names of Greenland and Labrador, and of their inhabitants, the Esquimaux. Some of these Esquimaux were lately induced to come into Europe for the purpose of showing themselves in public, in the principal towns of Germany and France under the care of an enterprising Hamburger, M. Hagenbeck, who, like our Mr. Jamrach and others, is a furnisher of the zoological gardens of Europe, and proprietor of a large menagerie. And a French visitor has given an account of them, with his own reflections, in the "Petit Glaneur."

We have had in Europe of late years, Red Indians, Zulu Caffres, Laplanders, and other natives of remote regions exhibited in public. While the motive in bringing them has been merely that of commercial gain, opportunity has been given to "stay-at-home travellers" to see the appearance and habits of strange people. None of these have more interest for readers of missionary reports or books of ordinary travel than these Esquimaux from the far North. A Christian friend who saw them last year at Berlin, gave the following description of them.

Here are presented to our attention in the first place the huts of turf; tents of the skins of whales; a cabin, whence howl some dogs resembling wolves; a small pond, on which is seen a single boat (a kajak) like a canoe for one person, covered with a skin pierced by a hole, through which the Esquimaux passes his body; lastly, some tackle for the chase or for fishing—things that give to the public an idea of the encampment of the Esquimaux of the polar regions. Soon afterwards the Esquimaux themselves appear out of their huts and devote themselves to various exercises, intended to supply the chase and fishing, as practised in their country.

There are eight of them: in the first place a family, comprising the husband, named Terrianiak (which signifies a fox), his wife Pangu (a malady of the country), and a child; a second family, consisting of four persons, the husband, named Abraham, his wife Ulrike, a little daughter of three years of age, named Sarah, and a nurse. This family is accompanied by a young man called Tobias.

But what a difference among these eight Esquimaux all coming from the same country! It does not fail to strike the most superficial observers; in Terrianiak and his companions, the hair in disorder, dirt, eyes without expression, a stupid and savage look; in Abraham and his family, an open expression, frank and sympathetic, a manner of living that contrasts singularly with that of the other family. Even the workmen of the Zoological Gardens find this difference, and one of them has rendered to Abraham this compliment: "What an honest and trustworthy man Abraham is!"

A celebrated professor of Berlin, M. Virchow, gave a public conference to which he caused all these Esquimaux to come, and in exhibiting Abraham and his group, he exclaimed, "See, gentlemen, what civilisation can do for the most degraded people." This learned man has not given the right word. What has civilised these Esquimaux is the Gospel of Jesus Christ, announced to them by the Moravian missionaries, and which they have received into their hearts by faith. Abraham and his people have become Christians after being pagans, the other father and his wife remain pagans. By this, and not by anything else, comes all the difference between them.

Ah! they who think that evangelistic missions among pagan people are of no use, have here by a palpable fact a proof that the Gospel, which is the power of God for the salvation of every man that believes, is also the most powerful agent of civilisation. Amidst the noisy and inquisitive crowd indulging in the novel spectacle which these children of the North present to them, we witnessed a different scene in their hut. Abraham's eyes gleam with joy. In one of these visitors he has recognised an old missionary of Labrador, who was formerly his pastor. Now, retired in Europe, and knowing the arrival of this Christian family of Esquimaux at the Zoological Gardens, he is come to speak with them in the language of their native country concerning the interest of their souls. Very soon Abraham's face became a little clouded by hearing the missionary tell him in his own language: "The chief men of the mission are very sorry to learn that you have been so unwise as to come here, where you cannot do any good, but they salute you cordially as brothers, and exhort you to conduct yourselves as Christians and to remain faithful to the Saviour." Abraham expected to hear some other reproofs, but no more were made to him. His conscience had spoken, and that was sufficient. We shall perceive his impressions and his feelings in this respect in a letter which he wrote shortly afterwards to a missionary, and which we shall presently produce.

During three hours, interrupted from time to time by the necessity in which the Esquimaux were placed of showing themselves in public, the visitors were able to converse with them; and in the hut, lighted by the glimmering flame of a small oil lamp, these natives of Labrador have been able to bend their knees together in prayer, to sing hymns and place themselves under the protection of the Good Shepherd as sheep exposed to so many dangers.

ESQUIMAUX SLEDGE.

It was a great comfort and enjoyment for these good Esquimaux to find in a foreign land friendly hearts testifying in different ways a brotherly interest. Many members of the Church of Berlin obtained permission to enter into the enclosure of the Esquimaux, and were able to assemble on many occasions with them in their hut. In considering only the exterior, what in common can there be between these civilised Europeans and these Esquimaux, short, beardless, broad-shouldered, with the head large, the face flat, projecting cheeks, the lower lip thick, small eyes, brown visage, and straight hair? And yet there they are, these Christians, hand in hand, singing each one in his language, the same verses of hymns, united in the same sentiment of love the one for the other. One single word is equally understood by all, the name of Jesus, which Abraham repeats raising his hand towards heaven, and at this name a ray of celestial joy illumines his countenance.

Oh! the power of this adorable name, which breaks down all barriers and unites by ties of fraternal love men most different by race and by education. In this, wrote the apostle Paul to the Colossians, "there is neither barbarian nor Scythian, neither bond nor free, but Christ is all in all."

On two occasions, the one at the commencement, and the other at the end of their abode at Berlin, our Esquimaux Christians obtained permission to go to a Christian communion amongst the Moravian brethren, one of the branches of Protestantism, and that to which belong the missionaries who carried the Gospel to Labrador. A numerous assembly is in expectation. At last the door opens, and introduced by the old missionary, Abraham, his wife Ulrike, carrying in her arms the little Sarah, and Tobias make their entrance. The emotion is general; they silently and modestly take their places and with clasped hands and downcast heads seat themselves. When the assembly sings one of those same melodies which they have themselves so many times sung in their native country, a ray of joy illumines their faces. A choir had been arranged in honour of these guests. "It is almost as pleasant as at Hebron" (the village and missionary station at Labrador), said Abraham. After an exhortation, and a prayer, on their knees, which the old missionary made in their language, they said themselves the Lord's Prayer and sang several hymns.

At their second visit to the Moravian church, which was to be the last, on account of their approaching departure from Berlin, towards the end of the feast Abraham, with smiling eyes and profoundly happy mien, holds forth to the missionary and lays on the table a piece of gold, pronouncing with much emphasis this word: "Missions." Tobias in his turn following the example, searches in his pocket for some pieces of silver, and joyously places them by the side of the offering of Abraham, and repeats the same word. What an interesting spectacle; and what a testimony to the work of evangelising missions among the pagans; but also what a lesson for European Christians, for the poor not less than for the rich!

Here is the letter which Abraham wrote to the missionary Elsner of Labrador, now in Europe:

"My dear Master,

"I am writing to you because I wish to relate to you what follows. We are very unhappy. When they first wanted to take us to Europe, I refused at first, but I very much desired of the Lord to show me if I was really committing an error, for I believe all his words. As I could hardly think by working in my kajak of being able to pay my debts and my dear father's too, I thought I might make some money by this opportunity. I also said to myself that I might see you. Then I said, 'This is the way of the Lord.' We very much cried, my wife and I, as well as my friends, but no one kept us back. Not that I was tired of my masters, but I wished to pay my debts. I did not act heedlessly, but I had a great desire to see Europe, and the churches there. I waited in vain to be told about Jesus. Before the visit of the missionary, we had only thoughtless people in our house and we prayed to God that He might deign to preserve us still wheresoever we must go . . . . We have been ill, besides suffering much from home-sickness. But, certainly we must have learnt something by our experience. Do not be afraid that after our return home we shall teach bad customs to our fellow-countrymen. I have already learnt that objects of commerce must make a long voyage before they reach us, which raises their price very much; also that the journeys which our masters make are very dangerous. We salute you all with great love, you, your relatives, and the believers who are with you.

"Abraham, Husband of Ulrike."

We are sorry to learn from the latest "Periodical Accounts" of the Moravian missions, that all these poor Esquimaux are dead, the last dying in the Jardin d'Acclimatation in Paris, where their huts and property may still be seen; a melancholy memorial.

After having been exhibited in the Zoological Gardens in Berlin, they were taken to other towns in Germany, and appear soon to have come to the conclusion that they had made a great mistake in coming over to Europe for the sake of making money. At Darmstadt one of the company, a girl of fifteen, daughter of the heathen Terrianiak, from Nachvak in Labrador, died after a very brief illness. At Crefeld three more persons died, and the medical men who attended them, although doubtful as to the cause of their death, appear to have suspected a form of small-pox. At Paris the survivors were twice vaccinated, but without effect, and in a few days all were dead. Of their last days we have no record, and it is sad to think of these poor strangers dying in the hospital, with no one near to speak to them in their own language. The following letter, written by Abraham, to his old missionary, Br. Elsner, now living at Bremen, who had visited them in Berlin, is satisfactory as showing that there was comfort for some of them in the prospect of death, and it is pleasing to see that the heathen Terrianiak was not without some desire to belong to the Saviour.

"Paris, January 8th, 1881.

"My dear teacher Elsner,

"I write to you very sadly, and am much troubled about my relatives, for my child, which I was so fond of, lives no more: she has died of the bad small-pox after being ill for four days only. By our child's death my wife and I are strongly reminded that we too must die. It died in Crefeld, although many doctors saw it. These men indeed can do nothing, so we will above all look to Jesus, who died for us, as our Physician. My dear teacher Elsner, we kneel daily before Him, and ask Him to pardon us for coming over here; and do not doubt that He will hear our prayer. Every day we weep together for the pardon of our sins through our Lord Jesus Christ. Even Terrianiak, who is now alone [his wife and child had died], when I speak to him about conversion, tells me—I think with sincerity—he desires to belong to our Saviour. He joins us daily at prayers, as also our little Maria. But her life is in danger, for her face is much swollen. Tobias [the young man of the company, not related to any of them] is very ill. I remember that Jesus alone can help us in the hour of death. Yes, indeed, He is with us everywhere. I wish I could tell my people beyond the sea, how kind the Lord is. Our master buys much medicine for us, but all seems useless; I hope in the Lord, who sees my tears daily. I care not for worldly advantage; but I do long to see my friends once more, and, as long as I live, to speak to them of the name of the Lord. I did not formerly understand these things; now I do. My tears come often, but the words, which He has spoken, always bring me fresh comfort. My dear teacher Elsner, pray for us that this sickness be removed, if it be His will; but His will be done. I am a poor man, like the dust.

"It is very cold in Paris, but our master is now very kind to all of us. I salute you, so does my wife; and with you the members of the Church at Bremen. Tell the great teachers [the Directing Board] that we salute them very much. The Lord be with you all. Amen."

The Duke of Argyll, in a recent article in the "Contemporary Review" (March) on "The Unity of Nature," has some interesting remarks about the Esquimaux, or Eskimos as some call them:

"Although essentially uncivilised, he is not, in the ordinary sense of the word, a savage. Many of the characteristics usually associated with that word are altogether wanting in the Eskimo. They are a gentle, inoffensive, hospitable, and truthful race. They are, therefore, a conspicuous example of the fallacy of supposing that there is any necessary connection between a backward condition of knowledge in the useful arts, and violent dispositions, or ferocious and cruel habits. Men are not necessarily savage because they may use flint hatchets, or because they may point their arrows and their spears with bone. Nevertheless, the condition of the Eskimo, although not savage, is almost the type of the merely uncivilised condition of Mankind. It is a condition in which not more than a few families can ever live together, and in which therefore large communities cannot be formed. A few simple and some very curious rules of ownership are all that can represent among them the great lawgiving instinct which lives in Man. Agriculture cannot be practised, nor even the pasturing of flocks and herds. Without fuel, beyond the oil which feeds their feeble lamps, or a few stray logs of drift timber, the Eskimo can have no access to the metals, which in such a country could not be reduced from their ores, even if these ores were themselves obtainable. The useful arts are, therefore, strictly limited to the devising and making of canoes and of weapons of the chase. There is no domestic animal except the dog, and dogs too, like their masters, must have been brought from elsewhere. These are all conditions which exclude the first elements of what we understand by civilisation. But every one of these conditions must have been different with the progenitors of the Eskimo. If they were immigrants into the regions within the Arctic Circle, they must have come from the more temperate regions of the South. They must have been surrounded there by all the natural advantages of which their descendants are now deprived. To what extent these ancestors of the Eskimo may have profited by their very different and more favoured position, we cannot know. They may have practised such simple agriculture as was practised by the most ancient races which have left their traces in the Swiss Lake dwellings. They may have been nomads, living on their flocks and herds, as the Laplanders and Siberians actually are who in the Old World live in latitudes only a little farther south. They may have been people who, like the ancient but unknown Mound-builders in the Southern and Western States of America, had developed a comparatively high civilisation. But one thing is certain, that they must have lived a life wholly different from the life of the Eskimo, and that they must have had completely different habits. Whatever arts the father knew, suited to more genial climates, could not fail to be forgotten by the children, in a country where the practice of them was impossible."

The object of the Duke of Argyll is to show that in these children of the far north, as also in the people of Tierra del Fuego in the extreme south, we have races who had been driven from more genial lands, partly by hunger, and probably to escape massacre by warlike tribes. These outlying groups of the human family have been driven to their present places and habits in the struggle for existence.

"The northern extremity of the American continent presents exactly the same problem as the southern. If it is impossible to suppose that man was first created, or born, or developed in Tierra del Fuego, it is not less impossible to suppose that he made his first appearance on the frozen shores of Baffin's Bay. Watching at the blow-hole of a seal for many hours in a temperature 75° below the freezing point, is the constant work of the Inuit hunter. And when at last his prey is struck, it is his greatest luxury to feast upon the raw blood and blubber. To civilised man it is hardly possible to conceive a life so wretched, and in some aspects at least so brutal, as the life led by this race during the continual night of the Arctic winter. Not even the most extravagant theorist as regards the possible plurality of human origins can believe that there was a separate Eskimo Adam. Man, therefore, is as certainly an immigrant into the dreary regions round the Pole as he is an immigrant into the desolations of Cape Horn. But the whole conditions of his life there are necessarily determined by the rigours of the climate. They are conditions in which civilisation, as it has been here defined, is impossible. And the importance of that definition is singularly apparent in the case of the Eskimo."

It is the glory of the Gospel to seek out the remotest outcasts of the human race, and this honour, so far as the Esquimaux are concerned, belongs to the Moravian Brethren:

> "Fired with a zeal peculiar, they defy
> The rage and rigour of a polar sky,
> And plant successfully sweet Sharon's rose
> On icy plains, and in eternal snows."

SHORT MODEL PRAYERS.

V.

"Lord, help me."—Matt. xv. 25.

WE have here, perhaps, the shortest form of prayer on record. The soul is brought very low indeed before it is led to utter this prayer. Yet is it not for the comfort and encouragement of such poor souls that this prayer is recorded in the word of God?

"He that cometh to God must believe that He is." Here we have this belief. The prayer is addressed to God: "Lord, help me."

I would speak now to any who are brought very low. It may be that you have had great trials, and at last, perhaps, there comes some special affliction that seems to make the already full cup of sorrow overflow. A shock to the nerves, a bitter disappointment, a great prostration of bodily strength; any or all of these combined, may have brought you lower than you ever felt before; and your chief and greatest sorrow is, that you cannot pray. Your heart is grievously burdened, but you feel as if you could not pour it out in prayer. Words will not come; even long-connected thought is not at your command. All is dark, within and around. Still, let nothing tempt you to give up prayer. "If you cannot pray as you would, yet pray as you can."

Kneel down alone, and force your mind to realise the truth: "Thou God seest me." Picture the Lord Jesus as in the scene described in this fifteenth chapter of Matthew. Let it be that you cannot feel as if He was about to make you any answer, yet, call. Say, "Lord!" and add only this one earnest cry, "Help me." Oh, it can never be that such a cry will be unheard or unheeded.

You may hardly know in what way help can be given. Your bewildered mind, full of entangled feelings, could not say to the kindest earthly friend, how you would fain be helped. You only know that you are miserable and full of wants. Then this is the very time to cry to Him who has "all power in heaven and earth," and with whom is no such thing as impossibility, or even difficulty. Exercise faith, recall past deliverances. See how others have been helped. Look at the answer given to her who put up this very prayer, and whose strong faith, shown where all was apparently so dark and hopeless, is so highly commended by Him to whom she cried for help.

Jesus said to her, "O woman, great is thy faith."

"Lord, help me." The words imply that you feel yourself helpless. Is not this the very point to which God has been working to bring you? It is He who has "brought down" your "heart through weariness." Not that He is ever pleased with the sight of sorrow or suffering. It has been well said that God never takes away anything from us, without meaning to give us something better in its place. It is hard for you at this moment to imagine how anything can be better to you than what you have lost; health and strength, or someone dear to you as your own soul, or some earthly prop and support which you hourly needed. But go to the Giver of all good, and go in faith, and if this one word, "Help," is all you can utter, still say it, and remember you are saying it to One who is Almighty, and whose hand is "Love."

"My help cometh from the Lord, who made heaven and earth" (Psa. cxxi. 2).

Missionary Hymn.*

FROM THE GERMAN OF C. H. VON BOGATZKY, AUTHOR OF THE "GOLDEN TREASURY."

WAKE, oh, wake! Divine Inspirer
Of the early witness band!
And the watchmen, ever faithful,
Who on Zion's ramparts stand.
Through the world their word doth ring:
Men to Thee in crowds they bring.

May we see Thy fire enkindled,
May it through all countries run,
And the whole world learn, Lord Jesus,
All that Thou in grace hast done!
Great the harvest Thou dost see,
Yet how few the reapers be.

Clearly hath our Saviour spoken
And hath taught us thus to plead;
Lo! Thy children's hearts are stirring,
Deeply do they feel the need.
Hear, then, Master, when they pray,
And—"It shall be done"—now say!

Hosts of servants, Lord, commission,
Power upon them all bestow;
Tarry not, but haste to help us,
Satan's kingdom overthrow.
To the earth's remotest end,
Let Thy kingdom soon extend.

May Thy word the wide world over,
Freely run and all illume;
May the fulness of the Gentiles
Crowding unto Thee, Lord, come!
And awake Thine Israel—
May they too Thy praises swell!

Lord, restore the ways of Zion,
There once more a pathway make;
Chase away all dark delusions,
From the path offences take.
Church and school for ever be
From all hireling spirits free!

* Sung at the yearly festival of the Basle Missionary Society and at ordinations.

Make each school Thy Spirit's workshop,
Do Thou rule as sovereign there.
Work in every youthful spirit,
May they all Thine image bear.
Give true men to teach and pray,
And to guard Thy church alway.

Love, O Lord, to Thee is praying,
Love, enkindled by Thine own,
By Thy breath Divine inbreathèd,
O Thou who art love alone!
When in lowly love we pray,
All from Love expect we may.

Thou Thy glorious work wilt finish,
Judge and Saviour both art Thou;
Human woe Thou wilt abolish,
Though Thy way we know not now.
Faith will never cease to plead,
Thou dost all our thoughts exceed.

SUFFERING WITH CHRIST.

"If so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together."—Rom. viii. 17.

"For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake."—Phil. i. 29.

"If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him."—2 Tim. ii. 12.

OUR Saviour did not suffer for us that we might never suffer! He did not die for us that we might never die. Those whom He loves have often to walk in a path of very great sufferings, and know that those sufferings must terminate in death; and yet in Christ suffering becomes a blessing, and to die is gain! Not those whose lives are most free from pain are the happiest in God's sight, but those who so "suffer with Him" that they may be glorified together with Him—glorified not only in a future state of bliss, but even now in their perfect acceptance of God's will. "Let patience have her perfect work"; it cannot be wrought without the endurance of pain, nor tested without suffering! The Apostle says to the Philippian disciples that something had been given to them besides the grace to believe on Christ; they had received a privilege, an honour, "in the behalf of Christ." God had called them to a duty—alas, it was one from which nature might be ready to recoil; it was given to them "to suffer for his sake!" Most of us think we would gladly work for Christ; let us ask ourselves, would we suffer for Him—suffer not only as the early Christians did when men persecuted them and cast out their names as evil—but suffer for Christ and with Christ in any way in which He may appoint?—suffer with patience, taking up and accepting whatever trials He sends, looking on them not as evils to be got rid of by any means, but as "His own" appointed path for us to walk in, a path in which we may find Christ walking with us and enriching us with precious communion with Himself? Suffering thus accepted becomes an invaluable discipline to the soul; and the sight of one enduring it in such a spirit becomes to other men a most striking witness of the power of God's grace to give strength and comfort in the time of trial. If the waters of the Sea of Galilee had not been raised by the storm, the disciples would never have known the Master's power to still them; nor would they have learned his tender care for their safety had they not been "exceedingly tossed by the tempest," while with Him in the ship.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

MAY 29.

PARABLE OF THE POUNDS. LUKE XIX. 11-27.

GOLDEN TEXT, ROMANS XIV. 12.—'So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God.'

CONNECTION.—Our Lord was now on His last journey to Jerusalem. He had passed through Jericho, healing Bartimæus and visiting Zacchæus the chief publican (in whose house perhaps this parable was spoken). Great attention was anew attracted to Him; and again it seemed to many who marked His great deeds and words that the Kingdom of God would immediately appear. To correct this misapprehension He recalls a series of incidents of their own time, giving a spiritual application to events familiar to all. We might almost call the parable the 'Story of Archelaus.' Again, as in the narratives of the Unfaithful Steward to the Unjust Judge, our Lord makes the conduct of a wicked person an illustration of spiritual and heavenly transactions.

I. PURPOSE OF THE PARABLE.—Read ver. 11. The Kingdom of God, as heralded by John the Baptist, and often described by Christ Himself in His discourses and parables, was in reality at hand. The KING was on His way to Jerusalem. But the kingdom was not at once to appear, i.e. to be manifested. It was to be an unseen reality until the revelation of a future day. To those who longed for some outward and immediate signs of conquest and reign, this parable is addressed, inculcating the lessons of patient waiting and active work. So Jesus spoke to His disciples on the eve of His Ascension, Acts i. 6, 7.

II. THE 'NOBLEMAN'S' JOURNEY.—Read vers. 12–14. Here the historian Josephus enables us to supply the facts which were probably in the mind of our Lord. Herod the Idumæan, afterwards first monarch of the name, had actually travelled to Rome to receive at the hands of the Emperor Augustus the kingdom of Judæa.* Archelaus, Herod's son, had done the same, and at a later date another son, Herod Antipas.† Nor only so; but in literal fact, the Jews had sent an embassy (a message) to follow Archelaus, and to plead with Augustus against his reign and that of the hated Herodian family ‡; saying, in effect, We will not have this man to reign over us. The circumstances were then ready to our Lord's hand; and the sight of the magnificent palace at Jericho, which Archelaus had built, might well have recalled these incidents to mind (Farrar). Nor only so, but as if to complete the parallel we are told that

* Josephus, 'Antiquities,' xiv. 14.
† Ib. xvii. 9, § 4; xviii. 5, § 1.
‡ Ib. xvii. 11, § 1.

Archelaus, in setting out on his errand, committed his pecuniary interests to his servants, to watch over in his absence. Occupy is a Latinism for trade; from the same root in original as the word in v. 15, 'gained by trading.'

The application is plain: JESUS 'has gone up on high' to the world which to our apprehension is a far country. In one sense He reigns over earth from His unseen throne in the heavens; but in another His kingdom has not yet come: it is not manifested: and the terrible cry against His reign has gone up to heaven from a sinful world. The cry of infidelity—that does not believe in Him: of self-will, that refuses to submit to Him; of self-indulgence, that will not wear His yoke: of carelessness, that will not think of Him: and especially in our Lord's own thought, the language of Jewish bigotry and hatred that were so soon to cause His rejection. Distinguish between the servants and the citizens. The former accepted His authority and had professedly given themselves to Him. To these He entrusts each a pound (a 'mina,' equal in our money to about 3*l.) as the king in the parable afterwards spoken delivers 'talents' to his servants to use (Matt. xxv.). Observe the difference between the two parables, each presenting one side of an important truth. Here, the same sum is differently employed: there, different sums are employed with the same proportional results.

III. THE KING'S RETURN.—Read vers. 15–17. Here our Lord passes from the earthly history to the solemn spiritual reality; deriving perhaps just one feature in His description from a well-known fact. For the method by which Archelaus rewarded his faithful adherents was to assign to them the government of cities. But the whole description gives us a solemn insight into the final account, when Christ's professed servants must all 'be made manifest' before His judgment-seat (2 Cor. v. 10) that 'every one may receive the things done in the body.' Will then judgment be according to works? Yes, and no. Not as a matter of justification: acceptance can only be through the sacrifice and merit of Christ: but as evidence and as obedience. Faithful 'trading' will be the result of our acceptance through Christ; and if we are really His, we shall obey His solemn charge. Hence the questions are the same, in two different forms: Dost thou believe on the Son of God? and Hast thou done His work in the world? But another question may arise: Is it not gain after which the King enquires, and can we command this? May not one man in trading make large profits, and another with equal diligence gain very little? Is it fair, therefore, that final reward should depend upon the amount acquired? The answer to this is that in the spiritual kingdom the gain is as the faithfulness. This may not be seen by us: but it is so in the sight of God. Hence, the ten pounds indicate twice as much earnest labour as the five pounds. [Our standard of success and God's are very different.] Note, however, the way in which those who have laboured for Him give to Him the glory. Not, I have gained—but Thy pound hath gained—the ten or the five. The reward is a summons to higher responsibility and service. From trading with pounds to governing cities! Learn that ability for great things is tested first in small; and also, that the law of God's kingdom is not to give ease in return for labour—but for successful work more work to do! This is shadowed forth to us in the allotments of this earthly life: what it shall be in the life to come we can but dimly understand. Only this we may say, that heaven will not bring to us inactivity or mere enjoyment, but rather the active and energetic exercise of our immortal powers: 'His servants shall serve Him,' Rev. xxii. 3.

Our Lord now turns to another of the servants: (having selected three out of the ten as specimens of the rest) a type not, one would say, of the very worst, but of the unfaithful. He had not stolen the pound, nor wasted it, nor spent it on himself, nor lost it in foolish trading—he had just done nothing with it, laying it by in a napkin, a handkerchief (as in the kindred parable the slothful servant buries his talent in the earth, for yet greater security). What was his motive? Twofold: on his own showing, timidity; he was afraid of losing the money if he did anything with it: and distrust of his Master. To the servant's apprehension, the Lord was austere (harshly-judging) and unjust, unreasonable in the requirements. The root of all was that he did not know his Master; and as he might have known, ought to have known Him, the disobedience was wicked. So the King does not justify Himself, nor answer His servant's plea. Taking the highest application, how justly He might have said, I am not austere, for my motive is Love: I demand nothing unreasonable, for I give strength and means to accomplish all. But He will not say this. Some objectors are best met on their own ground. If it were so, is the unanswerable reply, what then? So the words thou knewest that I was an austere man, etc., are not an acknowledgment, but simply an adoption of the description out of the man's own mouth, to give force to the following question. There was something that the man, however feeble his energies, might have done. If he could not have hoped to employ the pound to advantage in trading, he need not have hidden it away, but might have given it into the (rather a) bank, that it might at least gather some interest (usury in Scripture often means fair and proper interest).

> It has been happily suggested that Christ here gives a hint of what His servants of scanty or unpractised endowments can do in His cause. Interest gained by money in a bank is simply the result of trading with it on a larger scale, and with greater ability than its owner could command. So if we cannot ourselves work effectually, we can place ourselves under the direction of others who can direct and employ our powers.

The punishment of unfaithfulness is the taking away of what was misused or wasted. Take from him the pound, illustrated in the case of the Jewish nation, Matt. xxi. 43. And who shall receive the forfeited blessing? The one who has made best use of that which he himself possessed.—At this point some of our Lord's hearers, fascinated by the story, cry out against the seeming partiality, Lord, he hath ten pounds! This occasions a repetition of the deep words spoken by our Lord on other occasions, a very law of man's moral nature. Unto every one that hath shall be given. Faithful service increases the capacity to serve. What becomes of the unfaithful servant we are not told. Our Lord turns in one brief terrible sentence to the citizens who refused the king's rule altogether, and foreshadows their doom. Slay them before me. 'The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ,' 2 Thess. i. 7, 8.

QUESTIONS.

1. Show the several points of distinction between this parable and that of the Talents.
2. How was this parable literally fulfilled in the conduct and after-history of the Jews?
3. What indication have we here of the fact and the principle of degrees in heavenly glory?
4. On what other occasions, and in what connections, did our Lord utter the proverb 'to him that hath more shall be given'?

* One hundred drachmas = one pound. Sixty pounds = one silver talent.

* Such seems a more likely account of the parenthesis than that which makes it a part of the parable, an exclamation of the King's courtiers.

THE TWO NEIGHBOURS.

II.

ONE morning, the persecuted family were sitting down to their early breakfast, when Frau Meyer, happening to glance toward her husband, noticed that he wore an anxious and apprehensive look, and scarcely tasted his food, a most unusual thing for happy, light-hearted, old Paul.

"What ails you, father?" she asked, affectionately calling him by the same endearing name his children used.

"I am not easy in my mind this morning," answered the husband. "I heard such strange sounds as I lay in bed last night, and they seemed to come"—here he turned to his son—"from Count Egmont's kennel. I know he has been restless these last few nights, and neighbour Heyse threatened——"

Martin waited to hear no more; a sudden fear possessed him as he heard his father's words, and he bounded off. So violently did he tremble with suspense and apprehension, that some moments elapsed before he could steady his hand sufficiently to unlock the small wooden door leading to the shed where Count Egmont was usually lodged, and when the key was at last turned, and the door swung back, Martin almost fell against it in the extremity of his surprise and dismay, for, saving a confused heap of straw on the ground, the kennel was empty.

The Meyers were ruined. The news of their loss excited much sympathy among those whom they counted as friends or acquaintances, but none of these entertained the suspicion which was strong in the minds both of old Paul and of his son Martin—that Nicholas Heyse was in some way responsible for the mysterious disappearance of the dog.

Neither father nor son had any positive proof of their neighbour's guilt, but privately admitted to each other that in their opinion it scarcely allowed of a doubt. For part of Heyse's garden fence formed one side of the kennel, and Martin observed, with eyes which nothing escaped, that many of the broad, close palings stood loosely in the ground, as if they had been recently pulled up.

Some days passed, and the boy wondered that no attempt was made to refix the wood, until he heard Gunther the cobbler calling Nicholas's attention to the defect. The gardener's answer filled him with grief and anger. "It matters little; I shall soon have both gardens on my hands again, and the fence will be useless then."

It was well-known that the Meyers were going back to their poverty-stricken dwelling in the city, and their departure was much lamented over by many to whom they had endeared themselves during their short stay in their new home. The master of the dog heard, with scarcely disguised suspicion and distrust, Martin's story of its singular disappearance, and insisted on being paid in full for the loss he had sustained. In vain the boy pleaded the straits to which his father and mother were already reduced by the diminution of his own earnings, and represented the impossibility of raising so large a sum as would be necessary to pay for the dog; the master was obdurate, and threatened extreme measures if the money were not soon forthcoming.

At last a compromise was effected. Old Paul promised to return into the city, and engaged that both he and his wife, as well as their son, would work laboriously until the master's claims were fully satisfied. A month yet remained for them to spend in the pleasant suburb, but Martin still went daily into the city, and forced his shoulders to bear the loads which Count Egmont had once carried so easily and so well.

Just at this time Heyse's attention was too deeply engaged with his own concerns to allow him leisure for interfering much with his neighbours. A flower-show was soon to be held in Brussels, and the gardener was rearing some fine tulips for exhibition there. He had already at different times gained several prizes for his flowers, and his skill and success in cultivating them was so well known that there was scarcely an hour during the day when some admiring face was not to be seen peeping over the low garden-fence. Heyse, however, systematically discouraged all such visits, and watched, like a sleepless dragon, over his tulips, being apprehensive that, if he left them unguarded, his visitors' passion for horticulture might take a less innocent form. His wife privately thought that he had more to fear from the Meyers than from any chance passer-by, and ventured to hint to him her suspicions.

Nicholas was thoroughly alarmed; he endeavoured, however, to dissemble his anxiety, at least in his wife's presence.

"They won't dare to touch them," said he, assuming a confidence which he was very far from feeling, "besides, how could they do so without being detected? The old man could never climb over our low fence, and the boy is away all day—no, no, wife, trust me, we have nothing to fear from them."

"I wish from my heart, Nicholas, that you had never touched their dog."

"I didn't touch their dog; I never laid a finger on it," retorted the husband angrily; "how often am I to tell you that?"

"But you let him loose," persisted the wife, with whom this was always a sore point; "you pulled up the stakes of the fence that made one side of his kennel."

"Well," answered Nicholas, "and suppose I did? Have I not the right to do what I please with my own property? How was I to know that the dog would run out, and jump over the outer fence, and be gone? It wasn't my business to look after him."

"You can't convince me, husband," replied Frau Heyse, with unusual determination. "It was a cruel thing to do, and we should only be rightly punished" (the meek-spirited woman identified herself with her husband's misdoings) "if the Meyers revenged themselves on us by stealing your tulips."

Nicholas had, by this time, exhausted all arguments in defence of his conduct, and therefore retired from the field, oppressed, in spite of his vehement self-exculpation, by a sense of treachery and injustice, and filled with forebodings to which his wife's fears had given rise. From that day forth he kept a more vigilant watch than ever over his much-prized flowers, and left them, when he was obliged to leave them, with great uneasiness and reluctance.

It wanted now but a week to the time of the show, and as his tulips had been hitherto unmolested in any way, Nicholas felt a little easier respecting them, and took his accustomed Friday walk into Brussels, without leaving with his wife his usual strict injunctions of watchfulness. Frau Heyse, in consequence, paid less attention to the garden than she had been wont to do of late, and busied herself more with household affairs. So absorbed was she that the flowers remained entirely forgotten, until, at dinner-time, her husband came home, and passed immediately into the garden to make his accustomed inspection of his treasures. She had barely time to reproach herself with her forgetfulness, when Nicholas returned, furious, for his finest tulip was missing.

The wife bore in meek silence the storm of reproaches with which he assailed her, and acknowledged that she was greatly to blame. But no confessions, no contrition, no expressions of sorrow, had power to allay her husband's wrath. He was quite certain that the theft was to be laid at the Meyers' door; his wife had suspected that they meant to steal the flowers, and yet she had, by her carelessness, as much as connived at their danger. It was shameful; but he would contrive to find some proof of their guilt, and bring them all to justice. Frau Heyse was thoroughly frightened, and spent a miserable afternoon and evening, in listening to her husband's threats and reproaches; she dared not even take up her knitting, but sat still, in inactive fear, whilst Nicholas paced the room incessantly, bursting out continually into some fresh explosion of anger.

A gentle knock at the door was unheard by either husband or wife, and was repeated more than once without attracting any attention. Frau Heyse at last made a timid movement towards the door, but Nicholas threw it open unceremoniously. From out of the twilight a tall figure emerged, and advanced a few steps into the lamp-lit room. It was Martin Meyer. In his hands he bore carefully a small flower-pot, which he set down upon the table. Husband and wife gave a simultaneous cry of astonishment and delight, for there stood the missing tulip, as blooming and as beautiful as it had been early that same morning, when Heyse had paid his farewell visit to it.

Martin's quiet and simple explanation stopped the impending storm of questions. "Your flower was stolen this morning, Master Nicholas, by a lad who used to work with me in the lace factory. He was turned off for his bad ways, and now he idles about, doing all kinds of mischief. He heard about the loss of my dog"—here the colour rushed to the boy's face, and he spoke with evident difficulty; "he said—he said——" Martin stopped.

"What did he say?" asked Nicholas consciously.

"He said you had got rid of it somehow, and that I ought to take revenge on you for it. I never thought of his words again until this morning, when I was carrying my parcels through the city, and I saw him standing in a narrow court, beckoning to me. He had got your tulip, Master Nicholas, and said that he had stolen it for me."

"Well?" questioned the gardener.

"I made him give it up," continued Martin, "but I hope you won't make him suffer for the theft. Your flower is not damaged at all, and I have taken great care of it to-day."

The gardener said nothing, but looked fixedly at his tulip.

"I don't believe he ever stole before," ventured Martin, urging every possible plea on behalf of the culprit.

Still Heyse remained silent.

"Husband, have you nothing to say?" asked his wife a little impatiently. "This good boy has been at the pains of bringing you back your flower, and you give him no thanks nor even listen to him when he asks you to be indulgent to his friend."

"He has nothing to fear from me, nothing," answered Heyse in a low and hurried voice; "and you have my best thanks, Martin Meyer, for your kindness;" but all the time he never once raised his eyes, so Martin had no resource but to say "Good-night," and leave his neighbours alone.

A week passed by, and the flower-show was duly held, with most satisfactory results to Nicholas Heyse, for his tulip had carried off a valuable prize, and everyone had congratulated him on its splendid appearance. A well-known florist had offered a high price for the flower, and the gardener had accepted it without his accustomed bargaining, and in spite of repeated declarations to his wife that nothing should induce him to part with it. That same evening he came home, bringing with him, not the prize tulip, but a large, handsome dog. Frau Heyse looked at the pair in speechless astonishment.

"Put on your bonnet, wife," said Nicholas; "I am going to return the visit Martin Meyer paid us last week, and you may as well come too."

"But where will you leave the dog?" asked the wife, rather anxiously, looking uneasily round her neat, trim parlour.

"I think I'll take him along with us," answered the gardener, smiling and colouring a little, as he bent down to pat his charge's curly coat.

A light seemed all at once to break upon Frau Heyse's mind.

"Oh, Nicholas, you are surely going to make friends with the Meyers!"

"Well, perhaps I am," admitted Nicholas; "but come along, wife. I see old Paul walking with Martin in the garden."

So the two set out!

Gunther, the cobbler, who was smoking a pipe in his doorway on the opposite side of the street, looked astonished and incredulous at seeing his friend Heyse lifting the latch of the Meyers' gate; he would probably have manifested still greater astonishment could he have peeped through the lattice-window, and have seen what took place between the neighbours. How Nicholas left his wife to make friends with Anna Meyer and her little ones, whilst he went into the garden to make a stammering and hesitating, yet perfectly unreserved confession to old Paul and Martin; how both father and son shook him warmly by the hand, and were much affected to hear that the price paid to the gardener for his tulip had been expended on buying a new dog for Martin, and in satisfying the demands of Count Egmont's owner. Still more, how they afterwards supped together in all friendliness and good-fellowship, and, finally, how Nicholas acknowledged that night to his wife that he found a clear conscience better worth having than the finest flower that ever grew, and that he would rather part with every inch of his own garden than lose such kind-hearted neighbours as old Paul Meyer and his family.

WORD PICTURES FROM THE BOOK OF KINGS.

A city sore besieged; an armèd host
Waging wild war against the tott'ring walls.
Borne on the wind, the mingled sounds go forth:
The conqueror's shout—the wail of him that falls.
But where is he—the chief? The warrior chief,
Whose own red hand hath brought him foul renown;
A hand so deeply stain'd with blood of kings,
And kingly kindred—for a royal crown?
Ah! where is he?—this seven-day sovereign,
With all his crimes heap'd on his crownèd head?
Th' Avenger cometh in the clash of steel,
The royal murderer hears the sounds with dread.
He hears the cries that mark th' approaching foe,
And knows that all is lost. Now black despair
Gives him a stern resolve. He once again
Enters his palace, while the outer air
Rings with the shouts of those who seek the king,
Who seek the slayer that he may be slain.
With his own hands he heaps the funeral pile,
Working, as though for life, with madden'd brain.
Working as though for life, and yet for death;
Else what is this that steals from out the doors
In noxious, vapoury wreaths? What mean those flame
That wrap the glowing house from roofs to floors?
Come on, besieger, seek the guilty king!
Nought shalt thou find but ashes. Bitterer foe
Than even thou canst be—remorse, despair,
Hath sent the murderer where the wicked go.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

VAIN EFFORTS.

THROUGH THE LINN.

CHAPTER IX.—BRIGHTON LODGINGS.

IN a shabby back-street of Brighton, a pale child's face might have been seen pressed against the soiled window-panes of a small sitting-room. It was a very shabby sitting-room and a very dirty one. The once white window-curtains hung limp and blackened, and the table-cloth had jagged rents, and the carpet showed scarcely a remnant of its formerly bright pattern. Some tears were creeping down the pale cheeks of the child, and now and then she coughed harshly, with a look of pain. Two long hours she had been alone, and time passed wearily. Violet had nothing to do, no books to read. The fire in the hearth was small, for they had to economise fuel. Lettice's money was almost at an end.

No. 1413.—MAY 28, 1881.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

She had not known it would go so fast. These poor lodgings were the cheapest she had been able to find; and there was only this one tiny sitting-room, and a much tinier bedroom behind. They ate little, yet it seemed to Lettice that the last week's bills had been very heavy. She had not dreamt how the simplest eatables mount up in price.

Nearly ten days had gone by, the longest, darkest, dreariest days that Lettice Majendie had ever gone through. Had she verily known before the meaning of black pool following upon foaming Linn. She thought in any case she knew it now; but this black pool she had plunged into of her own free will.

For slowly the nature of the step she had taken was dawning upon Lettice. Slowly she was learning the true meaning of those terrible words, loneliness and unprotection. Slowly she was finding out what it was to have cut herself off from human help and human sympathy. Each hour she felt more deeply her own helplessness. And yet she dared not pray. For she knew at last that she had followed her own will solely, and not God's guidance, in forsaking the shelter provided.

How long could she and Violet remain in these rooms? Lettice had parted with the last of her trinkets, had parted even with her massive birthday chain, to enable her to meet the past week's expenses. That went sorely indeed against the grain, but it had to be. Only her watch remained, and her money was again almost at an end. Sometimes, looking back to the happy days of her girlhood, she wondered whether this grave and careworn individual could be the light-hearted Lettice Majendie of the past. Would "Aunt Jeannie" know her again?

She had sought in vain for work. It was not the season, and superfluous "hands" were being dismissed, rather than extra ones taken on. Besides, she could not have served in a shop, for Violet could not be left. Even when compelled to quit her for an hour or two at a time, during her weary search after employment, she was oppressed with a constant dread lest something should happen in her absence to the lonely and timid child. She wished to find work to do at home, little thinking how wretchedly such work is commonly paid for. But she could find none. There were too many experienced workers to compete with her in the field, and she had no recommendations to show. Also the time of year rendered the matter hopeless, for Brighton was emptying. She had painted tasteful little text-cards for birthdays or Christmas, and had taken them to different shops; but she met with no encouragement. "They were pretty," one and another admitted, "but the market was overstocked; hundreds as good could be had for the asking; and this was not the season when there was a demand for them." So, sick at heart, Lettice daily returned to her lodgings.

Another anxiety pressed upon her heavily. Violet had taken a severe chill during the long night-journey and the waiting about at cold stations. It was a cold that came on slowly, and laid strong grasp upon the child. Lettice knew the worst of it was not over yet.

"I wish Lettice would come," the child moaned wearily from time to time, and by-and-by the familiar figure appeared, walking along the pavement with a hurried yet tired step, for nothing is so depressing to mind and body as failure. Violet gave one cry of joy, and in two minutes more she was resting in the loving arms which to her implied all that was needed of earthly protection. Violet little knew their helplessness to shield her.

"Have you found work yet, Lettice?"

"No, Violet. My darling, how hoarse you are to-day."

"It is coming on worse," said Violet. "My chest hurts so, Lettice. I wish we had a better fire—but I have kept it small, because you told me."

Lettice silently stroked her hair and fondled her face. Violet lay in her arms contentedly, coughing now and then.

"And you have not found any work, Lettice?"

"No." The pent-up distress broke forth suddenly, "O Violet, I don't know what to do; I don't know what will become of us."

"There isn't much money left, is there?"

"Almost none. It has gone so fearfully fast. I can't understand how. It seems to me we don't really eat much. I must watch more carefully. I could not have believed coals and gas would mount up so in one week, or that such quantities of eggs and flour and sugar would be needed. I think I must begin to buy everything myself, instead of ordering them through Mrs. Burns, only I am afraid she will be vexed. People are not always quite honest in lodgings—though I don't like to suspect her. But I have almost come to the end of my money, and there is nothing else of value to sell except my watch."

"The watch darling mamma gave you?" murmured Violet. "It would be so hard to part with that. I wish we had not forgotten to bring my watch." Then, after a pause—"Lettice, dear, have you asked God to help us?"

"No," Lettice answered.

"I have been trying. And I think He will—don't you? Why don't you ask Him? I always thought you loved God so much."

"O Violet, don't! I am very very unhappy."

"But, Lettice—won't Jesus comfort you, if you ask Him?" whispered the child, and a sudden fear came over Lettice. What made Violet think and talk thus?

"My pet, you do not feel ill, do you?" she asked anxiously. "You are not hiding anything from me?"

"I don't think I am ill," said Violet slowly. "What would you do if I were, Lettice?"

"Oh, hush, don't talk of it. I could not bear that. I should feel as if I had brought it on you."

Violet's eyes watched her steadily for some seconds.

"Lettice," she said hoarsely, "I sometimes think that perhaps we were not right to come away from Brentwood. I am not sure, but sometimes I think it. Don't you too sometimes?"

A sigh was the answer. Lettice's cheek was stroked by the little thin hand.

"It would have been very very hard to go away from you to school. But sometimes—sometimes, darling—I do wonder whether—whether it wouldn't have been more right. And God would have helped us to bear it."

"That is it," said Lettice in a choked voice. "I cannot pray to God, because I took my own way in coming here. And if His way was to let you go away from me to school—oh, I cannot bear that way

—I cannot bear it, Violet. I think I should die, if you and I were long parted. I must keep you, my own. You are all I have left to me in the whole world."

"But, Lettice," the child said thoughtfully, after a break—"but, Lettice—if God meant me to go away from you, wouldn't it have been better to let it be so? Because if He means to do it, He will do it somehow, won't He? And He might have to take me in some worse way?"

A sharp low cry broke from the elder girl's lips, and she clasped Violet passionately. "No, no, no, no—don't say that—oh, Violet, don't speak of such a thing."

"But I think I ought to speak," said Violet gently—"because I told you I would rather come away with you than go to school, and I think I was wrong. If it was God's will, I ought to have gone. And Miss Temple told me once I should have to be taken from you, if you went on making an idol of me, and loving nobody but me. She said it was worse than a heathen stone idol, and she said God never allowed idols, and I was frightened, though I didn't half know what she meant. I think I do know now."

"I do not believe Miss Temple, Violet. God is love, and that sounds so hard. I do not believe it."

"That was how I felt," said little Violet patiently, in her husky tones. "I had wicked thoughts at first, Lettice, but Brena made me feel so differently. O Lettice, Brena is sweet, and she does love God so much. I told her what Miss Temple had said, and I asked her if it was true. And she said she thought it was true and yet not true. She said anything in it that seemed hard wasn't true, for God is love—just as you say, Lettice. But she said it was really true that sometimes God has to part us from the people we love best, so as to make us think more about Jesus. And she said that wasn't hardness but love, because if He were to leave us alone, we should go down and down, and never reach heaven. I have often thought since about what she said, though I forgot it the night we came away."

Lettice fondled her silently, but attempted no answer, and Violet said no more. They had their tea, but Violet could not eat, and seemed to care only to lie in her sister's arms. Lettice put her early to bed, and sat watching her, as she tossed to and fro, restless and feverish, the hoarseness and oppression growing worse each hour. Such simple remedies as lay within Lettice's reach seemed utterly ineffectual. She did not dare to take off her clothes, dreading some acute attack. Her own inexperience, and the lack of any friendly adviser, weighed upon her heavily. Somewhat past midnight she went to the farther side of the room to get some barley-water which she had had made, and a hoarse shriek brought her back in alarm.

"Oh, Lettice—Lettice—I thought you were gone. I thought everyone was gone," gasped the child, clinging fast with her little burning hands. "Don't go, darling, please. It hurts me so to breathe."

Lettice sat down beside her once more, in helpless anxiety, and presently Violet exclaimed,

"We must go home. We must go home."

"Home, Violet!"

"Yes, home—we must go home to-morrow—home to Brentwood. Promise me, Lettice. We must go home."

Lettice bent over her. "I will think about it, my darling."

"No, no—promise me now. We have been wrong—and you'll tell Miss Temple we are sorry. Won't you, darling?"

"I will see," was all Lettice could say. Pride rose in arms at the thought. "Oh no—no—I cannot do that."

"I can't go without you, but we must go home—we must, Lettice."

Lettice was frightened at the struggling cough and choking hoarseness.

"Yes, yes, my darling,—anything, only don't talk. We will see to-morrow morning."

"Promise me," was the reiterated entreaty.

"I do promise. I will do what you wish—whatever you wish. We will see about it in the morning. I promise," she said, in bitter pain and with shrinking reluctance, yet perhaps half relieved that the decision was taken out of her hands. Anything seemed to her better than this agitation for Violet. And the child was soothed, and had snatches of sleep afterwards, lying propped up, with her sister's arm supporting her. Yet there was no real improvement. Lettice knew before the morning that Violet was seriously ill.

"I shan't be able to go home to-day," the child whispered with difficulty. "But you will write, and say we are sorry."

Not a letter, but a telegram was in Lettice's mind. Now she had yielded on the main point, all else went down before the overwhelming desire to have help for Violet. A telegram would bring a quicker response than a letter. She found means to send one early that morning,—with almost her last shilling.

"No news of the children yet, Selina?"

This was the usual formula with which Mr. Temple daily entered his sister's drawing-room. He looked careworn, for the matter preyed upon him, and disturbed his rest.

"News! no," said Miss Temple from the sofa, where she sat beside her cousin, Mrs. Temple. "Everyone asks that question. I don't believe we ever shall have any. Lettice is a girl who would die any day sooner than give in, or confess herself in the wrong. I know what she is. If that last advertisement doesn't bring an answer, nothing will. An ungrateful reckless hard-hearted——"

"My dear, we have gone over that ground before," said Mr. Temple, with a fatigued air. "As for the advertisement, it is highly probable that Lettice has never seen it."

"It is highly probable that if she has she will pay no attention to it," said Miss Temple rather snappishly, for she had just had her equanimity much disturbed by certain suggestions from Mrs. Temple, following upon a letter of mournful inquiry from Mrs. Canynge. "Everybody seems to think I am in fault in the matter, and I must say I call it very hard—very hard indeed."

"No, my dear Selina, you are mistaken," said Vandal.

"I am not mistaken, and I do call it very hard," repeated Miss Temple. "After all that I did for those girls—all the expense—and the thought—and the care—and the trouble—and the worry—and the anxiety—to have it insinuated that I drove them out of the house—by a course—of—of—deliberate cruelty——"

"No, no, my dear sister," interposed Vandal, as her voice rose to a sobbing climax, and broke down.

"Selina utterly misunderstands me," quietly explained the gentle-mannered Mrs. Temple. "I merely ventured to suggest that a slight change of plan might in the future make things go more smoothly—when Lettice and Violet are found."

"As they never will be," said Miss Temple, with injured vehemence. "Never."

"They have no means of support. Lettice will, I hope, be brought to her senses by positive need."

"Oh, then, you do see the necessity for that! You don't look upon her merely as a poor innocent victim to my harshness."

"By no means," said Mrs. Temple, with a slight yet expressive motion of her eyebrows. "Lettice has acted in a manner deserving of very great blame. Nevertheless, it may be well to learn wisdom from the past for the future."

At this moment, not inopportunely, there came a telegram. Miss Temple seized and tore it open.

"From Lettice!" she cried in amazement. "Actually, from Lettice herself! Well, I always did say we should hear from her soon, and there was no need to make a fuss."

"What does she say?" two voices inquired simultaneously.

"I suppose she means it for an apology! Humph! Violet ill—yes, I dare say—and whose fault is that? Brighton!—what on earth did she go there for? Just like Lettice! Of all expensive places——"

"My dear Selina, pray inform us what Lettice says," entreated Vandal.

"I thought I had read it. 'From Lettice Majendie. Violet is very ill. I have no money, no friends. I have acted wrongly. We are sorry. Please help us!'"

"Poor children!" said Vandal compassionately. "I call it quite humble—quite humbled."

"Pride enough there still," said Miss Temple. "But it has to bend. 'Sorry' is she? Anybody else would have had the grace to say at least 'very sorry!'"

Mrs. Temple had taken the paper. "No," she said. "The full number of words is here. She could not say more without additional expense."

"No money—no friends—and Violet ill," repeated Vandal. "Poor things! Well, sister?"

"Lettice seems to take it for granted that all the world is waiting to fall at her feet and welcome her back," said Miss Temple. "For my part, I think she ought to be made to feel the consequences of her conduct."

"She has felt them. She is feeling them. How far would you go, Selina? Is the child to die for want of medical aid? Are they both to die of starvation?"

"Lettice frankly confesses herself in the wrong. Ill as she has acted, that surely alters the position of affairs," said Mrs. Temple.

"Of course—of course," said Miss Temple. "I am willing to forgive her,—and there is nothing for it but to have them back here again. Certainly, my opinion of Lettice is not improved by what she has done. And I certainly do not mean her to gain her own way by rebellion. The moment Violet is better she will go to school."

Vandal half shook his head, but Mrs. Temple said, "I think Selina is right in principle. The child will hardly be fit for it at present, however."

"What is to be the plan, Selina?" asked her brother. "Will you go to Brighton?"

"I! Go to Brighton! Certainly not. I should not think of such an idea. Lettice went alone, and she may come back alone. I shall write and tell her so, and send money for the journey."

Vandal looked troubled. "The child may be too ill to travel."

"Oh, nothing of the sort, depend upon it. Just one of Lettice's fancies. I dare say they have not had enough to eat, and Violet is in a low state."

"It may be worse than that," said Mrs. Temple. "Lettice says distinctly that she is 'very ill.' Would it not be wise to telegraph back, and tell her if needful to call in a doctor."

"Just so! Just so! Thanks for the suggestion. We will do so, by all means," said Vandal. "And a cheque can follow by post."

"Give her leave and she is sure to do it," said Miss Temple, dissatisfied. "I believe the girl will be fussed over, till she thinks she has done something positively heroic in running away, instead of being a disgrace to the family."

Vandal looked soberly up from a scrap of paper on which he had begun to write. "I am inclined to think," he said, "that was hardly the effect produced upon the prodigal son, when his father ran to meet him from a great way off, and killed the fatted calf."

"Lettice won't thank you for likening her to a prodigal son, I can tell you," said Miss Temple, with sharpness. "I suppose you mean by that, that you want me to go to Brighton to meet her."

Vandal could hardly control a smile at her very practical interpretation of his allusion.

"Perhaps she has not learnt her lesson fully yet," Mrs. Temple remarked with reference to Lettice. "But I doubt whether the prodigal son did either, till his father's arms were round him. A good deal may depend upon the nature of Lettice's reception when she comes home."

"Will this do?" asked Vandal, after inditing a few words. "Listen, Selina. 'Call doctor, if needful. Cheque will follow by post. Can Violet travel? Write particulars. Come home to-morrow if possible?'"

Miss Temple maintained silence; and when he repeated his question, she said, "You may decide. I wash my hands of it."

"I beg your pardon, sister! The telegram must go in your name."

"Well, you may put it any way you like. I wash my hands of it," said Miss Temple again.

"But you are willing to welcome them home?"

"The room is ready. It is not my fault that they ever left it."

Vandal sighed and rose to leave. Mrs. Temple said good-bye at the same time, and accompanied him down the street.

"I wish Selina would go," she said, before bidding him farewell. "But perhaps we can hardly expect it. The whole affair has been a very trying one to her."

"It is not an absolute necessity—not yet, I think," said Vandal uneasily. "I think we may manage without that fatigue and expense—by exchanging letters. I hope Selina will write kindly."

THE KING'S WINDOWS;

OR, GLIMPSES OF THE WONDERFUL WORKS OF GOD.

BY THE REV. E. PAXTON HOOD.

V.—FLOWERS.

HOW is it that so deeply rooted in most human hearts there is a love of flowers? If we sought illustrations of this widely-diffused sentiment, we should not go to the costly conservatory and magnificent parterre of the nobleman or the wealthy merchant, nor, perhaps, even to the pretty little plot of garden-ground which the artisan or the city clerk tends so affectionately the half hour before breakfast in the morning, or the last hour in the summer evening twilight; but we would rather go to the little flower-shop, neatly trimmed out, in the painfully-crowded streets of St. Giles's or Spitalfields, whence the poor lone widow obtains her small flower-pot for her dull window-sill, with the quaint reflection of the Hermit of Clavernook, "You see, sir, if we can't go to natur', we must bring natur' to us." Enter London by train through almost any of its suburbs, and you look down upon many a poor window rejoicing in its two or three flowers. What a lovely sight to the eye is a French flower-market! This is an institution in almost every French town, and who patronises it? Oh, no doubt, the rich; there are magnificent bouquets for the épergne in the dining-room or for the fair hand at the opera; but you follow any poor woman on her way through the good markets of Paris, and you will find that, after she has laid in her store of culinary comestibles, she almost invariably winds up with two or three modest and cheap little flowerettes to shed their fragrance over the table—their sanctity over the home. Walk round the Palais Royal, look up to the high roofs and to the balustrades round their attic windows, and see how those to whom it is almost a journey to travel up or down those weary flights of stairs contrive to make their garden in the air, and to give a little colour and fragrance to their lives by the nasturtiums and carnations growing there.

Charles Dickens in "Our Mutual Friend," describes some such little garden scene in the east end of London, where Riah the Jew breathes the more pleasant air in his garden on the house-top. The poor and the unhappy seem to turn so naturally to flowers. A traveller tells us how he landed, and spent some time on a little lonely island in the waste of the remote and melancholy sea, and there he saw within a small enclosure a gentleman in flowered dressing-gown and green slippers, his head bound round with a crimson handkerchief, industriously tending his flowers, turning up the soil and wielding his watering-pot; who was it? It was the great Napoleon on St. Helena. The man who had played such havoc amongst the thrones and dynasties of Europe was thus engaged in passing the hours of life away, and, perhaps, a little cheating melancholy and despair by ministering to a flower.

Our readers will not sympathise much, we fancy, with Leigh Hunt when, in his pleasant book, "The Town," he unites together, as two of the charms for the poor denizens of dark cities, the wandering hand-organ, bringing music to the poor, and the florist suggesting thoughts of tranquillity and contentment. It is in the same spirit that flowers shed such a charm over sick-rooms. Mrs. Hemans was probably not far from the end of her sombre life-journey when she wrote concerning flowers in a room of sickness:

> "God hath purified my spirit's eye,
> And in the folds of this consummate rose
> I read bright prophecies."

And then she goes on, in language too lengthy for us to quote, to speak of the flower by the bed of sickness as expressing the hope and the suggestion of the land of everlasting spring.

If we were making a chronicle of floral fancies we should find the volumes of this most graceful of our English poetesses full of charming lines; the temperament of Mrs. Hemans especially constituted her the poetess of the flowers. Her sex has given to our country greater poets in thought and imagination, but among them she was a kind of sensitive plant—a kind of mimosa in verse—an aspen tree in the world of letters, so that not only did flowers in all their varieties touch her, but her nature seemed to respond to their subtle and inner qualities. It was quite easy to her to conceive a dial of flowers, after the well-known eastern idea.

> "'Twas a lovely thought to mark the hours
> As they floated in light away
> By the opening and the folding flowers,
> That laugh to the summer's day.
> Oh! let us live, so that flower by flower
> Shutting in turn may leave
> A lingerer still for the sunset hour,
> A charm for the shaded eve."

Certainly the affluence of flowers is wonderful, apparently, if we may say so, infinite as the Hand which has strewn them abroad so lavishly. The surface of our earth is thickly strewn with starry nooks secreting in lovely solitudes a wealth of flowers.

"Bright they bloom, and do not shrink
By the eddying river brink,
Where the birds fly down to drink.

Soft they colour mountains steep,
Safe beyond the farthest leap
Of the nimble mountain sheep.

Lonely to the crag they cling,
Where the surge is echoing,
And the sea-bird prunes its wing.

Thick they cluster by the side
Of hot roads all dusty dried,
Smiling sweetly, open-eyed.

Tenderly they bow their head
Over graves where lie the dead,
And soft raining tears are shed."

It is quite natural that poets should have found themselves singularly at home when looking at, talking, or writing about flowers. Perhaps not one person in twenty thousand of those who have read the lines understood what Wordsworth meant when he said,

"To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears;"

but we suppose he was simply in that mood of spirit which our Lord inculcated when He said, "Consider the lilies"—it was a sense of the deep mystery of life, and love, which is synonymous with life, and exquisite, finished beauty, and charming, graceful unconsciousness. Upon another occasion, Wordsworth was laughed at by the great critics because he set forth in his verse the loveliness of a very insignificant little flower—the common pile-wort or small celandine. It must have afforded him great enjoyment, for he makes it the subject of two poems. He is quite proud of the pleasure he feels in uncovering the hitherto uncelebrated beauties of the little thing.

"Eyes of some men travel far
For the finding of a star;
Up and down the heavens they go,
Men that keep a mighty rout!
I'm as great as they, I trow,
Since the day I found thee out;
Little flower! I'll make a stir,
Like a sage astronomer."

There have been eyes which have hung with tender affection over the most insignificant of these floral gems, and have discovered in them lessons and teachings which might indeed be conveyed by rolling worlds, but which could scarcely, from those remote heavens, shed such human light and comfort upon the heart, especially if the heart were itself agitated or disturbed. The daisy is one of the most common—dare we say insignificant?—of flowers. But James Montgomery wrote few lines more sweet and true than those simple syllables:

"There is a flower, a little flower,
With silver crest, and golden eye,
That welcomes every changing hour,
And weathers every sky.

On waste and woodland, rock and plain,
Its humble buds unheeded rise;
The rose has but a summer reign,
The Daisy never dies."

Wordsworth, in his verses on the daisy, rises to the sublime; and most evidently to him the daisy brought exactly the spirit of the lesson our Lord intended in his "Consider the lilies." Perhaps, if He had spoken to us, He would have said, "Consider the daisies." The poet describes how

"On the dappled turf at ease,
He sat and played with similes," and certainly a wonderfully various and beautiful crowd of similes come. But the first verse described the state in which the daisy found him, the last that in which he left her.

"In youth from rock to rock I went,
From hill to hill in discontent,
Of pleasure high and turbulent,
Most pleased when most uneasy;
But now my own delights I make,
My thirst at every rill can slake,
And gladly nature's love partake
Of thee, sweet Daisy!"

There he lies, with the little silent preacher by his side, awaking a crowd of considerations and reflections, until he sums all up in the exquisite syllables of the closing verse:

"Bright flower! for by that name at last,
When all my reveries are past,
I call thee, and to that cleave fast,
Sweet, silent creature!
That breath'st with me in sun and air,
Do thou, as thou art wont, repair
My heart with gladness, and a share
Of thy meek nature!"

A not unknown writer, in words on our Lord's injunction to "consider the lilies," quaintly says: "In my pocket edition of 'Pilgrim's Progress,' by John Bunyan, Junior, I am told there was one room of the Interpreter's House into which, when Christian went, he beheld only a beautiful lily, with its rich green mantling leaf, and its chaste white flower, which when Pilgrim beheld, he said, 'What means this?' Then said Mr. Interpreter, 'Thou art always to consider this, for in it thou art to see what thou hast been, and what God will have thee to be: like that lily thou hast been taken out of the earth, and what beauty and excellence thou hast is not thine, but thy Maker's; and as that lily thou dost there behold drinks the water from her cup, and receives without a question her Maker's goodness, so must thou remember that He who made her redeemed thee, as well as made thee, and thou must know and consider that He who made her so fair and sweet, although she was only intended to bloom for a short season, moved heaven and earth to bless thee, because thou wast made in his image; and as the rain, and water, and air, and light are all necessary to make the lily beautiful, so the blood and sacrifice of Christ, and his Spirit, and his prayers, and his life, and his death are thy life, and light, and sun, and rain. Thou must consider that if thy Father could create a lily, the same Power who created that can redeem thee.'" Such words were once heard in Mr. Interpreter's house.

But an American poet reminds us in what very different ways men may "consider the lilies," and, however splendidly expressed, how utterly unlike to the intentions of our Lord, or to the exposition of Wordsworth or Bunyan, Junior, some considerations may be. But the verses have a splendour of their own, and are the more apt for quotation here, as probably almost unknown in this country:

"I like not lady-slippers,
Nor yet the sweet-pea blossoms,
Nor yet the flaky roses,
Red, or white as snow;
I like the chaliced lilies,
The heavy eastern lilies,
The gorgeous tiger-lilies
That in our garden grow.

For they are tall and slender;
Their mouths are dashed with carmine,
And when the wind sweeps by them,
On their emerald stalks
They bend so proud and graceful.
They are Circassian women,
The favourites of the sultan,
Adown our garden-walks.

And when the rain is falling,
I sit beside the window,
And watch them glow and glisten,
How they burn and glow!
O for the burning lilies,
The tender eastern lilies,
The gorgeous tiger-lilies,
That in our garden grow."

Such, and so various, is the life of flowers—sometimes gorgeous as the splendours of an oriental court in oriental climes, in the glowing colours of the cactus, the pomegranate blossom, the oleander, and varieties of tropical lilies. But it is more comfortable to the heart to think of our dear little English and homely friends, the chaste and exquisite lily of the valley, the heliotrope and forget-me-not, the violet and the jasmine; it is such as these which most illuminate Mary Howitt's sweet words as to the use of flowers:

"To comfort man, to whisper hope,
Whene'er his faith grows dim,
That God, who careth for the flowers,
Will care much more for him."

Many people in looking over the world of flowers have been impressed by what, without irreverence, has seemed to them something like the amazing wastefulness of creation; such myriads and millions of flowers seem

"Born to blush unseen,
And waste their sweetness on the desert air."

And Dr. Macmillan, always instructive in his most pleasing books, has dwelt in one of them at great length upon what he calls "neuter flowers," upon what may be called their floral hypertrophy, or inordinate growth in one part accompanied by deficiency in another part; and he takes as illustrations of this, the guelder rose from our English gardens, and the hydrangea from Japanese woods. Thus, in some particulars, these seem to be abortive; an outer ring of flowers is found in each, destitute of the organs indispensable to the future life of plants; they have no stamens or pistils, and are incapable of producing seed, but their corolla, or surrounding crown, is so enlarged as to be four or five times the size of the fertile flower in its centre. Thus Dr. Macmillan remarks: "Paradoxical as it may seem, it can thus be truly said of this plant that it owes its beauty to its imperfection." But this is the case also with other flowers, apparently useless blossoms; it is exactly here where a utilitarian might exclaim, "Why all this waste?" But then from a large variety of such instances seems to come the appearance that the flowers, even of the fruits which drop away as the fruit is formed, show us that God loves beauty for its own sake; and who shall say when anything in either the floral or the animal world, is abortive?

Rather, is it not deeply true that that which seems to us abortive is really potential? instead of being a life lost or frustrated, it is a life incipient, or undeveloped. The nectary from which the bee drinks its honey is what may be called an abortive, or degenerated stamen, and, in the same way, it is most worthy of notice that the bee itself which supplies us with the sweet satisfactions of the honey-comb, the worker in the hive, is itself, also, like the part of the flower from which it drinks the sweet floral dew, what might be called an abortive creature; it is curious that the drone and the queen bee perpetuate the race of bees, but do nothing to build the cell or store the comb. And thus the neuter flower and the honey bee teach the same lesson, which ought to come home with exceeding comfort to some who fancy that their lives have been barren, lost, or wasted, and may help such to see how possible it is to lose a lower life, and in so doing to gain a higher. In the kingdom of flowers, from the hint we have so briefly given, it is very possible to read an analogy to our Lord's great doctrine, "He that loseth his life"—his lower life of sense—"shall find it again in life eternal." Those who are fond of those mystical analogies in which Nature seems to light the way to a spiritual world, will find affluent illustrations from the world of flowers.

From many points of view, flowers and their kindred seem to open before us the largest and most transparent windows through which to watch the wonderful ways of the Divine mind. From their orders we seem to derive the most amazing illustrations of vitality; for instance, it is from their seeds there come to us such amazing hints of the unconquerable power of life. Even that flaunting beauty, never regarded as one of the most charming or desirable of her race, the poppy, tells a wonderful story, as all our readers know. Every poppy-head contains hundreds of minute seeds, and every one of these is chased and engraven with—what shall we say?—exquisite artistic beauty, which can only be descried or detected by the aid of a powerful microscope, and these seeds fall upon the ground by millions, and it would seem that they are destroyed and lost. No, there they lie sleeping as under the influence of their own morphia, and there they will lie for—who shall say how long? There they will lie until some spade, or plough, or any other extraneous action, shall, in however slight a degree, disturb them, and so render them accessible to sunshine, air, and moisture, and then, perhaps, they spring forth in their red flamingo splendour; poppies among the corn, for instance, exciting in the good farmer's mind, perhaps, wonder as to when and how this strange and fashionable tenantry obtained an entrance into his fields.

A pleasing writer, who has a quick eye for the instructions brought to us by the little things of nature, supposes, that many of these wild scarlet vagabonds may have been sleeping in the earth undisturbed, as we said, the great condition of their slumber, since the time, and very long before, England was known on the face of the earth, perhaps even before the time it was known as Britain, biding their time, perhaps, even thousands of years before they experienced the wonderful awaking; such is one of the wonderful illustrations of the vitality of seeds. There are thousands of such; did time and space permit, it would be very interesting to recite them. That beautiful man and accomplished writer, George Wilson, some short time before his death, wrote a poem called "The Sleep of the Hyacinth," with several others. It was privately printed after his death; it was never published, but we are happy to possess a copy. The poem was founded upon the pleasing incident of a bulbous root—a hyacinth—found on the breast of the mummy of an Egyptian princess. After at least three thousand years, it was planted, and bloomed, and furnished George Wilson with a text for what he calls "a mosaic of life, death, and resurrection, natural and spiritual." Before he had finished his poem, he had fallen asleep himself, with the Hyacinth of Immortality locked up in the faith in his own breast, waiting for the blooming of the immortal morning.

Some of the hints and lessons from the world of flowers are, in what must be called their odd-evenness, most impressive, noteworthy and remarkable; they suggest such a quantitative accuracy—a law of numerical relation, a singularly definite arrangement of leaves, flowers and branches. The same is noticeable among the eggs of birds, and many other natural things, but especially with flowers. John Clare, who lived in the country, and set its scenery to the music of his verse, illustrating often keenness of observation as well as tenderness of feeling, says:

"All Nature's ways are mysteries! endless youth
Lives in them all, unchangeable as truth.
With the odd number five her curious laws
Play many freaks, nor once mistake the cause;
For in the cowslip-pips this very day
Five spots appear, which time wears not away,
Nor once mistakes in counting—look within
Each pip, and five, nor more nor less are seen.
So trailing bind-weed, with its pinky cup,
Five leaves of paler hue go streaking up.
And many a bird too keeps the rule alive,
Laying five eggs, nor more nor less than five.
But flowers, how many own that mystic power;
With five leaves ever making up the flower!
The five-leaved grass, mantling its golden cup
Of flowers—five leaves make all for which I stoop.
The briony, in the hedge, that now adorns
The tree to which it clings, and now the thorns,
Owns five-starred pointed leaves of dingy white;
Count which I will, all make the number right.
The spreading goose-grass, trailing all abroad,
In leaves of silver green about the road,
Five leaves make every blossom all along.
I stoop for many, none are counted wrong,
'Tis Nature's wonder, and her Maker's will,
Who bade earth be, and Order owns Him still
As that Superior Power, who keeps the key
Of wisdom and of might, through all eternity."

Flowers have been referred to as setting forth in a very singular manner the mystery of number. As has been said so often, God geometrises, does everything in number, weight and measure. To this Professor Blackie refers in his "Lays and Legends" in the following fragment:

"'Bring a flower;
Count me the petals.'
'They are five.'
'Then count the stamens, that like satellites
Keep circular guard around the central germ.'
'I've told them twice, I think they number ten.'
'Right; and twice five make ten, and so this flower
Divides by five. The Maker of the flower Shaped the proportion; this Pythagoras said.'
'And have all flowers a number?'
'Yes, all things
Are numbered in a calculation far
Beyond the reach of Newton or Laplace.'"

So the mystics appear in all ages to have pored over flowers, and sometimes wisely, sometimes unwisely, have fancied them amongst the windows of the Great King. Most flowers had a mystical meaning; the monk in his cloister garden read many, as in the passion-flower for instance. The poets read others, as in Spenser, and in the speeches of Perdita, and Ophelia in Shakespeare, while whosoever has turned over the pages of Nathaniel Culpepper will see how the old mysteries of medicine, turned to the flower-world, beheld in almost every lesser or larger leaf, shrub or flower the mysterious fingers which held the secrets of life or of death.

But our chief end in such a paper as this is to regard flowers, as certainly our Saviour intended we should regard them, as aids to faith; and not only from such considerations as we have presented, but from many others, they serve this great purpose. While other creatures are moveable and can easily transfer themselves hither and thither at their will, these continue stationary and fulfil their lives in that sphere in which they were born or placed. These nurslings of nature, who neither toil nor spin, and yet are arrayed in robes of such ineffable gorgeousness or grace, were once buried beneath the oppressive weight of the black earth; there we might almost fancy we heard the living principle, shrouded in darkness, in cold obscurity, repining at its lot. But the little bulb or seed could not know how many friends it had, and how they all were helping it; the fingers of the sunbeam were feeling after it, pressing the roots of it. Every colour is a finger of the sunbeam, and in every stage of a flower's growth, now one colour helps it, and now another;—but they are all the ministers of the sunbeam. Then the moisture of the rain felt its way through the mould to refresh it; and so the flower came forth, by no mechanical process, but by ministrations to the life within. Even the very earth, which seems like its tomb, so hard and dark, and cold, is a warm shelter to a little seed and helps it, and then, at length, the podded pearl begins to peep as the little thing goes on from strength to strength until, at last, it graces the garden, adds loveliness to the meadow, or the pathway through the old forest, and says to those who are able to hear it speak, "Why art thou cast down, O thou of little faith?"

"GOD MIGHT HAVE MADE THE EARTH BRING FORTH
ENOUGH FOR GREAT AND SMALL,
THE OAK TREE AND THE CEDAR TREE
WITHOUT A FLOWER AT ALL.
THEN WHEREFORE, WHEREFORE, WERE THEY MADE,
AND DYED WITH RAINBOW LIGHT,
ALL FASHIONED WITH SUPREMEST GRACE,
UPSPRINGING DAY AND NIGHT?
TO COMFORT MAN—TO WHISPER HOPE
WHENE'ER HIS FAITH IS DIM;
FOR WHO SO CARETH FOR THE FLOWER WILL MUCH MORE CARE FOR HIM!"

A Music Lesson.

MARVELLOUS orchestra! concert of heaven,
Mingling more notes than the musical seven
Harmonious discords of treble and bass
In strange combinations of guilt and of grace—
O whose is the ear that can hear you aright,
And note the dark Providence mixt with the light?
Where, where is the eye, more swift to discern
This lesson in music the dull ear should learn,—
That all, from the seraphim harping on high
Down, down to the lowest, fit chords can supply
To the pæan of praises in every tone,
With thunders and melodies circling The Throne!

We are each a brief note in that wonderful hymn,
And to us its Oneness is hazy and dim;
We hear the few sounds from the viol we play,
But all the full chorus floats far and away;
Our poor little pipe of an instant is drown'd
In the glorious rush of that ocean of sound;
The player hears nothing beyond his own bars
Whilst all that grand symphony reaches the stars:
Yet, though our piping seems but little worth,
It adds to the Anthem Creation pours forth,
And, whether we know it or not, we can give
Not a note more or less in the life that we live.

Ah me! we are nothing—or little at best—
But duty with greatness the least can invest:
One note on the flute or the trumpet may seem
A poor petty work for ambition's fond dream,—
But, what if that note be a need-be to blend
And quicken the score, from beginning to end?
To show forth the mind of the Master, who guides
With baton unerring Time's mixture of tides
The good with the evil, the blessing and bane,
The Amazon rushing far into the main,
Until, from this skill'd combination of notes,
Round earth to the heavens His overture floats!

MARTIN F. TUPPER.

ANNALS OF PRISON LIFE IN INDIA.

BY A SENIOR CHAPLAIN.

I.

DURING twenty years' service as military chaplain in India I had the spiritual charge of the inmates of two gaols, a work which, though irksome at first, I learnt ere long to regard as the most interesting and encouraging of all my ministerial duties.

In the first gaol to which I was called upon to minister, no fewer than two thousand native prisoners were incarcerated. With these I had nothing to do, nor, so far as I am aware, did any missionary visit them; and even if I had had time at my disposal to devote to these poor outcasts and speak to them of Jesus, I should not have been allowed, the Indian Government strictly prohibiting chaplains in its service from interfering with the religious opinion of any of its native subjects—a rule which since then has been relaxed. I may, however, mention in passing, as a singular and at the same time significant fact bearing evidence to the small influence which the Hindoo religion has upon the lives of its followers, that out of the two thousand native prisoners, upwards of eight hundred were Brahmins, that is, priests of the Hindoo worship.

My duties in this gaol lay exclusively with the Europeans and Eurasians (half-castes) who were also confined within its walls, though of course in an entirely separate part of the building. The other contained European and Eurasians only, about seventy-five of whom were there on the average during my time, a period extending over six years.

Deeply interesting as was my ordinary and principal work, namely, that amongst the British soldiers, there was none, as I have said, in which, sad and painful though it often proved, I so greatly delighted as that amongst the prisoners. There was something about these poor exiles, who—far from home and all its softening influences, and "set in so many and great dangers"—had fallen victims to the temptations of the Evil One, which touched my pity and compassion.

What agonising confessions of guilt were poured into my ear! What sad, sad tales of temptations to sin yielded to! How many a strong man who rebelling under prison discipline was put into irons, have I seen break down and weep like a child, his heart melting at the reading of the sweet and simple story, that pearl of our Lord's parables—the Prodigal Son.

What signs, too, of the workings of Satan in the heart of unrenewed man, had I not to do battle with in Christ's name! What determination in some to refuse to listen to the "glad tidings of a free salvation!" What bitter anguish of soul have I witnessed in the refractory cells, where, excluded from the light of day, remorse, like the gnawing of the never-dying worm, came over them in all its terribleness, causing them sometimes to lose all hope of mercy, even beyond the grave.

In cases like these the chaplain has to argue with all the force of language at his command, to keep them from utter despair, and lifting up his heart to God, ask Him to give such strength and power to his words—as he endeavours to represent to their minds the love of the Saviour to lost sinners—that these poor stricken ones may embrace the mercy offered by His precious blood-shedding.

Ah! not only among the busy throng of cities are there tragedies daily taking place, but even within the silence and seclusion of prison walls; as it always is and must be, wherever there are human hearts throbing in human bosoms.

"Oh! that I knew where I might find Him."

Such in effect was the pathetic, and at the same time passionate, utterance of a man under sentence of seven years' penal servitude for forgery, whom, as I sat by his narrow cell bed conversing, I was trying to win to a knowledge of a Saviour's love.

Thus the experiences and trials of each individual, the daily annals, if I may so call them, of these poor prisoners' lives, uneventful as they seemed; their frequent struggles against, or yielding to besetting sins, together with confessions of their past history, were sermons to me—natural wells, from which an inexhaustible fund of instruction and warning could be drawn for the benefit of my soldier-flock, when I preached to them of the fearful consequences of sin, or of the Great Healer and his words of mercy.

By far the greater number of the prisoners in the gaol were military men, confined for periods varying from three to twenty years, the crimes in the majority of cases being those of insubordination—delinquencies visited very severely in the army, and justly so, particularly in India, where it is above all things necessary that strict discipline should be maintained.

Besides these military prisoners, however, there were many civilians, a few of whom were persons formerly occupying good positions in society.

One of them had been an uncovenanted servant in H.M. Civil Service, who robbed the Government of between eighty and ninety thousand rupees, whilst another was a man who held a post of trust in the Punjab Railway, and who embezzled from the funds of that company one lac and a half of rupees, corresponding to fifteen thousand pounds in our English currency. A lieutenant in the army was also there under sentence of three years for committing an act of forgery. The poor young fellow, however, did not live to complete his term of servitude, having died of cholera, during an outbreak of that disease amongst the prisoners.

Of the "lifers,"—as they were called in prison phraseology when imprisoned for life—were two men who between them had scuttled a ship off Bombay—the "Aurora." One was the captain of the ship itself, the other a ship-broker. At the time I knew them they were aged respectively forty and fifty five-years, so that in all human probability they had a long sad future of imprisonment before them.

There was also an Italian who had come to India from Naples with his brother, the owner of a brig. In a scuffle with some bad companions he gave a blow to one of them—a Jew—which proved fatal. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, handsome man, and I shall not soon forget the way in which he endeavoured when first I saw him to excuse himself for his presence in the gaol—and it shows also the estimation in which the despised children of Israel are regarded at Naples at any rate. Drawing himself up to his full height, his countenance wearing an expression of intense scorn, he exclaimed, "What do you think those Calcutta judges did? They actually sentenced me to six years' imprisonment—for what? Merely killing a Jew. Only a Jew." Turning away he laughed sardonically, and continued to mutter to himself, "Only a Jew! Ha, ha! Only a Jew," until he had crossed the yard on his way to the prison workshop, in which he was employed, and was out of sight.

One of the cases that, perhaps, interested me most of all, because the most encouraging, was that of a young man, a brother of a minister of the Scotch Church, who had run away from home and enlisted as a private in the army. What a sad story did this poor prodigal unfold! How often he spoke to me, with the tears rolling down his cheeks, of the happiness no longer his; the Sabbath evenings when the great Bible was taken from the shelf, and he, the youngest of the family, the "Benjamin," as his parents called him, was made to read in its pages some familiar chapter! He too had even earlier reminiscences; he could remember how when a little child he had learnt "Gentle Jesus" at his mother's knee. Alas! he could never expect to see her on earth again, for his sentence was of twenty years' duration, and he had only accomplished two. He was, I believe, truly penitent, the tender love he bore his mother being in the first instance the great purifier, till he was at length brought to seek pardon and reconciliation from his Father in Heaven.

Thoughts for the Afflicted.

THE HIDDEN WAY OF GOD.

NOT a pain, O Lord, but Thy children need,
Not a care unsent by Thee,
And our hearts shall sing, and our praises ring,
When the journey's end we see.
It is good to know we may safely trust
To the voice of Love Divine,
While the Hidden Way that we tread to-day
Is that chosen path of Thine.

Not a grief is ours but "our Father" knows
Not a time of strength laid low—
And the heart at rest will indeed be blest,
Since He guides us where to go.
Though the shadows lie on the beaten track,
And the clouds hang thick above,
And we cannot see what our path will be,
We are sure His way is love.

Not a "breaking loose of the silver cord"
When the pain is hard to bear,
But we find relief from our deepest grief
In a Father's tender care.
Oh, we still must sing with a trustful love,
And our wayward wills resign;
While we surely know that the way we go
Is that Hidden Path of Thine!

So we leave our all, with a childlike faith,
In the Hand which guides above,
And the Light will shine on the path Divine
As we trust His faithful love.
It is joy to know (as we gladly lean
On the "Friend" who guides us thus),
What a Father's Hand hath in mercy planned
Is the only way for us.

Then a happy life we may surely lead,
While our hearts in trust shall bow,
And the "one step more" which was dark before,
Hath a "Sunbeam" brightness now!
We will gladly rest in "our Father's" love,
Where the light of Hope must shine,
And we shall not stray in the darkest day,
In that Hidden Path of Thine!

HELEN MOORE.

"Things not Seen."

DEATH is with us, and not with them,
Oh, not with those who go,
'Tis only when our hearts sink down
That heaven echoes "No."

But when along life's daily path
We walk as best we may,
Fair on the Everlasting Hills
Dawns Everlasting Day.

And something strongly in us says:
"Of God must all strength be:
And God is good, and hope hath hold
Of truth, that joy shall see.

"The straight path is as safe by night
As when the sun is high,
And God fills every empty place,
And Love can never die!"

INTERNATIONAL LESSON.

JUNE 5.

THE SAVIOUR LIFTED UP. LUKE XXIII. 32–46.

GOLDEN TEXT, JOHN XII. 32.—'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me.'

CONNECTION.—About one week had passed since the delivery of the parable considered in the previous Lesson—the most solemn week in the history of the world! The present course of Studies passes over the details of our Lord's latest discourses and parables, the Last Supper, His farewell words to the Apostles, and intercessory prayer, with His Agony in the Garden, His two trials, and the condemnation to the Cross. The narrative of St. Luke, so far as it embraces these topics, for the most part runs parallel with those of the other Evangelists; but in the present Lesson, Christ on the Cross, there are some intensely interesting points peculiar to the former. The other three should, however, be compared throughout: Matt. xxvii., Mark xv., John xix.

I. THE CRUCIFIXION.—Read vers. 32–38. What are these malefactors called in Matthew and Mark? 'Robbers' would better have represented the force of the original: they were probably banditti or brigands belonging to the company of Barabbas, driven to lawlessness by the tyranny of the Romans, and at war with society. What prophecy was fulfilled by the association of our Lord with these men? So the mournful procession moves on, amid the tears and wailings of the women who followed, ver. 27, to the place which is called Calvary, not a 'mountain,' though popularly so termed. What was the Hebrew name of the place? (Matt., Mark, John); its meaning? [Possibly, but not certainly, from its smooth rounded form]. Calvary, from the Latin version of the N.T. means the same. The word in the Greek original is Kranion.

> For a statement of the strong reasons for believing that the true site of Calvary is not where tradition has assigned it, at the 'Church of the Holy Sepulchre,' but without the city on the eastern or Temple side, see 'Those Holy Fields,' pp. 101–107.

Words from the Cross.—Of these 'seven words' as they are termed, three are recorded in the present lesson, and are not given by the other Evangelists. The first appears to have been uttered while the Roman soldiers were nailing Jesus to the cross. Father, forgive them: referring first to the soldiers themselves, but with a comprehensive glance of love including all His enemies. They know not what they do; literally true of those poor heathen men, blind instruments in the hands of their superiors; true also of Pilate, who, in his blindness had asked, What is truth? (John xviii. 38); true of Annas and Caiaphas, of the priests and Pharisees, who 'knew not,' because prejudice had blinded their eyes. Compare Acts iii. 17; 1 Cor. ii. 8. Yes, it is true of sinners generally. If they did know sin as it really is,—its evil, its end, could they act as they do? See what St. Paul says of himself, 1 Timothy i. 13.

Is ignorance, then, a reason for forgiveness? No, but a motive for merciful intercession. We may not plead for ourselves on the ground of ignorance: but others may so plead for us. Only the work of Christ can win our pardon. Note how the spirit of the Master appears in His servants; Acts vii. 59, 60.

The Spectators.—How the whole scene, as sketched with a few brief touches in the three verses (35–37), rises to view! First, the executioners, who parted His garments, and cast lots. How many were engaged in this? Why did they cast lots? What Old Testament words are thus brought to mind? See John xix. 23, 24. Next, the crowd—the people—who stood beholding, 'gazing' as at a great and sorrowful sight. Then, thirdly, the rulers, the real instigators of the awful deed: they carry out their work by brutal mockery. He saved others—sceptical words, as uttered by them, but conveying how deep a truth! Matt. and Mark add the words, Himself He cannot save. 'Will not,' the rulers should have said. In this taunt also the soldiers joined, only varying the words. The Jewish rulers said, If He be (the) Christ: these Gentiles, knowing nothing of 'the Messiah,' refer to the other aspect of His claim. If Thou be the King of the Jews, save Thyself. Had those who uttered these words but understood them! Give up Thy work for man! Leave mankind in sin and misery! Let the world be abandoned to dark despair! How right they were, in a sense which they did not comprehend, in saying HE CANNOT! The vinegar was the ordinary sour drink of the Roman soldiers, and was offered, perhaps in mockery and snatched away again, or, perhaps, in rough kindness, to soothe the intolerable thirst which was one of the pangs of crucifixion. The stupefying draught given to criminals before nailing them to the cross He would not drink (Matt., Mark); and afterwards His lips were touched with vinegar just before He died (Matt., Mark, John).

The Inscription on the Cross. This was in three languages, and may well have varied in each. Compare the forms in the four Gospels, and especially the dialogue between the chief priests and Pilate on the subject, as given by John. The Hebrew form is certainly that reported by John, the Latin probably by Mark. Matthew and Luke give the Greek, and are here alike, save that the former introduces the name JESUS. 'These three languages were the three keys to unlock all the languages living in the world. So, without knowing what he was doing, Pilate thus began the publication of Christ to all the world.'—Dr. Stanford.

II. THE DYING MALEFACTORS.—Read vers. 39-43. Had both these dying robbers joined in mocking Jesus? It would seem so from Matt. But perhaps the plural is there put for the singular. See instances in Robinson's 'Harmony,' § 154, note h. If Matthew's notice is to be literally taken, we must conclude that the second robber was brought to a better mind, perhaps through witnessing the way in which Jesus bore His sorrows,* perhaps through remembering some words of teaching or invitation uttered by Him, assuredly by the power and grace of the Holy Spirit, bringing to pass the first fulfilment of Christ's own words in the Golden Text. This dying malefactor was the first 'drawn unto Him.' Observe the greatness of his faith. This robber was the only one in all that multitude to acknowledge that Jesus the crucified was king! The Apostles had fled, the women were heartbroken, Christ's enemies were exultant, His friends had given up all for lost: only this one dying man saw as a certainty the coming kingdom, and humbly prayed, Remember me! He sought no great things, only remembrance. Not, worthy to 'sit on Thy right hand or Thy left,' yet 'let me not be forgotten.' The answer of Jesus was immediate. As his first 'word' had been a prayer that His enemies might be forgiven, so His second is a promise to the humble penitent. Note his assertion of Divine Power even then. He seems to choose the moment of deepest humiliation for the largest promise and gift of love. Verily, I say unto thee, on Mine own right, to-day,† this day of agony, mockery and shame, thou shalt be with Me, still, as thou art with Me now, BUT, in Paradise. So from the Cross He opens the kingdom of glory to the believer. What is Paradise? See Lesson for May 15, page 301.

> The construction of the verse which connects the words to-day with I say unto thee, must, however, be avoided. It is plain that the note of time is attached to the entrance into Paradise.

III. DEATH OF JESUS.—Read vers. 44-50. It was about the sixth hour. According to John, our Lord was still before Pilate at the sixth hour (xix. 14), and Mark states it to have been the third hour when Jesus was crucified (xv. 25). The apparent difference is probably to be explained by different modes of reckoning time.

> See Professor Westcott's elaborate note in the 'Speaker's Commentary,' John xix. According to his view, the sixth hour in John was the sixth hour after midnight (as in the modern way of reckoning) i.e., the hour of sunrise; here in Luke, also Matt., Mark, it is the sixth hour after sunrise, i.e., the hour of noon.

Darkness, miraculous, not, of course caused by an eclipse of the sun, for the moon was at the full; over all the earth, rather, over all the land of Israel, until the ninth hour. Of these three dread hours nothing is recorded. We may well imagine an awful silence over the whole scene. The veil of the Temple, between the Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies; heavy with embroidery and gold, Heb. xix. 3. Rent; a twofold emblem, the departure of the glory of God from the material temple and from the Jewish system; and the opening of the true Holy Place to the access of all believers, Heb. x. 19-22. See Matt. for an account of the earthquake and the opening graves.

> Before the darkness came on, our Lord had commended His mother to the care of the 'beloved disciple' (John). As it passed away He cried, 'Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani!' (Matt., Mark) Psalm xxii. 1. Soon He added, I thirst (John). This one word, it has been remarked, was the only cry of physical anguish wrung from Him through all those hours; and John expressly says that the word was spoken 'that the Scripture might be fulfilled.' Then the vinegar on a sponge was lifted to his lips on a reed (Matt., Mark) or stalk of the hyssop plant (John).

Jesus, dying, cried with a loud voice, showing that He did not expire from physical exhaustion. What was the cry? Doubtless the one word (in orig.) IT IS FINISHED (Tetelestai). His work was done; prophecy accomplished (this is the immediate connection of the word); types and symbols fulfilled; the curse exhausted; the sacrifice completed; man's salvation secured; Christ's glory as Redeemer achieved: see John xvii. 4, 5. Then He breathed forth His spirit, as we are to understand the words gave up the ghost. (So Mark, Matt. has 'He dismissed His spirit'; John, 'He surrendered His spirit'; fulfilling His own words, John x. 18. The words of this great dismissal, Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit, are an echo of Psalm xxxi. 5.

QUESTIONS.

1. Give the different accounts of the inscription on the Cross, and explain their variation.

2. What ancient prophecies were fulfilled by the outward scenes of Calvary?

3. Enumerate the 'Seven words from the Cross' and show how they severally set forth the character and work of the Crucified.

4. Confirm by other passages the truth implied in the words To-day thou shalt be with Me.'

5. Explain the 'Golden Text.' On what occasion were the words spoken? If 'all men' are 'drawn unto Him,' how is it that any are not saved?

---

* Perhaps this robber overheard the prayer of Jesus for His murderers, and so was encouraged to hope. 'Mercy interceded, that misery might pray.'—Augustine.

† A welcome promise, that release should come so soon. The crucified often lingered in their agony for two days or more.

WHO MAKES IT RAIN?

LITTLE Nettie stood by the library-window one morning, watching the rain as it fell in a steady patter, patter, upon the wet sidewalks. When she turned her face towards her father, who sat in his big chair before the fire, one might have fancied that her cheeks were wet with the rain too, and that her eyes were brimming full of raindrops.

"O papa," she said with trembling lip, "it has spoiled all my pleasure! Just think of all of us, the nice carriage-load, all going up to the lake on that lovely picnic! and—then—then—look at this rain!"

Nettie's tears poured in showers, and she sank upon the sofa burying her face among the pillows.

Her father, who dearly loved his little girl, went towards the sofa; and, gently placing her upon his knees, he talked very kindly to her about her disappointment, and told her that he was very sorry for her; then he said:

"Nettie, who makes the rain?"

"Why, God makes it, you know, papa. No one else can make the rain come."

"Well, Nettie, why does God send the rain? Is it for good, or for evil?"

"For good, I guess; only—only—if He only would not let it rain to-day, I should be very glad."

"But supposing God wanted it to rain to-day, my daughter?" said her papa very seriously.

"Did God really want it to rain to-day, papa?" said Nettie with wondering eyes. "Then I will not say another word about it. I want it to rain too, just because God knows what is best. Why, papa, I never thought about it before; but it seems to me that it is a wicked thing to fret about the weather, whatever it is, for God sends it, and He always does right. I wish I could forget my own wishes when God wants to do anything." And the little girl kneeled upon her knees in her father's lap, and asked God to forgive her for her complaining of the rain and teach her to love whatever was his holy will, whether it suited her or not, for Jesus Christ's sake.

There was sunshine in that home all the rest of the day, in spite of the pattering rain without; and, better than all, Nettie was never heard to utter a complaint about the weather again.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

NO. XIX.

Double Acrostic.

Two gentle and beautiful creatures, emblems of Christ and of the Holy Spirit.

1. Who was cast into a den of lions?
2. The last letter of the Greek alphabet.
3. A name for the poison of asps.
4. The high priest in the time of Nehemiah.

NO. XX.

Double Acrostic.

Two gates of knowledge.

1. Who took the forbidden fruit?
2. How does God pardon?
3. What should we do with God's sayings?

M. A. B.

NO. XXI.

Double Acrostic.

Two mountains.

1. The land of promise.
2. What was made at the death of Jairus' daughter?
3. The place where Moses struck the rock.
4. Where did the shepherds find the Saviour lying?
5. An ancestress of the reader and writer.
6. One of the fenced cities of Judah attacked by Sennacherib.

The initials read downwards, the finals upwards.

C. B. B.

NO. XXII.

Single Acrostic.

1. The father of the line of high priests.
2. The father of Samson.
3. The father of Jonadab the abstainer.
4. The father of King Hezekiah.
5. The father of Lamech.

The initials give the name of the father of Moses.

Monthly Religious Record.

IT might be deemed an Hibernian witticism or blunder, were we to say that the May meetings began this year in March; yet the great gathering which took place just twelve days after the festival of Ireland's patron saint—on the 29th of that month—might fairly be regarded as the first and among the most important of those great religious and benevolent assemblies which are usually thus designated. The meeting to which we refer was, indeed, something more than an anniversary. It was at once the celebration of a jubilee, and the virtual inauguration of a new foundation. Exeter Hall, opened just fifty years ago, by a joint-stock company, and thus owned during the past half-century, has now passed into the hands of a great benevolent and religious organisation, of world-wide activity, which, at that period, had not yet come into existence. Thanks to the munificence of a few large-hearted and public-spirited gentlemen, Exeter Hall, which there was a threat, at one time, of desecrating by transforming it into a theatre—has become the property and the home of the Young Men's Christian Association, which will offer a hospitality to kindred institutions not less cordial than that which was accorded by its late proprietary. The hall has been greatly improved and beautified. Indeed, the lower part of the premises required almost complete rebuilding, so as to afford better means of ingress to, and egress from the large hall. On this gratifying occasion, the chair was taken by the Earl of Shaftesbury, as President of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the meeting was addressed by, among others, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Earl Cairns, and the Lord Mayor. As the late Rev. Daniel Wilson, before he became Bishop of Calcutta, at the first meeting held in the hall commended it to the blessing of Almighty God, so his honoured son, the venerable Prebendary Daniel Wilson, Vicar of Islington, discharged a like duty on this occasion of the Young Men's Christian Association taking possession of the renovated building.

VERY different is the fate of Surrey Chapel, in which, a few days before Exeter Hall was re-opened, a religious service had been held for the last time, and which probably will be in course of demolition before the sheet now under perusal reaches the reader's hands. This famous old building which, by the lapse of the lease of the land, has now reverted to the freeholders, was opened by the Rev. Rowland Hill on the 8th June 1783. He continued to minister in it during fifty years, and died, at the age of eighty-eight, in the parsonage adjoining. In anticipation of the expiration of the lease, the congregation purchased a freehold site in the Westminster Bridge Road, erected the new "Christ Church," and, with their present minister, migrated thither. The last public gathering in Surrey Chapel was held on the 21st of March, when the building was densely crowded.

WE have already mentioned (pp. 207, 287) the two clerical memorials addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury—the one in favour of toleration in ritual; the other known as the "counter-memorial," promoted by the Evangelical party. Omitting all mention of some minor addresses to the Primate on this vexed question, which have been called forth by recent events, we may refer to two whose importance entitles them to this brief notice. These are the two lay memorials on ritual—the one praying for toleration, the other adverse to it. Both have obtained the signatures of a number of noblemen and gentlemen of position and influence. The subscribers to the latter document (promoted by the Evangelicals) respectfully express to the Primate their firm attachment to the doctrines and ceremonial established in the Church of England at the Reformation, and set forth in the Book of Common Prayer. They add: "We desire to represent to your Grace that, whilst we are most anxious to maintain such reasonable latitude of opinion and practice as is not inconsistent with the teachings of the formularies, articles, and homilies of the Church of England taken in their plain, grammatical sense, or with a faithful adherence to the rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer, as interpreted by the custom of three hundred years, we nevertheless feel ourselves constrained to enter our solemn and emphatic protest against the toleration within the Church of England of any doctrines or practices which favour the restoration of the Romish Mass, or any colourable imitation thereof, any reintroduction of the confessional, or any assumption of sacerdotal pretensions on the part of the clergy in the ministration of the Word and Sacraments." This memorial has been already signed by upwards of two thousand noblemen and gentlemen, amongst whom are the Dukes of Portland, Westminster, and Abercorn.

THE Rev. S. F. Green, Rector of St. John's, Miles Platting, near Manchester, has been arrested, under a writ for contempt of court by persisting in illegal Ritualistic practices. Mr. Green, at the time of writing this, is imprisoned in Lancaster Castle gaol as a first-class misdemeanant. In all the Ritualistic churches of Manchester the day following his arrest (Sunday), the prayers of the congregations were asked for the Rev. S. F. Green, that he might be endowed with patience to bear the sufferings involved in his imprisonment. Services were held in Mr. Green's church, as usual, the curate officiating, and there was no alteration in regard to the Ritualistic practices. Another of the incriminated Ritualistic clergy, the Rev. Mr. Enraght, has been in imminent peril of being re-committed to prison, on the ground of renewed contempt of court, in practising illegal ritual, since his release on the technical plea mentioned in an earlier number (p. 207). Having given notice, however, of a further appeal in his case, the enforcement of the threatened penalty has been in the meantime suspended. The case of the leader of those among the clergy who refuse, in matters of religious ceremonial, to obey either their bishops or the ecclesiastical courts, the Archbishops or the Queen's judges (except only when decisions are given in favour of themselves and their party)—the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie—is also under appeal before the highest tribunal, the House of Lords.

THE Lord Mayor of London (the Right Hon. Alderman William McArthur, M.P.,) and the Lady Mayoress, lately welcomed to the Mansion House the friends of the London City Mission, of whose committee his lordship is a leading member. The company numbered over six hundred; and at the meeting which formed part of the evening's proceedings, there were present on the platform the Earl of Shaftesbury, Mr. Sheriff Waterlow, Sir W. T. Charley (Common Serjeant), Mr. A. McArthur, M.P., Mr. George Palmer, M.P., and others. At a formal meeting held at one period of the evening in the Egyptian Hall, Mr. F. A. Bevan (an honorary secretary of the mission) described the work of the mission. The Lord Mayor, in addressing his visitors, said he believed the Chief Magistrate for the time being could be engaged in no better duty than in assisting such institutions as that. He desired to join in an appeal for the enlargement of the mission, as the number of its workers was clearly not adequate to the mass of crime and destitution with which they had to deal. Lord Shaftesbury, in the course of his speech, congratulated, amid cheers, the Lord Mayor on the escape of himself and family and household from the infamous plot which, but two days before, had been unsuccessfully attempted against the Mansion House. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. R. C. Billing, Mr. Stevenson Blackwood, and other speakers; and afterwards there was a selection of vocal music performed.

ANOTHER gathering which recently took place at the Mansion House had as its object to promote the erection on the Thames Embankment of a statue to William Tyndale, the first translator of the English Bible. The statue is to be of bronze. The meeting was addressed by the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Bishop of Cork, Professor Plumptre, and the Rev. Dr. Donald Fraser, in furtherance of the object for which it had been convened. A vote of thanks was presented to the Lord Mayor on the motion of the Rev. Dr. Moffat, who gave an interesting account of how he, while in Africa, translated portions of the Bible into the Sechuana language.

THE sixteenth annual meeting of the Church Association was held recently in Willis's Rooms; Mr. Charles H. Lovell, Deputy-Chairman of the Council, presiding. Captain Palmer, the secretary, read portions of the annual report, in which the council of the association claimed from all true members of the Church sympathy and support, as representing an association of Churchmen combined for defence of the Protestant principles and order of the National Church. The country at large had almost unanimously rejected the claim of the contumacious clergymen to be accounted martyrs for conscience' sake, but all parties were agreed that the more fitting remedy by deprivation should, as soon as possible, be provided to meet such cases. The council, desiring to extend the operations of the association to educational work, had decided to offer prizes for the best essays on the distinctive doctrines of the Church. Twenty new branches of the association had been formed since the last meeting. Contributions and costs in decided cases had raised the amount received for the guarantee fund to 47,706*l.* The total sum paid for legal and parliamentary expenses since the establishment of the association had been 46,464*l.* The general fund, with balance brought forward, amounted to 5,054*l.*, and the expenditure during the year was 4,930*l.* Mr. Newdegate, M.P., in moving the adoption of the report, said that if an attempt were made at comprehension which should sacrifice the distinctive doctrines of the Church, she would cease to be the Church described in her own Nineteenth Article. The Hon. H. Tollemache, the Rev. J. C. Goodhart, Mr. Maden Holt, and other gentlemen, having addressed the meeting, resolutions were passed condemning the efforts now being made to secure toleration for the use of vestments and practices adopted in the Church of Rome, and also any proposal to limit the right of parishioners to resist illegalities on the part of the clergy by reference to the wishes of those who might become habitual communicants in the parish church.

An interesting paper was read at a recent meeting of the Royal Historical Society, by the Rev. A. R. Pennington, on "John Colet, Dean of St. Paul's, in the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII.," in which, after an account of his early training, he observed that he was the first in this country and Europe to give utterance at Oxford to those primary ideas on the study of Holy Scripture which are now universally accepted. He then described the system of the schoolmen which had hitherto reigned supreme in the University, showing that the Bible had become in their hands a mere arsenal of texts, which they employed to weave their theological subtleties. Colet, on the contrary, laboured at Oxford to show that Scripture was a whole. He dwelt especially on the Gospels as a vivid account of the life and teaching of Christ. His lectures produced a wonderful impression. The great Erasmus came here under his influence. An explanation of his design in founding St. Paul's School was then given. This was followed by a description of three sermons which he preached—the one before Convocation in St. Paul's Cathedral, in which he denounced the vices of many who were there assembled; the second before Henry VIII., in which he rebuked his warlike policy; and the third before Cardinal Wolsey in Westminster Abbey, in which he addressed to him words of warning and exhortation. An account was then given of his visit to Canterbury Cathedral with Erasmus, where he ridiculed the relics of Thomas à Becket, which was followed by a reference to his death and to the high eulogium which Erasmus pronounced upon him as one of the two best Christians whom the world in his time had seen.

The Commission of the General Assembly of the National Church of Scotland had before it, at a recent meeting, reports in connection with the Blantyre Mission case from the Foreign Missions Committee, the Special Committee on the matter, and the Rev. Dr. Rankin (Muthill), the General Assembly's Special Commissioner to Blantyre to make inquiries. The report of the Special Committee stated that, "as the appointment of your committee originated in the publication of a pamphlet by Mr. Chirnside, frequently alluded to, justice obliges your committee to concede that Mr. Chirnside's pamphlet is, unhappily, more nearly a statement of facts than they had hoped to find it when they began to look into the matter last year. Mr. Chirnside has been inaccurate as to some dates. He has written in a sensational manner, so as to enhance the horrors of which he treats; he has shown a distinct animus against the mission; he has exaggerated and mis-stated facts as to a prison underground, as to the giving up of fugitive slaves, and as to the feelings of the natives towards the mission. But as regards the execution of the man who was the murderer, or supposed murderer, and the floggings inflicted, your committee regret to say he is, in their opinion, substantially correct." The Foreign Missions Committee reported that at a previous meeting they had resolved to recall the Rev. Duff Macdonald, the head of the mission, and two other persons connected with the mission. Dr. Rankin's report stated that cruelty appears in only two distinct cases. It must be remembered, whilst deploring all that has been detailed, that while the points of accusation are practically all confined to one quarter of a year, the same persons, for five years in some instances, and for half of that period in others, have been doing undoubtedly good and successful work. Precautions have already been taken to secure order without unlawful assumption of authority, or undue severity of any kind. After discussion, the commission adopted a series of resolutions regretting that the agents of the Church who were sent to Blantyre were not instructed that they must not, in any circumstances, attempt to exercise civil jurisdiction; condemning in the strongest terms, and bitterly deploring, the conduct of which certain of these agents, assuming that jurisdiction, were, on various occasions, guilty in the earlier days of the mission; and declaring satisfaction that such conduct has for nearly two years entirely ceased. The Commission also recognised, by resolution, the good work done by the missionaries.

From Spain we have the satisfactory intelligence that Señor Antonio Martinez, a preacher of the gospel, imprisoned, as stated last month (p. 288), for having held in the exercise of his ministry a meeting of more than twenty persons, has, on the advice of the Cabinet, received a pardon from the king, and has been released from custody. As in any case of this kind the slightest inexactitude may be taken advantage of in order to throw suspicion upon a well-authenticated statement, we must add that Martinez was imprisoned in the town (not province) of Tarragona; and that the name of the town in which the alleged offence was committed is Barbera, in the province of Catalonia. We are glad to learn that the judicial proceedings which had been instituted against several other Protestants have been abandoned, and that the prospects of religious liberty in Spain are much brighter than they were but lately.

According to the "Academy," letters from the Church Missionary Society's agents on the Victoria Nyanza give the intelligence that King Mtesa, of Uganda, was contemplating a war with Mirambo, of Unyamwezi, which would indeed be a most serious matter, considering the number of Europeans now scattered about in East Central Africa. Mtesa has just been engaged in a sanguinary war with the people of Usoga, who live near that part of the lake where the Nile flows out over the Ripon Falls, and, we are told, "is clearly not the amiable creature described by Mr. H. M. Stanley, his present conduct agreeing more closely with the earlier account given of him by Captain Speke. He is said to be impelled in his present course of action by the Arabs, and his recent profession of Mohammedanism is thought to be part of the same general policy."

We regret to record the death of Sir Charles Reed, M.P., the chairman of the London School Board, which occurred at his residence, Earlsmead, Edmonton, on March the 25th. A life of extensive public usefulness and of incessant activity in the promotion of religious, educational, and philanthropic objects is thus brought to a sudden close. His remains were laid to rest in Abney Park Cemetery, in the presence of a great concourse of friends, including deputations from various public bodies. For some attempt to enumerate the many labours of love which that life embodied, we must refer our readers to a biographical sketch which appeared in the "Leisure Hour," with a portrait, in 1877. Sir Charles was preceded to the grave but a few weeks by a man considerably his senior and remarkably different from him in habit and temperament, but who ought not to pass unmentioned in these pages. Albion Chapel, London Wall, which was built to accommodate the crowds who, somewhat more than sixty years ago, flocked to hear the eloquent young minister, who had then just arrived from Scotland, the Rev. Alexander Fletcher, is now a thing of the past. Another young Scotch minister, John Young, became his successor in the pulpit of that place of worship, which belonged to the body now known as United Presbyterians. Here Mr. Young laboured acceptably for some years. Long ago he resigned his charge and devoted himself to laborious study and the production of works of a philosophical and theological character, which brought him from his own University the degree of LL.D. He will be best known as the author of "The Christ of History," "The Province of Reason," and "The Life and Light of Men." Dr. Young enjoyed the high esteem of all who knew him for his moral worth, as well as for his learning and ability. His age was seventy-five.

 We take the earliest opportunity of correcting an error which appears in the account of Athens in our March part (p. 200). Dr. Hill writes to state that "there has never been any picture of the Mother of God placed in the school" of the Protestant Episcopal Mission in that city. The writer of the paper must have been sadly misinformed, and we greatly regret that the mis-statement should have appeard.

PONTIUS PILATE.

"When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it."—Matt. xxvii. 24.

PONTIUS PILATE.

(See John xviii. 28; —xix. 16; Luke xxiii.; Matthew xxvii.)

THE character of Pilate, as it is brought out in the scene of our Lord's trial, is an interesting study to those who would trace the workings of natural conscience when it is brought into closer contact than usual with the truth of God, or with Him who is the truth. We see, indeed, little or no evidence of any saving, or even of any deeply serious, impression. But we see emotions of natural pity; and we see more—we see the convictions and relentings, the compunction and hesitation, of a natural sense of duty, and a natural feeling of remorse. He went farther, indeed, in this way, than most of the other princes of this world who, in their official capacity, had to deal, not merely with the religion of Jesus (which is the common case now), but with Jesus himself. Herod of Galilee, who had been first the Baptist's patron and then his persecutor, for a long time desired to see Jesus; but when his desire was gratified, and Jesus, sent by Pilate, stood before him on his trial, the crafty "fox" evaded the question, and having carelessly insulted the Saviour, as carelessly dismissed him. Felix, when Paul, arraigned as the prisoner, stood as the preacher before him, and reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come—trembled; but he sent him away till a more convenient season. Agrippa, partly perhaps in courtly compliment to the unrivalled eloquence of the defence to which he listened, partly in sincere admiration of the inspired pleader, and partly also under a real impression of there being more in his theme than he had before imagined, avowed himself almost persuaded to be a Christian. But the workings of the mind of Pilate were surely deeper, or at least the history gives us a deeper insight into them. There is so much of apparent history in the conflict of his soul, between his own evident reluctance to be instrumental in so foul a deed, and the unrelenting importunity of those who cruelly practised on his weakness, that we cannot refuse our compassion, and we almost yield our sympathy. And, on the other hand, in what he saw of the holy and awful majesty of the Lord Jesus and in the solemn words which he heard from his lips, as once and again, nay, repeatedly, he conferred with him face to face, away from the clamours of his Jewish accusers, in his own private hall of audience, there is so close and cogent an application of the Divine word, in circumstances the most intensely affecting, to his whole moral nature, that we cannot but regard it as one of the most remarkable cases on record of the Spirit of the Lord striving with man.

What sort of man, either as an individual or as a governor, Pilate was, we have scarcely any means of determining. Other historians, whether Jewish or Gentile, say very little either of his personal character or of his public administration; and, beyond their narrative of our Lord's trial before him, the sacred writers mention only one particular regarding him. In the Gospel by Luke (xiii. 1), allusion is made to his having perpetrated an act of cruelty on some Galileans, who, it is probable, having come up to Jerusalem to worship at one of the festivals, were slain by his orders in the very midst of the solemnity, so that their blood was mingled with their sacrifices. This severity may have been inflicted on some pretence of tumult or of political disaffection; for the Roman governors were jealous, and not without reason, of the great concourse of strangers from the country districts at such seasons to Jerusalem; and in particular, they had some cause to suspect the natives of Galilee of an inclination to be turbulent and seditious.

Pilate, we may well believe, was not better—in respect of cruelty and rapacity—than the ordinary class of Roman governors of the day. Nor was he worse. The fact of its having fallen to him to judge our Lord, and of his having actually caused Him to be crucified, is apt to leave on our minds an impression of this nature. Strongly condemning his treatment of the Saviour, we form exaggerated notions of the injustice and bloodthirstiness of his character, and conclude that he must have been a very monster so to deal with the Holy One. In this way the lesson which his conduct is fitted to teach is rendered far less pointed and profitable than it might be.

Pilate was a Roman, probably of good family, a soldier and senator of considerable rank, and Cæsar's deputy. As rumours circulated through his court of a remarkable commotion, first among the Jewish multitude resorting daily in crowds to the Temple to see and hear this extraordinary person, who had made a kind of triumphant entry into Jerusalem; and then among the Jewish authorities, all alive and on the alert respecting Him; and still further, as the news of this mysterious individual being arrested, and the hasty convening of the Sanhedrim, and the hurried trial and condemnation before that tribunal, and the feverish excitement of the public mind which the affair was creating; as the news of these things passed around the circle of his attendants, the haughty Roman might listen with an air of real or affected unconcern, as to a mere idle breath of popular folly; and wondering perhaps what was turning the Jewish world upside down.

If so, he must have been somewhat startled when, most unexpectedly, the cause was suddenly transferred to his own judgment-seat, and the whole case brought under his own immediate cognizance. He must now entertain and dispose of a question which otherwise he might have regarded as altogether out of his way. He must meet with this Jewish teacher, who might be supposed to belong to an entirely different sphere from his own, and enter on a discussion which in his ordinary manner of life he would have little dreamed of. It is a somewhat strange position into which this great man is abruptly brought; and it is most interesting to observe how, in that position, he conducts himself. From the very outset he is embarrassed and uncomfortable, and all throughout the trial he makes successive attempts to evade any decision of the matter.

But before proceeding farther, let us adjust the local scenery of this most tragic drama.

When the Jewish leaders brought Jesus to Pilate

(John xviii. 28), they would not enter his house. They were at that time eating the passover—that is, they were keeping the paschal-feast; for the expression is to be understood not merely of the first act of the solemnity—their killing and eating the paschal-lamb, which in the present case was probably over—but of all the subsequent rites and observances during the days of unleavened bread. That they might thus keep the feast acceptably, they must scrupulously, as they believed, abstain during the whole course of it, and especially on the day of preparation for the Sabbath, which this was, from going into a heathen dwelling, and so contracting defilement. In compliance with their scruples, however frivolous and superstitious he might think them, Pilate went out to them to the palace-gate, where, according to eastern custom, was his public seat of audience (ch. xix. 13). There, during the whole of this transaction, he conducted his intercourse with the Jews; but from time to time he took Jesus himself into his own house, or inner hall of judgment, for the purpose of more private trial and examination (ch. xviii. 33; xix. 9). It is necessary to bear this in memory, in attempting to bring before the mind's eye the several incidents of the trial.

I. Meeting the Jews, then, at the door of his palace, Pilate asks what accusation they bring against the man whom they have in custody; and at first he will scarcely attend to the accusers. "He is a malefactor, you say, else you would not have brought Him here (ch. xviii. 30, 31). Be it so. It is some ordinary case of crime, some religious contention, or some breach of the peace, such as are now become too common for me to be troubled with them all. Decide it yourselves. 'Take ye Him, and judge Him according to your law;' I give you full authority and warrant."

Pilate, however, is not to get so easily off. This is a more serious matter than he thinks. "It is a capital offence with which this criminal is charged, and 'it is not lawful for us to put any man to death'" (ver. 31). His crime is treason against Cæsar, and Cæsar's deputy must look to it: "We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a king" (Luke xxiii. 2). Pilate, therefore, has no alternative; he must look into the accusation. He takes Jesus, accordingly, into the inner judgment-hall in his palace, thinking probably that a very short inquiry will suffice.

If this man takes the title of King of the Jews, as his accusers allege, brief work may be made of his case. And He does acknowledge the title; but then He adds an explanation which opens up an entirely new view of the affair. He is a king; but his kingdom is not of this world. It does not therefore interfere with Cæsar's (John xviii. 33–36). The Jews who accused Him knew, or might have known, this; but they did not choose to make it known to Pilate, for it was necessary for their purpose that Jesus should be charged before Pilate with a political crime. Hence they did not bring Him to Pilate's bar as a blasphemer, in which character they themselves, in their own spiritual court, had previously tried and condemned Him. They were well aware that Pilate, a Gentile and an unbeliever, would not, as a civil magistrate, have dealt with that offence; at least not in that view of it which their religion might suggest. They accused Jesus, therefore, as a rebel and traitor, as claiming for himself royal rights and honours, and denying them to Cæsar, the Roman emperor, whose authority Pilate must uphold. Nor would it have served their end to say, that He made himself a king in any spiritual or religious sense. They would have Pilate to believe that He sought political power inconsistent with that of Cæsar. Jesus at once, and simply, removes this impression. There is no cause of alarm. He asserts no authority which can at all interfere with that of any lawful earthly government.

But, at the same time, He does assert an authority of a high and sacred character, and in a way which seems to strike his judge (ver. 37). "Thou art a king then?" "I am," is the Lord's reply; "and I am more—I am a witness unto the truth." "What is truth?" says Pilate, jesting, perhaps, and not waiting for an answer, thinking by a jest to turn away the appeal which has already come too closely home to him. Now, he would fain persuade himself, he sees how the case stands. "This is one of your sages, your contemplative dreamers, not made for this world, as this world is not made for them. He has got hold of some fragments of our wildest and most unearthly philosophy—a visionary king—Himself his only kingdom—enamoured of some fond fancy which He chooses to call the truth! It might be curious, in some idle hour, to settle with Him what this same truth may be. Meanwhile, He must be acquitted of any grave offence; at the least, He is clearly harmless. 'I find in Him no fault at all.'"

The subsequent conduct of Pilate exhibits a melancholy picture. Whatever air of light-hearted levity he may assume or affect, and however he may try, in his rejoinder to the Lord, to turn the edge of the Spirit's sword,—the quick and powerful word so authoritatively spoken by Him whose word it is,—we see plainly that he is not at his ease. To this extent, at least, he is now evidently in earnest, that he is most anxious to rescue Jesus out of the hands of his accusers. And the very anxiety of the Jews to obtain his blood only increases Pilate's desire to save Him. He perceives that there is, that there must be, some high interest at stake, else these formal hypocrites would not be so eager and zealous in the matter. "They are not in general such warm friends of Cæsar and of Cæsar's power, these rulers of the Jews. They are not commonly so sensitive in regard to treason against the emperor as to persist in an accusation so evidently groundless as this. There must be more at the bottom of this affair than at first sight appears." Thus from the very beginning of this strange trial, and all throughout, more and more, the pertinacity of the Jews tends to deepen the impression made on Pilate's mind, increases his concern, and makes him the more impatient for an adjustment.

II. When therefore the Jews, instead of acquiescing in his judgment of acquittal, reiterated the more impetuously their charge against Jesus as seditious, and by way of aggravation, referring to the extent of the mischief, spoke of his labours in Galilee,—"And they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place" (Luke xxiii. 5),—Pilate eagerly catches the hint. He will send the case to Herod, within whose jurisdiction Galilee lies, and, fortunately, Herod happens to be at this time in Jerusalem: "When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were a Galilean. And as soon as he knew that He belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time" (Luke xxiii. 6, 7). If there is any truth in the charge brought against Jesus as a subverter of the government, it is plainly in Galilee, the ordinary place of his ministrations, that the offence must have been chiefly committed, and not in Judea, which He has only occasionally visited. It belongs therefore to Herod, as tetrarch of Galilee, ruling that province under Cæsar, to deal with this rival king;—and the rather because he knows such cases of old, having once been the admirer and follower of just such a prophet, his friend and patron, entertaining him at this court, his devoted disciple, hearing him gladly.

Thus Pilate thought that he might evade the necessity of coming to a decision in regard to Jesus and his claims. "Let Herod be the judge; send the case, by all means, to Herod; he is on all accounts the proper person to dispose of it."

But this expedient will not stand Pilate in stead. It is to prove a more troublesome business than he could have imagined, and he cannot easily divest himself of the responsibility connected with it. Jesus comes back to him, scourged, indeed, and buffeted, but not judged,—neither absolved nor condemned. Herod mocks Him and sets Him at naught: "And Herod with his men of war set him at naught, and mocked Him, and arrayed Him in a gorgeous robe, and sent Him again to Pilate" (Luke xxiii. 11). But not in that way is the question to be set at rest. The cause is still undetermined, and Pilate has to determine it.

What, then, is to be done? The Jews will not be satisfied. They insist on a sentence. It avails not to tell them that neither Pilate nor Herod finds in Jesus any fault worthy of death. Will Pilate then at once discharge Him, and so run the risk of being represented to the Roman emperor as shielding a traitor to his power? or will he give Him up, notwithstanding his impression of his innocence, to the doom of a convicted malefactor?

But yesterday, and in any other case, it would probably have cost Pilate scarce a moment's thought to decide on this latter alternative, and sacrifice an individual, however guiltless, to his own interests and the interests of his imperial master's authority. And even now, perhaps, he wonders at his own weakness. Whence this unwonted hesitation, these unprecedented scruples, in his mind? Why does Pilate not avow and follow out his convictions, whithersoever they may lead? Why, at least, does he not do justice to Him in whom he finds no fault? Alas! he will attempt another compromise. He sees a way, as he fondly thinks, by which, without committing himself, he may deliver Jesus.

III. Resuming his place at the palace gate, amid much painful perplexity—perplexity increased by the remarkable warning given him by his wife, who sent to him, saying, "Have thou nothing to do with that just man; for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him" (Matt. xxvii. 19); thus divided and distracted between his own and his wife's conscientious feelings and apprehensions on the one hand, and the unrelenting and persevering importunity of the Jews on the other, Pilate bethinks himself of an expedient. He will take advantage of the custom of the feast to release a prisoner, and that prisoner shall be Jesus: "Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people; and, behold, I, having examined Him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse Him: no, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him." He proposes therefore to "chastise Him, and release Him." For he adds, "Ye have a custom, that I should release unto you one at the passover: will ye therefore that I release unto you the King of the Jews?" (Luke xxiii. 13–17; John xviii. 39.)

Thus Pilate thinks to avoid the necessity of pronouncing judgment, and yet save Jesus.

He selects one of the worst and most atrocious criminals then in custody, to be offered to them along with Jesus; and though, as Luke tells us, he three successive times most earnestly and pathetically beseeches the people to choose Jesus, he has the deep mortification of hearing their reiterated and impatient cry, "Not this man, but Barabbas," although "Barabbas was a robber" (John xviii. 39, 40).

What is it that has come over the spirit of this Pilate, usually stern and decided enough in every act of his administration? If his leanings are really toward Jesus, why does he not think, why does he not act for himself! Is he ashamed—is he afraid to speak out? And does he really imagine that he clears himself from the guilt of partaking in this great sin of other men, by the pitiful ceremony of the washing of his hands, and the hollow protest of his lips, "I am innocent"—he who had but to raise one finger of these hands, or to utter one breath of these lips, and not a single stroke would have fallen upon Jesus, not a hair of his head would have been touched?

Yet it is a characteristic circumstance this washing of his hands. It brings out in marked contrast the weakness of the judge and the violence of the accusers; and it throws light on the brief struggle that follows: "And the governor said, Why, what evil hath He done? But they cried out the more, saying, Let Him be crucified. When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it. Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children" (Matt. xxvii. 23–25).

IV. Weary of resistance, Pilate seems reluctantly to have given over Jesus to be scourged, perhaps with some faint hope that this preliminary severity, which, according to the barbarous custom of that time, preceded the punishment of death, might satiate the cruelty of his persecutors; and that the people, moved by the spectacle of suffering and shame, might yet relent, and interpose to save Him from the cross: "Then Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged Him. And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and they put on Him a purple robe, and said, Hail, King of the Jews! and they smote Him with their hands. Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring Him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in Him. Then came Jesus forth wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man!" (John xix. 1–5.)

The concession only stimulated the fury of his adversaries. So far from being melted to pity by an exhibition which Pilate might think enough to soften the very stones, the Jews were provoked the more by these repeated delays; and the sight of blood, streaming from under the crown of thorns down that holy head, served but to whet their appetite for more. "Behold the man!" says Pilate, pointing to that scourged and bleeding sufferer, whose meek endurance might have disarmed the very wrath of devils! But all the more "the chief priests and officers cried out, Crucify him, crucify him" (John xix. 6).

And now, perceiving clearly the sort of man with whom they had to deal—emboldened by Pilate's evident distress, and presuming on his irresolution, the Jews lay aside all disguise and press at once to their point. They no longer consider it necessary to keep up so much as the form of an accusation of treason. They avow the real cause of their hostility. Not even professing to submit to Pilate's judgment, they seem to reckon confidently on his accommodating himself to theirs. Seeing that he has not firmness to decide according to his own views, they gather courage, and require him broadly and nakedly to decide according to theirs: "The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law He ought to die, because He made himself the Son of God" (John xix. 7).

V. But they had well-nigh overshot the mark. The expression which they let fall renewed all Pilate's scruples, and once more shook his purpose—"He made Himself the Son of God." "Made himself! Can it be that He really is so? It may be, then"—as Pilate from the first could not help surmising—"that this Jesus has authority, and witnesses truth." He has the authority of God; He witnesses the truth of God; for He is the Son of God. He said so. These Jews now tell Pilate that He said so; and they let out that it was because He said so that they hated and would crucify Him. It turns out that their pretence of jealousy about Cæsar's prerogative is but a blind and false colour. Something far more awful is here really involved. Pilate sees this clearly now; and, seeing it, may he not even now stop short and retrace his steps? As it is, he once more pauses and resumes his examination.

O that he had but given fair play to his own convictions!—he might even yet have been saved and blessed. He has another precious opportunity. Once more, away from all Jewish clamours, in the inner hall of judgment, the judge confers with his prisoner. Jesus "is led as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not his mouth." "When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he was the more afraid; and went again into the judgment hall, and saith unto Jesus, Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer" (John xix. 8, 9). His silence is the silence, not of disrespect, but of awful, divine authority. He has met the charge already brought against Him. He has explained what might give rise to the accusation of treason; and, in doing so, He has said enough to determine Pilate's decision, and Pilate is bound to decide. This new question, so earnestly put, is not necessary or relevant; it is not to the point, it is not to the purpose. "Whence art thou?" asks the trembling Roman—"Whence art thou, that thou shouldst make thyself the Son of God?"

Dost thou ask this, O Pilate! as an inquirer? Wilt thou also be his disciple? If so, thou shalt not long be at a loss for an answer. Thou art not far from one even now. It is in thy heart already, if out of thy heart thou wouldst allow thy mouth to speak.

Meanwhile thy function as judge is not yet discharged. There is a case before thee to be disposed of, and there are all the elements for disposing of it. Do justice according to the dictates of thine own conscience, not according to the prejudices and passions of others. Till then Jesus is silent.

Vexed by this silence, and provoked perhaps by the calm demeanour of the Lord, contrasting so painfully with his own agitation, Pilate suffers one flash of his natural impatience and the insolence of office to escape him, in a scene which has hitherto overawed him. He reminds the prisoner of his power over Him—a power which, though subordinate to that of the emperor, was practically, in such cases and in that distant province, absolute and arbitrary: "Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?" (John xix. 10.) It is an unworthy taunt against one in whom he himself acknowledges that he could find no fault. It marks a secret misgiving in regard to the equity of his procedure. Conscious of having no other ground to stand upon, he takes refuge in the last and worst argument of cowardly tyranny,—the argument of mere power.

Alas! this too is but a refuge of lies. There is no escaping from the searching glance of One who seems to pierce his very soul. Infatuated man! this power of which thou makest a boast, however practically irresponsible in so far as thy master on earth, the emperor, is concerned, is not so in reality. It is given thee from above,—it is of God. "Thou couldest have no power at all against Me, except it were given thee from above; therefore he that delivered Me unto thee hath the greater sin" (John xix. 11).

But yield, after all, he did; although to the last—all the more after this closing interview—he would fain have delivered his prisoner. "From henceforth," more than ever, "Pilate sought to release Him: but the Jews cried out, If thou let Him go, thou art not Cæsar's friend" (John xix. 12). The struggle becomes more desperate as it draws near its close. The claim of Jesus—his claim of sovereignty as a king, of truth as a witness, and now even of divinity as the Son of God—is pressing closer and closer on the conscience. But alas! alas! the loud cry prevails, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend."

Ah! it had been well for Pilate if, at this eleventh hour, in this final crisis of his mental struggle, the Lord's appeal to his tremendous responsibility, as having no power but from above, had been effectual to make him feel that he had no discretion, that he was shut up to the necessity of deciding for Jesus, and owning him as the King, the true Witness, the
